We have no objection to Canadian lumber being imported into this country. It's good lumber, as our own lumber is, but the situation is unfair.

Free trade is fair trade and this implies that there is balance and equality in trade practices. We think something should be done to restore fair play for the American industry.

We respectfully ask that you examine the facts of this situation and the destruction that is occurring in our domestic lumber market for U.S. producers. . . or there will be few American lumber producers left to compete in world markets.

SUPPLEMENTARY EXTRADITION TREATY BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, today I chaired a hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee to receive testimony on the recently signed Supplementary Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom. The Honorable Lowell Jensen, Deputy Attorney General, and the Honorable Abraham Sofaer, legal adviser for the Department of State, testified in support of the treaty. In September, the committee will hold a second day of hearings to provide public witnesses an opportunity to testify.

It was my view that giving the public witnesses until September to prepare testimony would ensure a full airing of the issues this treaty presents. To this end, I asked the administration to appear today in order that their analysis of the treaty and the arguments in support of the treaty would be available at the earliest possible date. It's my hope that the public witnesses will comment in detail on the administration's views.

Mr. President, Mr. Jensen and Judge Sofaer have done an excellent job of presenting the case for this treaty and I find their arguments compelling. For the benefit of my colleagues, as well as for those who will appear before the committee in September or wish to submit written comments to the committee on the treaty, I ask unanimous consent that Judge Sofaer's and Mr. Jensen's statements on the treaty be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF D. LOWELL JENSEN, DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I appreciate this opportunity to testify in support of the Supplementary Extradition Treaty Between the United States and the United Kingdom.

With the entry into force of the Jay Treaty in 1794, the United Kingdom became our first extradition treaty partner. Since then it has remained one of our best partners in extradition. Extradition treaties are invaluable law enforcement tools that must be periodically updated to reflect the advent of new crimes or new trends in both law enforcement techniques and in the commission of old, familiar crimes. The various treaties and supplements thereto governing extradition relations between the United States and the United Kingdom have been revised and updated on numerous occasions to meet the evolving needs of our respective countries during the past 191 years.

The 1985 Supplementary Extradition Treaty, which amends several provisions of the 1972 United States-United Kingdom Extradition Treaty, is designed primarily to address an issue of concern to all civilized nations: terrorism. The issue of terrorism is of particular concern to the United States and the United Kingdom since the citizens of our two countries are primary targets of international terrorism.

The 1972 United States-United Kingdom Extradition Treaty bars the extradition of persons whose crimes are deemed to be political offenses. While this term has defied comprehensive definition, American courts have uniformly construed "political offenses" to mean those that are incidental to severe disturbances such as war, revolution, and rebellion.

In recent years there have been four cases involving requests by the United Kingdom for the extradition of Irish Republican Army members charged or convicted of terroristic crimes. The fugitive in the first such request had caused an explosion in a British army barracks in Yorkshire, England that injured a civilian.

The IRA member in the second request had attempted to murder a British soldier who was a member of a plain-clothes intelligence patrol in Belfast.

The third request was for a convicted IRA member (William Joseph Quinn) who is charged with murdering a twenty-one year old, plain-clothes, off-duty police constable in London; sending letter bombs that caused severe injuries to their recipients; placing an explosive device in the London area; and with conspiracy to cause explosions that were likely to result in the indiscriminate killing of civilians in the London area.

The fourth request was for an IRA member who, with several IRA associates, planned an ambush of a British army convoy. In furtherance of that scheme they commandeered the home of a Northern Irish family whose house overlooked the route to be followed by the convoy. Alerted to the proposed ambush, British Security Forces stormed the house. During the ensuing melee, this IRA member shot and killed a British officer. Caught, convicted, and sentenced to life imprisonment, he became one of twelve jailed IRA members who somehow obtained weapons and escaped from H.M. Prison, Crumlin Road, Belfast. They left behind several severely wounded guards.

In each of the four cases described, the fugitive claimed that the unsettled political situation in Northern Ireland constituted a "war, revolution, or rebellion" and that his offenses qualified for treatment as "political offenses." The United States courts have accepted this argument in all but one case (Quinn) which is currently on appeal before the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.

The British Government has concurred in our view that it is unacceptable that a criminal may commit a heinous offense which shocks the sensibilities of all decent people; flee the country which he has terrorized; and find safehaven in another country by labelling his crime a political offense. The United States cannot condemn terrorism committed abroad against our citizens and then provide shelter on these shores for perpetrators of such atrocities against citizens of other countries.

Article I of the 1985 Treaty lists a variety of crimes associated with terrorism that are so destructive of society that under no circumstances should they be considered as "political offenses" for which extradition may be denied. Thus, terrorists committing such crimes as aircraft hijacking and sabotage, crimes against diplomats, hostage taking; and other heinous crimes, such as murder, manslaughter, malicious assault, and certain offenses involving firearms, explosives, and damage to property, would no longer be able to hide behind the political offense exception to avoid extradition from either this country or the United Kingdom. Once the Supplementary Extradition Treaty enters into force, terrorists wanted by the United States or the United Kingdom, who are found within the territory of either, can expect swift and certain justice for their crimes.

I shall now highlight other provisions of the 1985 Supplementary Extradition Treaty.

Article II provides that the statute of limitations of the Requesting Party only, shall be applied in determining whether extradition is time barred. In the past, a fugitive has been able to claim that even though he committed a crime in the Requesting country, his extradition should be barred because the Requested country's statute of limitations would prevent his prosecution for the offense. This provision is standard in our new treaties.

Article III expands from 45 to 60 days the time by which a formal extradition request and supporting documents must be submitted by the Requesting Party to the Requested Party following the provisional arrest of a fugitive by the Requested Party. This will provide more time for the preparation and transmittal of documents for the increasingly complex crimes for which extradition is being sought by the United States and the United Kingdom. This increase in time is more in line with the provisions of our other extradition treaties negotiated in the last ten years.

Article IV provides that the Supplementary Treaty shall apply to any offense committed before or after it enters into force, except an offense which was not a crime under the laws of both Parties at the time of its commission. Such provisions have become standard in our more recent treaties.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, the Department of Justice joins the Department of State in urging the swift advice and consent of the Senate to ratification of this Supplementary Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom.

I would be pleased to respond to any questions the Committee may have.

STATEMENT BY ABRAHAM D. SOFAER

Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, I am honored to appear before you to testify on the Supplementary Treaty Concerning the Extradition Treaty Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. This treaty was signed on June 25 and transmitted to the Senate on July 17.

This is my first appearance before this Committee as Legal Adviser to the Department of State. Since my confirmation, I have had the pleasure of consulting with individual Senators on a number of issues before the Department. I look forward to ongoing development of this constructive working relationship.

Mr. Chairman, the Supplementary Treaty addresses a problem with which this Committee is all too familiar: the difficulty of combating international terrorism. Nearly every day, a new terrorist assault occurs somewhere in the world. The object of such atrocities is to use terror and fear to attract media attention and to coerce governments into capitulating to terrorist demands.

The public, both in the United States and in other civilized nations, is distressed and angry over the inability of governments to bring these criminals to justice. Indeed, many of our own legislators have expressed their impatience with the difficulties of capturing and punishing terrorists in foreign countries. This widespread frustration has given ruse to calls for extreme measures to prevent terrorist acts of violence and to punish their perpetrators.

Mr. Chairman, I share this sense of frustration. While we must resist demands that we—like the terrorists—act in disregard of the law, the Department of State, in cooperation with the Department of Justice and other federal agencies, is committed to developing new tools to fight international terrorism effectively and in a manner consistent with our legal traditions and social values. Toward this end, the Departments of State and Justice, acting jointly, took the initiative to negotiate this Supplementary Extradition Treaty.

The most important aspect of the Supplementary Treaty is that it explicitly identifies particular crimes—such as airplane hijacking and murder of diplomats—that may no longer be regarded as political offenses excepted from the extradition process that exists between the U.S. and its historic ally the United Kingdom. The Supplementary Treaty recognizes that terrorists who commit the specified, wanton acts of violence and destruction should not be immune from extradition merely because they believe they were acting to advance a political objective.

Mr. Chairman, I will begin by reviewing the provisions of the Supplementary Treaty and their relationship to the existing U.S.-U.K. extradition treaty. I shall then discuss the origin and evolution of the political offense exception and the urgent need to implement a version of that doctrine in relations with the United Kingdom that advances rather than retards the human values and other interests historically served by international law.

PROVISIONS OF THE SUPPLEMENTARY EXTRADITION TREATY

The Supplementary Extradition Treaty amends the Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom, signed at London on June 8, 1982. The Supplementary Treaty contains four substantive articles. Article 1 addresses the political offense exception; Article 2, the statute of limitations; Article 3, the time limit within which documents must be submitted in support of an extradition request following a provisional arrest; and Article 4, retroactive application of the treaty.

Article 1 of the Supplementary Treaty amends the political offense exception to extradition, contained in Article V, paragraph (1)(c) of the current extradition treaty, by identifying particular crimes that shall not be regarded as offenses of a political character. The crimes listed are those typically committed by terrorists: aircraft hijacking and sabotage; crimes against internationally protected persons, including diplomats; hostage taking; murder; manslaughter; malicious assault; kidnapping; and specified offenses involving firearms, explosives, and serious property damage. These are not political acts, such as organizing, assembly, speech, or even espionage. They are heinous crimes, regardless of the motives of the perpetrators.

Recent events underscore the wisdom of this provision. Within the last two months, U.S. citizens have been the victims of almost every one of the types of terrorist acts excepted by the proposed treaty. How would we regard the argument that the murders of Robert Stethem on TWA-847 or of the Marine guards in El Salvador were "political offenses?" It is a shocking and disgraceful fact that criminals who commit these types of barbarous crimes against the citizens of other nations, and manage therefore to get to the U.S., are often able under current U.S. law, successfully to invoke the political offense exception and thereby escape extradition. Worst of all, in many cases in which the exception can be successfully invoked under present law, the United States is unable to prosecute the terrorists involved, because we lack jurisdiction for most offenses committed abroad. In such cases, the U.S. is limited to deporting such persons to some third country where they can continue to elude justice. The treaty amendment before you today would prevent such travesties of justice with respect to extradition requests between the United States and the United Kingdom.

Article 2 of the Supplementary Treaty amends Article V, paragraph (1)(b) of the current treaty to provide that extradition shall be denied if prosecution would be barred by the statute of limitations, of the requesting state. The current treaty permits the statute of limitations of either the requesting or requested state to bar extradition. The current formulation is included in several older extradition treaties. We have concluded, however, that the interests of justice are better served by applying the law of the requesting state—the place where the fugitive committed his crime—in determining whether his trial is time-barred. A criminal should not be able to avoid prosecution by fleeing to a country that has a shorter statute of limitations than the country in which the crime is committed.

Article 3 of the Supplementary Treaty amends Article VIII, paragraph (2) of the current treaty to provide that the requesting state shall have up to 60 days following the provisional arrest of a fugitive to submit evidence in support of its extradition request; if such evidence is not submitted within that time, the fugitive shall be freed. The current treaty allows only 45 days for submission of such evidence. Provisional arrest, a common feature of extradition treaties, allows the immediate apprehension of a fugitive from a foreign jurisdiction who might otherwise continue to elude capture, while at the same time requiring the foreign jurisdiction to substantiate its case within a reasonable time. We have concluded that 60 days is a more appropriate period, in light of the increasing complexity and volume of the documentary evidence necessary to substantiate requests for extradition. The full period, of course, will be used only if supporting documents cannot be prepared and transmitted in less time.

Article 4 provides that the Supplementary Treaty will apply to any offense committed before or after its entry into force; if the offense in question was committed before the Supplementary Treaty enters into force, it must have been an offense under the laws of both the United States and the United Kingdom at the time of commission. This is a standard provision in recent supplementary extradition treaties that the United States has concluded. Its purpose is to facilitate application of the changes effected by the Supplementary Treaty to prospective extradition requests for offenses committed in the past. The retroactive application of these procedural provisions is fully in accord with the U.S. extradition treaty practice.

Articles 5 and 6 are technical provisions that provide for the territorial application of the Supplementary Treaty, for its ratification, and for its entry into force.

ORIGIN AND EVOLUTION OF THE POLITICAL OFFENSE EXCEPTION

The overboard application of any concept, however enlightened, can lead to foolish and antisocial results. You will understand how the political offense exception has come to produce such results, by examining its evolution and true purposes.

First, the political offense exception is above all an exception. The basic tradition of international law applicable with respect to fugitives from justice is one of cooperation between nations to enhance their capacity to maintain the lawful order and security on which all liberty ultimately depends. The oldest known document in diplomatic history—a peace treaty between Ramses II of Egypt and the Hittite prince Hittusili III, concluded in 1280 B.C.—provided for the exchange of criminals of one nation found in the territory of the other. This principle of cooperation in extraditing fugitives has survived to modern times.

The great Eighteenth Century revolutions were based in part upon the notion that individuals have the right to engage in revolutionary political activity in pursuit of liberty. Those were times when today's democracies were ruled by Kings and Emperors, when universal suffrage did not exist, and when the mere open, verbal criticism of a ruler was frequently regarded as sedition or treason. In the wake of those revolutions, the emerging democracies of western Europe did not want to surrender to foreign sovereigns revolutionaries who had committed offenses in those nations in the course of exercising their political rights. The Jacobean Constitution of 1793, reflecting this revolutionary spirit, declared that the French people "grant asylum to foreigners banished from their countries for the cause of freedom." The same sentiment gave rise to the seminal provision in the Belgian extradition law of 1833, which provided that a fugitive "shall not be prosecuted or punished for any political offense . . ., nor for any act connected to such crime."

From its inception, the political offense exception has been applied without significant controversy to "pure" political offenses. Pure political offenses are those directly related to the security and structure of the state: sedition, treason, and the like. Governments and courts have had little trouble excepting these offenses from extradition. By contrast, application of the exception to "relative" political offenses has always been problematical. Relative political offenses are common, often violent crimes, such as murder and arson, whose perpetrators nevertheless claim immunity from extradition because their common, criminal acts were allegedly committed in a political context, or for a political purpose.

Claims of immunity from extradition based on "relative" political offenses have posed difficulties for civilized nations from the start. For example, in 1855, a Belgian court invoked the political offense exception to deny a French request for extradition of a fugitive who had placed a bomb under the railway over which Emperor Napoleon III was travelling. This decision led the Belgian legislature—the land in which the exception originated—to amend the 1833 extradition law to refuse to recognize as political offenses certain common crimes used by terrorists for political ends. The statute provided: "There shall not be considered as a political crime or as an act connected with such a crime an attack upon the person of the head of a foreign government or of members of his family, when this attack takes the form of either murder, assassination or poisoning."

This provision, known as an "attentat clause", gained widespread acceptance as a limitation on the political offense exception.

Courts have continued to grapple with the political offense exception through the years. For example, in 1891 Britain's Queen's Bench divisional court considered a Swiss extradition request for one Castioni, a fugitive who had shot and killed a State Council member in the course of an armed attack upon a municipal building. In a landmark decision, the Justices held that a criminal act was not protected under the political offense exception if committed merely "in the course of" a political conflict or uprising; it must also be done "in furtherance of" a political cause. The court found that Castioni had acted as a participant in an insurrection, that the shooting had occurred during this conflict, and that the shooting had in fact not been an act of personal malice against the victim. The Justices therefore ruled that the offense was political and denied extradition. American courts that have recently refused extradition have relied heavily on the ruling in Castioni.

Three years after Castioni, however, the British courts refined the doctrine. The French Government requested extradition of one Meunier, who had carried out bomb attacks on a crowded cafe and an army barrack. Meunier fought extradition by invoking the political offense exception. Justice Cave held that, for an offense to be judged political, "there must be two or more parties in the State, each seeking to impose the Government of their choice on the other." Meunier, the court found, was an anarchist who was the enemy of all organized society. Accordingly, he was not subject to the exception and was ordered extradited.

While Castioni, narrowly construed, may have made sense when it was decided, it makes no sense today to deny extradition to a nation such as Switzerland—with a democratic system of politics and a fair system of justice—of a man who willfully attempts to impose his will on the people through murder. If civilized society is to defend itself against terrorist violence, some offenses must fall outside the scope of the exception, even though they are politically motivated. The Meunier decision represents an early recognition that legal principles such as the political offense exception are based on the determination of sovereign nations to refuse for humane or ideological reasons to cooperate with other nations in the enforcement of criminal statutes. These principles do not create "rights" in the individuals that assert them. Each nation must decide how far to extend the doctrine based on its own values, and many have refused to shield from justice individuals who would destroy the freedoms and lives of others to gain political advantage.

A few examples should illustrate how harmful and unacceptable decisions of other nations can be, when they refuse to extradite Americans because of the political offense exception. In 1972, two American citizens, Holder and Kerkow, hijacked a domestic U.S. flight, extorted $500,000 from the airline that owned the plane, and forced the pilot to fly to Algeria. They were indicted in the United States for aircraft piracy, kidnapping, and extortion. The U.S. Government requested that France extradite Holder and Kerkow to this country to stand trial. Although the crimes were extraditable offenses under the U.S.-France Extradition Treaty, a French court denied extradition in 1975. The court noted that, at one point in the skyjacking, Holder had demanded that the plane be flown to Hanoi. He later dropped that demand. Nevertheless, the Court held that Holder's invocation of Hanoi demonstrated that he had acted out of a political motive, bringing the crimes within the scope of the political offense exception.

Another egregious example of overbroad application of the exception resulted from the hijacking in 1973 by five U.S. citizens of a domestic flight. They demanded, and received, $1 million in ransom for release of the passengers, and then forced the plane to fly to Algeria. Two of the fugitives had escaped from prison, where they had been serving sentences for murder and armed robbery. The U.S. Government sought extradition of the five from Paris in 1976 to stand trial for air piracy. But a French court refused to extradite the fugitives. It accepted their claims that they had hijacked the plane to escape racial segregation in the United States and that the charges against them constituted political persecution. The court therefore held that the skyjacking and extortion were political offenses.

In my view, some recent decisions in this country have applied the political offense exception as expansively and unreasonably as it has been applied against us by some nations. These recent decisions all concern Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) fugitives, but our objections to them are based on principle and have nothing to do with the PIRA or other particular movements.

One such case involved Desmond Mackin, a PIRA member sought for the attempted murder of a British soldier. In that case, a U.S. Magistrate found that, at the time of the offense, the PIRA was conducting an armed uprising in the portion of Belfast where the crime was committed; that Mackin was an active member of the PIRA; and that the attack on the British soldier was incidental to Mackin's role in the PIRA's political uprising. The Magistrate therefore denied extradition. The decision was later upheld on appeal to the district court, and in a judgment of great significance the Second Circuit Court of Appeals refused to disturb the lower court decision, holding that the refusal of a court to grant extradition requests in certain contexts in not an appealable order.

A second case involved Joseph Patrick Doherty, who blasted his way out of a prison in Belfast while awaiting a court's decision on charges including the murder of a British Army officer. Doherty was convicted of murder and other offenses two days after his escape and fled to the United States. The United Kingdom sought his extradition with respect to his conviction on charges of murder, attempted murder, and possession of firearms with intent to endanger life, and on new charges relating to his escape. The latter charges included firearms offenses and inflicting grievous bodily harm on a prison officer. Based upon his review of Irish history and politics, a U.S. district judge concluded that a political conflict existed in Northern Ireland and that Doherty's offenses had been committed "in the course of and in furtherance of that struggle." The judge recognized that "it would be most unwise as a matter of policy to extend the benefit of the political offense exception to every fanatic group or individual with loosely defined political objectives who commit acts of violence in the name of these so-called political objectives." He nevertheless drew an exception for the PIRA, after an analysis of its nature, structure, and the mode of its internal discipline, concluding that it has "both an organization, discipline, and command structure that distinguishes it from more amorphous groups such as the Black Liberation Army or the Red Brigade." The judge thereupon declared that Doherty's offenses were political and denied extradition.

What the PIRA and other, less structured terrorist groups have in common is far more significant in applying the political offense exception than the ways in which they may differ. All these groups exhibit a willingness to engage in the indiscriminate killing of people to achieve political ends.

Mackin and Doherty are not the only cases granting political offense treatment to PIRA members. Since 1979, U.S. judges or magistrates have denied four British requests for extradition of PIRA fugitives accused or convicted of violent terrorist crimes. Each denial was based on the political offense exception to extradition.

The problem is not the magistrates or judges involved in these cases. Their opinions reflect sincere attempts to apply our extradition laws; and the view that these lower court decisions are not always appealable has obstructed the development of law through decisions of our highest courts. The basic problem is the law itself, insofar as it is being applied so that the United States has become a sanctuary for terrorist murderers.

This is an intolerable situation. We must not allow our country to become a haven for terrorists who belong to groups that use indiscriminate violence against the citizens of other countries—just as we expect that foreign governments should not harbor terrorists who commit violent acts against United States citizens.

Unsuccessful attempts have been made to amend our extradition statute. Those efforts differ significantly from the present one, in that they were based on changes in the political offense exception that would or could have been applied to any nation with which we have extradition relations, including some which have experienced political change or instability since establishment of those relations, and which may not permit opponents of the government in power any lawful means of political dissent. The present approach is more narrow, and carefully drawn. It seeks to remedy the overbroad application of the political offense exception through a particular agreement with the United Kingdom. The rationale for this new Supplementary Treaty is simple: with respect to violent crimes, the political offense exception has no place in extradition treaties between stable democracies, in which the political system is available to redress legitimate grievances and the judicial process provides fair treatment. While this particular agreement relates to the United Kingdom, we fully intend to negotiate—and are in the process of negotiating—similar agreements with other nations that meet these criteria.

The conditions for justifying extradition of political rebels who engage in common crimes of violence undeniably exist in both the United States and the United Kingdom. Members of the Republican movement who desire reunification have not been prevented from participating in the democratic political system in the United Kingdom. Indeed, the PIRA's close supporter, Sinn Fein, has participated in a number of elections in Northern Ireland and has secured a small proportion of the vote—just under 12 percent in the local elections held in May. A Sinn Fein member has been elected to one of Northern Ireland's 17 seats in Parliament, but has refused to take his seat. The violence is therefore not the result of a lack of opportunity to engage in the democratic process. It seems that extremists in the movement either reject the democratic system completely or are not confident of success at the polls. In any event, they conduct a campaign of violence. They have political rights, but they choose to act unlawfully.

Similarly, no one can seriously challenge the basic fairness of the British system of justice, even under the extraordinary situation that Britain has faced in Northern Ireland. To deal with that situation, the United Kingdom has developed special non-jury courts—commonly known as Diplock Courts—to try certain well-defined terrorist acts. Diplock Courts operate without a jury in order to eliminate the risk of jury intimidation and murders, especially likely in the trial of PIRA terrorists.

The absence of a jury does not mean the central principles of procedural fairness are not maintained: trials are held in open court; witnesses may be called and cross-examined; the burden remains on the prosecution to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; the accused has a right to legal advice and representation; and the right of appeal is completely unfettered. The judge in the Doherty case recognized these facts. He found: "The Court . . . specifically rejects respondent's claim that the Diplock Courts and the procedures there employed are unfair, and that respondent did not get a fair trial and could not get a fair trial in the courts of Northern Ireland. The Court concludes that both Unionists and Republicans who commit offenses of a political character can and do receive fair and impartial justice and that the courts of Northern Ireland will continue to scrupulously and courageously discharge their responsibilities in that regard."

The Republic of Ireland also has non-jury courts for terrorist type offenses. Indeed, the Irish courts have recently decided to show their repugnance for IRA crimes by extraditing the PIRA terrorists arrested there to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Chairman, Secretary Shultz said last October that "the rule of law is congenial to action against terrorists." We and the United Kingdom view this Supplementary Treaty as an important step in applying the rule of law to terrorism. The principle reflected in Article 1 of the Supplementary Treaty will establish a definite, workable rule for applying the political offense exception to extradition among stable democracies. It will also be consistent with the rules adopted in 1977 by the Council of Europe which authored the European Convention for the Suppression of Terrorism. That Convention established limits on the political offense exception virtually identical to those contained in this Supplementary Treaty. The United Kingdom is a party to the Convention without reservation, but it is open solely to members of the Council of Europe, and we are only an observer there. Nevertheless, in our search for a solution to the problems created by current applications of the political offense exception in U.S. courts, we looked to that Convention and concluded that its limitations were appropriate.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully request that the Committee report on this treaty as a priority matter and that you recommend that the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification. I appreciate this opportunity to testify and will be pleased to answer any questions.

PROTECTING ANIMALS AGAINST INHUMANE TREATMENT

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the treatment of animals used in laboratory experiments is by no meams a new issue. It has, however, recently come to the forefront of public attention in the wake of disturbing revelations about the abuses at the University of Pennsylvania Head Injury Clinic. I am pleased that the National Institutes of Health has responded to public concerns by suspending funding for this clinic until a full investigation can be completed.

Abuses at the University of Pennsylvania are merely the most recent and visible example of a continuing problem: Current standards leave too much room for shoddy care and inhumane treatment.

Congress now has before it new legislation designed to tighten these standards. S. 1233, introduced in the Senate by Senator DOLE, and H.R. 2653, introduced in the House by Representative BROWN, would go a long way toward insuring that lab animals are properly cared for and humanely treated.

These bills represent a reasonable approach to a difficult problem. Certainly many research projects which have greatly benefited mankind might not have been conducted without some use of animals. While it is important for such efforts to continue, we most certainly should not condone the inhumane treatment of animals nor should we undertake experiments which sacrifice the lives of animals unnecessarily.

As a cosponsor of Senator DOLE's bill, I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation. It would minimize the use of animals by directing researchers to consider alternatives. A new national information service would assist them in finding such alternatives, and would prevent unintended duplication of research. In those cases which require the use of animals, researchers would be directed to seek the least painful methods, and to use pain-relieving drugs and anesthesia to minimize the animals' distress.

Mr. President, until we can develop alternative methodologies, we will need to continue some use of animals in research. These projects have resulted in medical and scientific breakthroughs that have touched all of our lives, and have saved millions of others. But we can—and should—ensure that strict standards are in place to protect the subjects of such experiments.

This legislation represents a reasonable balance between the public's concern over the treatment of animals and the need to continue research which benefits us all. I believe its enactment will be a significant step toward a resolution of this continuing controversy.

In closing, Mr. President, I wish to direct my colleagues' attention to an editorial on this subject which appeared in yesterday's edition of the New York Times. It points out the need for this type of legislation, adding that the bills before us are endorsed by the American Physiological Society, the largest user of lab animals. I ask unanimous consent that the article be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 31, 1985]

CRUELTY TO RESEARCH ANIMALS

Medical research would be impossible without experiments on animals, and most researchers treat them well, not least because badly kept animals make poor subjects. But there are distressing exceptions. Recently, the National Institutes of Health cut off funds for a University of Pennsylvania laboratory after a preliminary finding that the lab failed to treat animals humanely.

Experimentation on animals rouses strong public feeling, particularly when cats or dogs are concerned. Extremist animal rights groups have recently taken to raiding laboratories and turning animals loose. In May 1984 a group stole videotapes of experiments from the Head Injury Research Laboratory at the University of Pennsylvania. Another group, People for Ethical Treatment of Animals, has distributed excerpts of the tapes that seem to show baboons suffering from insufficient anesthesia and nonsterile surgery.

Animal rights advocates not long ago staged a sit-in at the National Institutes of Health protesting the Pennsylvania experiments. The demonstration ended when Margaret Heckler, Secretary of Health and Human Services, ordered the N.I.H. to suspend its funding.

Does the standard of animal care by researchers need improvement? Scientists currently observe voluntary codes. Their institutions have in-house committees that monitor animal research, and are subject to Department of Agriculture inspections. This light-handed control would be ideal if it worked. It doesn't. Painful experiments aside, Agriculture's veterinary inspectors regularly find violations of minimum standards of care. According to inspectors' reports analyzed by the Society for Animal Protective Legislation, 24 percent of one sample of research institutions were found to have major, repeated violations; 22 percent had some major violations, 29 percent had minor violations and only 24 percent were in compliance.

A bill to improve the system has been introduced by Bob Dole in the Senate and George Brown in the House. It would require researchers to minimize pain by all reasonable steps that do not frustrate the experiment. Institutions' animal care committees would have to include a veterinarian and a concerned public member. Researchers would have to consult a veterinarian in planning any painful experiment.

This moderate bill is supported by the American Physiological Society, the largest user of research animals. It believes the bill would impose no hardship on its members and would not impede research. Raising the standards of animal care, and catching offenders who have fallen into callousness, has instrinsic value. It is also necessary to preserve public support against those who oppose all use of animals in research.

NORTHERN VIRGINIA COMMUNITY FOUNDATION'S FOUNDER'S AWARD

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today in recognition of the recipient of the Virginia Community Foundation's Founder's Award, John M. Toups, businessman and resident of McLean, VA.

Northern Virginia community leaders will present the award on September 7, 1985.

In publicly recognizing an individual who has made an unusual leadership contribution to the northern Virginia community, the foundation seeks to promote awareness of the significance of individual action in improving the quality of life for all members of the community.

The Northern Virginia Foundation was formed in 1978 by a group of residents who wanted "to return to the community some of the riches that they had received from it."

Five areas of concern benefit from the foundation's endowment funds: The arts, education, health, youth, and civic improvement.

The foundation receives charitable gifts from people from all walks of life at all income levels—families, businesses, national corporations, and foundations.

Donations are used exclusively to benefit northern Virginia.

The foundation has selected John M. Toups, chairman, president, and chief executive officer of Planning Research Corp. to receive the 1985 Founder's Award.

In his 5 years in northern Virginia, John Toups has made significant contributions of time and leadership for the betterment of the business community, the improvement of technical higher education, the support of locally developed cultural activities, and the solution of the area's transportation problems.

John Toups currently serves as a director of the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce, the Fairfax Symphony, the George Mason Institute Industrial Policy Board, the Tysons Transportation Association, the Washington-Dulles Task Force, and Fairfax County Neighborhood Watch/Crime Prevention Education, Inc.

He has chaired numerous committees and programs in northern Virginia and in the Greater Washington area, and is incumbent president of the professional services council and vice president of the National Security Industrial Association.

Not only has John Toups devoted his personal energies and intelligence to improving the northern Virginia community, but he also has led his company and employees to be actively involved in community affairs.

PRC officers and employees work on business, health, youth, educational, and cultural programs throughout the area, and John Toups has made the PRC headquarters building available to the community as an "after hours" center for community events.

John Toups is a registered engineer and consummate businessman. After several years of municipal engineering, he founded Toups Corp., in Orange County, CA in the late 1950's.

In 1970, the hydrology and land development engineering company merged with Planning Research Corp. He became a PRC director in 1973, president in 1978, and chairman in 1982. Under his leadership, the compnay has grown from $280 million in 1980 when it moved its headquarters to McLean, to a $375 million professional services firm in 1985, providing engineering and information services worldwide.

PRC opened its first offices in McLean, VA in 1970, and John Toups moved the corporate headquarters to a showcase building in the new Tysons/McLean development in 1981.

PRC is now the third largest employer in northern Virginia, with more than 1,400 employees.

With his strong personal and corporate influence for good in the northern Virginia community, John Toups richly deserves the 1985 Northern Virginia Foundation's Founder's Award. When he receives the award on September 7, leaders of all elements of the northern Virginia community will rise to applaud.

THE SINGLE 6-YEAR PRESIDENTIAL TERM

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the enduring strength of our Constitution is an important source of our national stability. But all of the provisions that worked well during the early days of our Republic are necessarily well suited to today's world. The Presidential term is a prime example of a horse-and-buggy mechanism that requires another look in the space age. Because I believe this provision of our Constitution should be reevaluated, I am pleased to cosponsor Senate Joint Resolution 171. This measure, recently introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND, and by Senator DECONCINI, proposes to amend the Constitution to limit the President to a single, 6-year term.

All of our elected Presidents have been chosen for 4-year terms. Until the ratification of the 22d amendment in 1951, every President was eligible for reelection at the expiration of his term. Even today, a President may serve two terms. This is the status quo that has been the subject of much trenchant criticism.

The critics argue that 4 years may not be long enough for a President to design coherent national policies, work with the Congress to have them enacted, and put them into practice. The possibility that every President may seek reelection promotes partisanship and discourages statesmanship.

The Chief Executive, and his supporters and opponents in the Congress, can't keep their eyes on the ball if they are continually distracted by the prospect of a campaign a few months—or years—down the road. In recent years, we've seen some troubling indications of the price we pay for the current system: lack of continuity and predictability—particularly in foreign policy; inability to take the long view that's needed for wise policy choices; increased difficulty in forging a bipartisan approach to tough national problems.

Because of these shortcomings of the present system, the proposal to limit the President to a single term of 6 years is worth serious consideration. A single 6-year Presidential term—SSPT—would remove the temptation for the President to confuse what's best for the country with what will be best for the party—or the President—at the time for reelection. At the same time, it would give the President a better shot of translating his policy ideas into reality before his term expires.

Like many good insights, SSPT is not a new idea. It was hotly debated at the Constitutional Convention in 1787, which at one point adopted a proposal for a single 7-year term, but later reversed itself. Constitutional amendments to establish a 6-year term have been proposed more than 150 times in Congress over the years; most of these would also have limited the President to a single term.

Several Presidents, from Andrew Jackson through Jimmy Carter, have advocated the concept. Many congressional leaders have agreed: The most recent Senate hearings on the issue, in 1971, focused on a resolution offered jointly by the leader of the Senate Democrats, Mike Mansfield, and the dean of Senate Republicans, George Aiken.

In the 14 years since those last hearings on SSPT, four men have occupied the Oval Office. Each of these incumbents has been involved in a hard-fought Presidential campaign. This recent history has a lot to teach us about the contradictory roles of the President, as Chief Executive, and as a political partisan. President Reagan, in his second term, is the first President since Eisenhower to be barred from succeeding himself. It will be interesting to study his experience in search of clues as to the effect of that status on Presidential power and effectiveness.

There are able advocates on both sides of the Presidential term issue. Elected officials, constitutional scholars, and other citizens will no doubt draw divergent lessons from the recent past. A thorough debate on this topic can only enrich our political discourse.

One of the most thoughtful and vigorous advocates of the single 6-year term was the late Milton S. Eisenhower. Dr. Eisenhower had the rare opportunity to view the power and the problems of the Presidency from close up. Eight Presidents, from Calvin Coolidge to Richard Nixon, profited from his counsel, including, of course, his brother, President Dwight D. Eisenhower. Drawing from this wealth of experience with the modern Presidency, Milton Eisenhower concluded that the establishment of a single 6-year term would be a reform of inestimable importance. In his view, the "pursuit of electoral immortality" was the chief obstacle to increasing the efficiency and effectiveness of our Government. Accordingly, in 1982, Dr. Eisenhower joined with three other distinguished public servants—former Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, former Treasury Secretary William Simon, and former Attorney General Griffin Bell—as national chairmen of the Committee for a Single 6-Year Presidential Term. This committee, headquartered in Baltimore, has worked hard to encourage serious consideration of this proposal.

Milton Eisenhower's death last May deprived the country of one of its most experienced and articulate statesmen. I was fortunate enough to be able to draw on his experience and knowledge at various critical junctures over the past decades, so I feel his loss personally. One way that we as a nation can acknowledge Dr. Eisenhower's legacy is to open a thorough and comprehensive debate on the proposal for a single 6-year Presidential term. One way that I can express my personal gratitude for his wise counsel is to join as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 171.

TRIBUTE TO MYRTLE E. GREEN

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it is with a great deal of sorrow that I stand today to acknowledge the passing of one of Alabama's most devoted public servants, Judge Myrtle G. Green of Huntsville.

There are many words with which to describe this rare woman, but perhaps none could be more accurate than the word "dedicated." Myrtle Green was a totally devoted person who contributed 54 years of service toward the betterment of Alabama and Madison County.

Miss Green, a graduate of Riverton High School, began working as a clerk typist in the probate office in 1928. She worked under three probate judges for 41 years before she ran for the office herself. Her bid was a successful one. She carried every ballot box in the county but one, and lost there by only three votes. During her 12 years in office, she not only distinguished herself as an untiring leader, but also as a committed community worker. She served as a member of the advisory board of the Huntsville-Madison County Mental Health Center, a member of the Huntsville Business & Professional Women's Club, the Salvation Army advisory board and the Democratic women's group.

To fully appreciate the depth and dimension of Myrtle Green, one must look at but a few of the honors bestowed on her by her constituents and colleagues. In 1970, she was cited as the "Outstanding Working Woman" by the Central Center Pacesetters. In 1971, the Huntsville-Madison County bar presented her the Liberty Bell Award.

There was no question that Myrtle G. Green was a great public servant. Her dedication and love for Alabama was exemplified through her work. Her perceptive insight, devotion, and integrity while in office meshed to make Myrtle G. Green a probate judge that any State would be proud to claim. Alabama and America have lost a great citizen.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two articles from the Huntsville Times be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MYRTLE G. GREEN

Myrtle G. Green, Madison County's first woman probate judge, died Friday afternoon at her home at age 74. With the passing of Miss Green, the county lost one of its most devoted public servants, whose career spanned 54 years.

Miss Green, a graduate of Riverton High School, began working as a clerk-typist in the Probate Office at age 16. She worked under three probate judges for 41 years before deciding to run for the office herself in 1970. She carried every ballot box except for one—and lost that one by only three votes.

She was sworn in as the county's first woman probate judge in January 1971, a post she held until her retirement in early 1983. Miss Green found time for many other community activities. She was a member of the Advisory Board of the Huntsville-Madison County Mental Health Center, a member of the Huntsville Business and Professional Women's Club, the Salvation Army Advisory Board and the Democratic Women's group. She was cited in 1970 as the Outstanding Working Woman by the Central City Pacesetters, received the Good Government Award in 1971 from the Huntsville Jaycees and in 1982 was awarded the Liberty Bell by the Huntsville-Madison County Bar Association.

Miss Green's many friends and the citizens of Madison County she served so well for so long will miss her. She was a public servant in the truest sense.

COUNTY'S FIRST WOMAN PROBATE JUDGE DIES

(BY RETA MCKANNAN)

Myrtle G. Green, who retired in early 1983 as Madison County's first woman probate judge, died Friday afternoon at her home at the age of 74.

Miss Green, of 606 California St., served the county as probate judge from 1971 until her retirement in January 1983. She had compiled 54 years in public service, beginning work in the probate office in 1928 at the age of 16.

Funeral arrangements were to be announced later today.

Miss Green, a graduate of Riverton High School, took her first job as a clerk-typist in the Probate Judge's office after completing a business course at then-Howell Business School in Florence.

She worked under three probate judges for 41 years before running for the office hereself in 1970. She carried every ballot box in the county but one, losing there by only three votes. Miss Green took office in January 1971.

Responsible for all records filed for real estate, deeds, and until 1963, the issuing of all licenses, Miss Green said the work was interesting because "you meet people, help people . . . there's a lot of satisfaction in being able to do that. It made me stay 54 years."

For her accomplishments, Miss Green, was cited in 1970 as the Outstanding Working Woman by the Central City Pacesetters, and received the Good Government Award in 1971 for the Huntsville Jaycees. In 1982, she was awarded the Liberty Bell by the Huntsville-Madison County Bar Association.

She served as a member of the Advisory Board of the Huntsville-Madison County Mental Health Center, and was a member of the Huntsville Business and Professional Women's club, the Salvation Army Advisory Board and the Madison County Democratic Women's group.

Miss Green is survived by two sisters, Miss Lucy Green of Huntsville and Mrs. Elizabeth G. Orth of Decatur, Ga., and two brothers, John Marvin Green of Huntsville and Frank McArthur Green of New Market.

Visitation is scheduled for tonight from 6 to 9 p.m. at Laughlin Funeral Home.

TRIBUTE TO CHARLIE BURNS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in the hustle and bustle and chaos of today's society, oftentimes people attach undue importance to material wealth and possessions when categorizing others. All too frequently, our judgments leave out the factors of personal generosity, concern for others, friendship, and kindness.

Today, Mr. President, I rise in sadness occasioned by the recent death of an individual who personified these best human traits, Charlie Burns. Charlie, a resident of Montgomery, AL, passed away on Friday, July 19, from a heart attack while on the way to visit his 91-year-old mother.

Born in Selma, AL, in 1919, Charlie Burns was a graduate of Auburn University. During his career, he worked as a freelance writer, and editor, and as assistant editor of the newsletter put out by the Alabama League of Municipalities. After leaving the league, Charlie worked putting out the Alabama Trucker Magazine for the Alabama Trucking Association, and then was manager and editor of his own Independent Trucker Magazine.

Charlie Burns was a person who could be described as a friend of everyone he ever met. Even when he could not afford to help others, he did anyway—although it would make life that much tougher for him.

Mr. President, our society has too few people like Charlie Burns. It is sad for all of us to have lost him.

Joe Azbell of the Montgomery Independent recently captured the true essence of Charlie Burns in an article he wrote. I ask unanimous consent that that article, and one from the Birmingham News, be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Montgomery Independent, July 25, 1985]

CHARLIE REMEMBERED

(By Joe Azbell)

Sgt. Charles J. Burns was editor of the Craig Field Journal before I took over as base newspaper editor at the end of WW II. He was a rip-snorter in those days rushing here and yonder, always on a project.

I will never forget our first encounter. Here was a round little doughboy with a squeaky voice like a toy mouse and a high pitched machine-gun laugh, suddenly appearing to show me some of the tricks to covering Craig Field. His cousin, Ann Burns, later wife of General William Wise, was secretary in the PR office and a crackerjack writer.

The Burnses were a rich, powerful family in Selma at the time. Charlie's uncle, L.P. Burns, was mayor. Mayor Burns literally ran Selma. He was good to Selma and Selma was good to him.

Charlie and I immediately became close friends. He was a civilian living in Montgomery in those days. He would call me up on the phone "Hey, Sergeant, how's the newspaper going? You sure know your onions. Heh! Heh! Anything I can do for you?" He was forever complimenting others but never praised himself.

Charlie died here last week. He was going to visit his mother who at 91 survives him. Charlie just fell over dead on the walkway. He was too heavy and didn't take care of himself.

Former WCOV-TV Announcer Ed Brown said of Charlie: "He was the greatest little guy who ever lived . . . never did a mean thing to anyone. We are going to miss him." Charlie and Ed, who was Gov. Jim Folsom's press secretary, had a warm relationship eating breakfast almost every morning at Farmer's Market.

THE "JEEP"

At Auburn University, Charlie was called "Jeep." He was one of the best loved students on the campus, involved in politics and fraternities, always laughing his show-stopping giggle.

"Heh. Heh. How you doing, buddy. You are sure looking great. I like your tie. It makes you look like a million."

Charlie, as he was later known by friends, never allowed his squeaky voice to slow him down. Then there was his toothy smile with the spaced teeth that lighted up a room.

"Have you heard from Georgy Porgy? I haven't seen him lately. You know the Governor (Wallace) is my old buddy. Met him with Eddie Reed. Eddie Reed just loved him. I think Eddie Reed had more to do with George Porgy's career than anybody."

Nobody ever said an unkind word about Charlie. He was not threatening to anyone. He loved everybody. Everybody loved him. He had a lot of personal problems and pain from his fight to make his Independent Trucker magazine go, his reaching out to help everybody, but he seldom mentioned them.

"Hey, Joe, I brung you something. A little present I picked up for you. If you don't like it, give to Miss Betty. Smartest thing you ever did was to marry a Selma girl and especially that girl."

A PRO

A lot of us used Charlie on occasions when we needed information. If he didn't have the information, he would find it. He was a pro.

Under Ed Reed's tutelage at the Alabama League of Municipalities, Charlie learned about editing a magazine. He was always "associate editor" but he could turn out great little pearls about city officials and they loved it.

Then Charlie left the league and the magazine, much to the shock of his friends. He went to work to make a success of the Alabama Trucker Magazine for the Alabama Trucking Assn. The late Lawrence (Snag) Andrews, a powerful state senator from Union Springs, got the job for Charlie.

After many years, Charlie, now greyhaired, parted from the trucking group and eventually set up the Independent Trucker magazine. He was always moving. He was at the Capitol constantly, running around the city or out in the state in his battered old car.

In later years, he was editor of the Alabama Legionnaire, a job that he got on my recommendations. He was beginning to get back on his feet after a lot of years of tough sledding. He seemed happy for the first time in a long time.

The last time I saw him was a few weeks ago, his white hair was shining and in place but he fussed because he was still fighting dandruff. "I thought when you got greyhaired, you lost dandruff . . . heh-heh, "heh-heh," he said. "What can I do. I've tried everything."

Charlie had a lot of close friends over the years, Jake Jordan, Lea Harris, Ned Jones, Ted Stancel, Henry Flinn Jr., Art Smith, Grover Hall Jr., Paul Robertson, Top Howard, Ray Evans, and just about anybody you can name. He thought Mayor Emory Folmar was the best mayor in Alabama and Mayor Joe Smitherman of Selma right up there with him.

A HAPPY FELLA

During his recent hard luck times, Charlie lived with some of his friends and did little chores for some of them. They loved him and encouraged him and that was why in his mid-sixties he was making a real comeback.

The Charlie Burnses of the world are few and far between. He was involved in hundreds of political campaigns but he never asked for a political favor. He had a lot of pride, a brilliant mind in the trade journal field, and an overflowing generosity. It was giving to friends and refusing to accept full pay for anything that kept him in hard straits. Gov. Wallace would have given him a job but Charlie wouldn't ask. It was his stubborn pride.

If ever there was a guy who considered everyone his brother, it was Charlie. For almost 40 years, we were close buddies. And a thousand others probably could say the same thing of him.

Jim Ritchey of the Truckers Association said Charlie had a small retirement check coming but he wouldn't come by to sign up. He was that way. Money meant little to him even when he needed it.

Out of the kindness of his heart, he helped people when he couldn't afford to do so. If he had money, his friends did, too. I know there must be a special place in heaven for the Charlie Burnses, those who love so deeply and yet get so little from life for themselves.

I can hear that little squeaky voice right now trying to soften up Saint Peter so some of his buddies can come up there and get in and keep him company for he never liked to eat alone and always wanted people around so he could gossip politics or find out what's going around.

[From the Birmingham News, July 20, 1985]

CHARLIE BURNS, WALLACE FRIEND, IS DEAD AT 66

MONTGOMERY.—A longtime friend of Gov. George Wallace and Alabama American Legion public relations officer died suddenly of a heart attack, relatives said.

Charlie Burns, a 66-year-old Montgomery resident, suffered a heart attack Friday morning while walking into the apartment building where his mother lives, said Francis Condit, his sister-in-law.

Wallace said Friday that Burns was a "dear and personal friend and fellow comrade whose death is a personal loss to me."

"His extreme dedication and patriotism to his state and nation was surpassed only by his love for humanity," Wallace said.

Burns worked as a freelance writer and editor, assistant editor of the Alabama League of Municipality newsletter, and manager and editor of the Independent Truckers' Magazine, Ms. Condit said.

Burns, born June 19, 1919 in Selma, graduated from Selma public schools and Auburn University.

Survivors include a son, Charles Burns III of Montgomery; daughters Elizabeth Burns of Montgomery and Mrs. Kendall McMoy of Atlanta; and his mother, Mrs. Charles J. Burns of Montgomery, 91.

Graveside service is set for 2 p.m. Sunday at the Old Live Oaks Cemetery in Selma.

TRIBUTE TO BRYANT WHITMIRE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it is with a great deal of sadness that I rise today to note the passing of one of the most outstanding members of the legal profession, Bryant Whitmire of Birmingham, on July 10. 1985.

There are many phrases with which tribute may be paid to attorneys, but probably none convey greater respect than the description, "a common man's lawyer." Bryant Whitmire was truly a champion for the common man, deeply respected by all who met and worked with him. Born in 1912, Whitmire received his law degree from the University of Alabama and was admitted to the Alabama bar in 1936. He set up his own office in 1937 in downtown Birmingham where he practiced the rest of his life. During his distinguished career, his colleagues honored him many times. Among his most treasured award was being named Lawyer of the Year in 1981 by the Birmingham Bar Association.

To fully realize the depth and dimension of this dedicated man, one must look beyond a mere listing of his honors and awards to the true essence of his character.

Bryant Whitmire was a rare and unique character, as well as being a tremendous lawyer. His life was shaped around his love for other people. He had excellent logic and true merit and achieved much scholarly success, but I believe his own measure of success was not in his material or personal accomplishments, but in the simple everyday pleasure of helping other people.

Bryant Whitmire was truly fond of his clients, thinking of them not as impersonal numbers or mere faces, but as worthy human beings. He was widely known for his wit and humor, his storytelling abilities, his integrity, and his leadership but no more so than for his ability and willingness to give his time to listen and counsel.

Bryant Whitmire was fond of saying that he was a "country lawyer, the last of a dying breed." He was not only a lawyer, but a counselor, and a friend. He dealt with bankers and doctors, coal miners and coal operators, workers and laborers alike, never caring about their positions, only their needs. He earned many times over, the respect and admiration of all who knew him.

Mr. President, Bryant Whitmire was a truly great attorney and man. His life personified the true essence of the word citizen. I only wish that my words today could convey the same esteem toward him that he clearly held others in. Bryant Whitmire will be greatly missed. Alabama, and America, have lost a great citizen, I have lost a close friend.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the Birmingham News be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Birmingham News, July 11, 1985]

BRYANT WHITMIRE DIES; SELF-STYLED COUNTRY LAWYER

He didn't think of himself as one of those big-city attorneys in a law firm with a string of last names for a company title.

But as you'd expect a lawyer to do, Bryant Whitmire kept an office tucked into a tall, downtown building, plaques dotting the walls and heavy books filling the shelves.

It was the client he could look to for a plate of turnip greens as he dropped off some legal papers that made Whitmire smile.

He once told The Birmingham News, "I even give (clients) curb service. I'm going to take a copy of a will to a lady in Leeds myself, not mail it to her or send somebody else with it. I know that lady, know her family, and if she's home, she'll have some turnip greens for me."

Whitmire, 73, died Wednesday. His son, Bryant Jr., said although his father had "slowed down in past years" because of asthma, he kept working with the law firm of Whitmire, Coleman and Whitmire until his death.

"He'd come in three or four hours a day. He'd handle as much as he could." When his father had more than he could do, he'd pass it on to his only son. "And that was fine. It's what I'm here for," he said.

Funeral will be at 11 a.m. Friday at Johns-Ridout's Southside with burial following in Cedar Grove in Leeds, Whitmire's hometown.

He is survived by his wife, Sue, his son Bryant, and two daughters, Elaine Whitmire of New York City and Suzanne Haugseth of Florence.

"He was a heavy-set man, jovial. A general practitioner," the younger Whitmire said

"He was a heavy-set man, jovial. A general practioneer," the younger Whitmire said of his father. "He had a thousand stories to tell. It's a shame we didn't get a tape recorder and go over his stories. We just didn't get that done," he said.

"He considered himself a country lawyer. He was one of the last of the breed," said the younger Whitmire.

In 1981 when the former president of the Birmingham Bar Association was named Lawyer of the Year, he told The News, "I never wanted to be a hotshot lawyer in one of those big firms where they have one lawyer interview a client, then another one do something else, then another one finally get down to handling you.

"I get to see people every day," he said with a wide smile. "There are lawyers in bigger firms that stay on their phones talking to places like San Francisco and New York and overseas all the time. It seems as if that's all they ever do.

"That isn't for me," he said. "I'm a local community lawyer. I deal with bankers and doctors, coal miners and coal operators, workers and laborers and the people they work for."

Shortly after he earned his law degree from the University of Alabama School of Law, Whitmire was offered three jobs—two which paid $50 a month and another which paid $100 a month.

"Daddy had a fit when I told him that," Whitmire once told The News. "He told me, 'After all that time and hard work and money spent to become a lawyer, that's the best they could do?' Then he said, "Come on, let's go get us an office and open up your own law practice."

It was 1937 when Whitmire and his father found an office in the City Federal Building in downtown Birmingham. It was where he practiced the rest of his life.

Current Bar Association President J. Mason Davis said the long table still dominating the group's meeting room was one Whitmire arranged to buy more than 30 years ago from a Leeds chair company. "We just had it refinished because of the sentiment attached to it," he said. "When we look at it, we think of (Whitmire)."

Davis said, "He was the fastest storyteller around. It's a great loss to Birmingham."

THE 34TH ANNUAL NATIONAL SQUARE DANCE CONVENTION

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on June 28, 1985, I had the privilege of attending an outstanding first for my home State, the 34th National Square Dance Convention.

The many folk arts that have always thrived in Alabama have long been a source of pride for the State. Both our musical and dancing heritage have played important roles in the development of America's musical tradition. Alabama's recognition of square dancing as the State dance has been a boon not only to square dancing itself, but to all the traditional arts.

The role of square dancing is an important one. Today, in an era when the traditional family unit is frequently criticized, square dancing is a form of family recreation which symbolizes the unity of the family, a basic cornerstone of our society. It is a joyful expression of the vibrant spirit of the American people. It is from this that the spirit of gatherings such as this one grows, a monument to a past expression of joy that overlaps to a bright future.

The 34th National Square Dance Convention was a tremendous success in many ways. It not only recognized and celebrated the square dance, but it also spread our much acclaimed "southern hospitality" to all parts of the Nation. The fellowship and interaction the fellow square dancers shared helped to intensify the friendly and open atmosphere that so characterizes Alabama. The convention was the largest gathering ever held in Alabama, boasting 19,730 dancers from 49 States and 10 countries.

Mr. President, for a moment I would like to commend the local Alabamians who put this convention together. It is not often that the kind of dedication that these people displayed is found. There were a total of 3,000 Alabama square dancers who volunteered their time and efforts over the past 3 years to accomplish this feat. If no administrative costs, it is estimated that between $11 and $15 million was generated into the economy. Most importantly, but their hard work and devotion, they set up a program that was organized, enjoyable, and successful. I take my hat off to these people, they represent the best resource that Alabama has to offer.

Like all Alabamians, I am very proud of the talent that lies in abundance in our home State. It was a great pleasure for me to attend the 34th National Square Dance Convention and speak to the participants. An important chapter of history was added to Alabama's heritage by this convention, and I would like to commend all those involved with this undertaking.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and a withdrawal which were referred to the appropriate committees.

AMENDMENT TO DEFENSE NUCLEAR COOPERATION AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM-72

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit to the Congress, pursuant to Sections 123 b. and 123 d. of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2153(b), (d)), the text of an amendment modifying the 1961 defense nuclear cooperation agreement between the United States and France to provide for cooperation on the safety and security of nuclear activities and installations for mutual defense purposes. I am also including a copy of my written approval, authorization, and determination concerning that agreement, as amended. A copy of the joint unclassified letter submitted to me by the Secretaries of Energy and Defense, which provides a summary position on the amendments, is also enclosed. A classified letter and attachments are being transmitted directly to the appropriate congressional committees.

The amendment focuses our cooperation on the safety and security of each nation's nuclear activities and installations. It does not allow transfer of nuclear components or weapons, or special nuclear materials, or source material and, therefore, fully complies with the international agreements in matters of non-proliferation and does not alter other mutual cooperation agreements that exist between the two countries in the field of defense.

I have concluded that the cooperation authorized by the amendment is in the United States' interest and have determined that performance of the amended agreement will promote and not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security. Accordingly, I have approved the amendment and authorized its execution.

I have also found that the amendment meets all applicable requirements of the Atomic Energy Act, as amended, for agreements for defense nuclear cooperation; and therefore, I am transmitting it to the Congress without exempting it from any requirement contained in Section 123 a. of the Atomic Energy Act. The transmission shall constitute submittal for the purposes of Sections 123 b. and 123 d. of the Atomic Energy Act. The 30-day continuous session period specified in Section 123 b. shall begin immediately. Upon completion of this period, the 60-day continuous session period provided for in Section 123 d. shall commence.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 1, 1985.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

At 10:38 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled joint resolution.

S.J. Res. 180. Joint resolution commemorating the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki Final Act.

The enrolled joint resolution was subsequently signed by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated.

POM-368. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Utah; to the Committee on Finance.

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas, H.R. 1520 is a bill sponsored by Congressman Morris Udall in the U.S. House of Representatives which directs the President to negotiate a decrease in foreign copper production and, if a decreased is not agreed upon, imposes tariffs on foreign copper products being imported into this country;

"Whereas, the chief copper producers of the world, besides the United States, are Chile, Zambia, Zaire, and Peru;

"Whereas, H.R. 1520 calls upon the President to negotiate with these four countries to reach an agreement whereby they will limit their copper production to 1983 levels for five years after the agreement is reached;

"Whereas, if the President cannot reach such an agreement within six months with these four countries, H.R. 1520 would impose tariffs of 15 cents per pound of copper or fabricated copper imported into this country, including copper wire, sheets, bars, strips, angles, mesh, foil, and insulated wire;

"Whereas, H.R. 1520 has been proposed in response to the impact of cheap foreign copper products on the U.S. industry, which has caused a loss of over half of the jobs in the copper mining and smelting industry since 1979, and resulted in the closure of over 15 of the 28 major copper mines in the country, including the Kennecott Mines;

"Whereas, although in 1980 the U.S. copper mines produced one-quarter of the world's copper products, today they produce only one-sixth;

"Whereas, although copper prices are at a 60-year low in real dollars, foreign copper production has actually increased;

"Whereas, a number of circumstances have combined to give foreign copper producers an unfair advantage over U.S. copper producers;

"Whereas, foreign copper producers, unlike U.S. producers, have access to low-interest loans from multilateral lenders such as the World Bank, which allow them to function at substantially lower costs than U.S. producers;

"Whereas, foreign copper producers also have a cost advantage in the lack of environmental controls on copper production, in contrast to the high-cost environmental control equipment required on U.S. plants;

"Whereas, the current high levels of the dollar against foreign currency hurts the U.S. copper industry by making prices artificially high, and helps foreign copper producers by keeping the price of their copper artificially low; and

"Whereas, the devastation of the U.S. copper industry because of undue foreign competition causes problems for individual workers, and city, state, and federal governments.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, That the Legislature of the state of Utah, the Governor concurring therein, expresses its support for the passage of H.R. 1520, sponsored by Congressman Morris Udall of Arizona and co-sponsored by Congressmen David Monson and Howard Nielson.

"Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be prepared and forwarded to the members of Utah's congressional delegation, the President of the U.S. Senate, the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, and the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee."

POM-369. A resolution adopted by the Hermitage Board of Commissioners relating to the use of nuclear weapons at Hiroshima and Nagasaki; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-370. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 63

"Whereas, For 14 years Ida Nudel, a Jewish citizen of the Soviet Union, has tried to gain permission to emigrate to Israel, to join her only living relative, her sister; and

"Whereas, Ida Nudel has come to be known as the "Guardian Angel" of the Soviet Jewry movement, for her indefatigable efforts on behalf of "prisoners of conscience" and others who have suffered persecution by the Soviet government solely because they desire to celebrate their Jewish heritage and emigrate to Israel; and

"Whereas, For her efforts she was sentenced to a four-year prison term in Siberia, and since her release has been forced to live in "unofficial exile" far from her home in Moscow; and

"Whereas, In recent months she has been taken seriously ill, and the prospects for her recovery are not encouraging; and

"Whereas, Rather than allow her to receive the full medical attention and treatment she needs, the Soviet authorities have instead threatened her with a new trial and prison term; and

"Whereas, The type of treatment that Ida Nudel has received from the Soviet government is not worthy of such a powerful nation and is in violation of the international human rights accords to which the Soviet Union is a signator; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California urges the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to allow Ida Nudel to emigrate to Israel where she may be reunited with her sister, her only living relative, who will care for her in the remaining months of her life; and be it further

"Resolved, That the legislature urges the President of the United States and other federal officials to use all appropriate diplomatic channels to attempt to persuade Soviet authorities to allow the emigration of Ida Nudel; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President, Vice President, and Secretary of State, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, to the Ambassador to the United States from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and to the Consul General of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics headquartered in San Francisco."

POM-371. A resolution adopted by the Army & Navy Union of U.S.A. relating to Bill S. 1456; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-372. A joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 295

"Whereas, the 1st Congress of the United States of America, at its first session, by a two-thirds (⅔) majority of both Houses, made the following proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States of America in the following words, to wit:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two thirds of both Houses concurring. That the following (article) be proposed to the legislatures of the several states, as (an amendment) to the constitution of the United States, . . . which (article), when ratified by three fourths of the said legislatures, to be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, viz:

"ARTICLE

"No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened. Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Ninety-Fourth General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, the Senate Concurring, That the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America quoted in the preamble of this Resolution is ratified.

"Be it further resolved, That certified copies of this Resolution be forwarded by the Secretary of State of Tennessee to the Governor of Tennessee; to the Administrator of General Services, Washington, D.C.; and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DURENBERGER:

S. 1550. A bill to reduce costs in the Medicare and Medicaid Programs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

HEALTH CARE FINANCING COST REDUCTION AMENDMENTS

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, at the request of the administration and in my capacity as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee's Health Subcommittee, I am introducing the "Health Care Planning and Cost Reduction Amendments of 1985." This bill would carry out the President's budget recommendations for the Medicare and Medicaid Programs.

Mr. President, this bill asks the Congress to change Medicare and Medicaid policy. I do not agree with the package in its entirety. But, I believe it is important that the issues raised by the bill be brought before the Senate.

For the purposes of this statement, it would be best to leave a discussion of my questions or concerns about the package to another day. The Finance Committee will review the recommendations made by this bill and give them due consideration when it marks up on a Medicare and Medicaid bill this fall.

Mr. President, I will take this opportunity, however, to again express my frustration with the fact the Secretary of Health and Human Services has promulgated regulations which freeze hospital reimbursement rates and medical education reimbursement, as well as reduce the reimbursement for home health agencies.

These regulations clearly flaunt congressional intent. They were obviously designed to meet the President's budget goals, not carry out the Secretary's duties as executive of the Medicare Program. They are another example of how high deficits and budget constraints adversely affect good health policy. And, it is for these reasons I support efforts to remove the Social Security Act, including Medicare, from the congressional budget.

The Congressional mandate given the Secretary concerning the updating of the DRG's was intended to "reflect changes in treatment patterns, technology, and other factors which may change the relative use of hospital resources." To use this mandate simply to reduce payments is wrong and will adversely affect the credibility of Medicare and its prospective payment system.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill summary and the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1550

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (b) Section 1888(b) (42 U.S.C. 1395yy(b)) is amended by inserting "or in subsection (b)" before the period.

(c) Section 1888(c) (42 U.S.C. 1395yy(c)) is amended by inserting "or (b)" "after subsection (a)".

(d) Subsections (b) and (c) of section 1888 (42 U.S.C. 1395yy) are designated as subsections (c) and (d).

(e) Section 1888 (42 U.S.C. 1395yy) is amended by inserting after subsection (a) the following:

"(b) The Secretary, in determining the amount of the payments which may be made under this title with respect to routine service costs of extended care services for cost reporting periods beginning after June 1985, shall not recognize as reasonable (in the efficient delivery of health services) per diem costs of such services to the extent that such per diem costs exceed the per diem limits that applied (or would have applied) under subsection (a) for the cost reporting period immediately preceding the cost reporting period for which the amount of payments is being determined under this subsection.".

DIRECT APPORTIONMENT OF MALPRACTICE COSTS TO MEDICARE

SEC. 115. (a) Section 1861(v)(1) (42 U.S.C. 1395x(v)(1)) is amended by adding at the end the following:

(P) In determining the reasonable cost of services, the Secretary may separaely accumulate and directly apportion on a claims paid or other basis to the insurance programs established by this title costs of malpractice insurance premiums and self-insurance fund contributions.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) is effective with respect to cost reporting periods beginning after June 1979. Any regulations or instructions issued previously to carry out the effect of that amendment are effective with respect to cost reporting periods beginning after that month until and unless modified or revoked.

INCLUSION OF LABOR OR DELIVERY ROOM DAYS IN DETERMINING HOSPITAL ROUTINE INPATIENT PER DIEM COSTS

SEC. 116. (a) Section 1861(v)(1) (42 U.S.C. 1395x(v)(1)) (as amended by section 115 of this Act) is further amended by adding at the end the following:

"(Q) In determining hospital routine inpatient per diem costs, the Secretary may count as a patient day a day on which a patient is in a labor or delivery room at the census-taking hour.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) is effective with respect to cost reporting periods beginning after August 1976. Any regulations or instructions issued previously to carry out the effect of that amendment are effective with respect to cost reporting periods beginning after that month until and unless modified or revoked.

REDETERMINATION OF ALLOWABLE COSTS NOT TO AFFECT CERTAIN PAYMENTS TO HOSPITALS

SEC. 117. Section 1886(d) (42 U.S.C. 1395ww(d)) is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(9) No redetermination of any allowable operating costs of inpatient hospital services shall affect any payment under this subsection for a cost reporting period that has begun before the date of the redetermination.".

PART C—ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES

ASSIGNMENT OF INPATIENT HOSPITAL BENEFIT PERIOD, DEDUCTIBLE, AND COINSURANCE IN THE ORDER OF FILING OF PAYMENT REQUESTS

SEC. 121. (a) Section 1812(b)(1) (42 U.S.C. 1395d(b)(1)) is amended—

(1) by inserting "as an inpatinet of a particular hospital" after "inpatient hospital services furnished to him", and

(2) by inserting "as an inpatient of that hospital, or of another hospital that has previously filed a request for payment under this part for such services," after "150 days during such spell".

(b)(1) The first sentence of section 1813(a)(1) (42 U.S.C. 1395e(a)(1)) is amended by inserting "as an inpatient of a hospital that first files a request for payment under this part for such services" after "any spell of illness".

(2) The second sentence of section 1813(a)(1) (42 U.S.C. 1395e(a)(1)) is amended to read as follows: "In addition, the amount payable for inpatient hospital services furnished an individual during any spell of illness shall be reduced by a coinsurance amount equal to—

"(A) one-fourth of the inpatient hospital deductible for each day (after the 60th but before the 91st day) on which such individual is furnished such services during such spell of illness as an inpatient of a particular hospital, or of another hospital that has previously filed a request for payment under this part for such services; and

"(B) one-half of the inpatient hospital deductible for each day (after the 90th but before the day following the last day for which such individual is entitled under section 1812(a)(1) to have payment made on his behalf for inpatient hospital services during such spell of illness) on which such individual is furnished such services during such spell of illness as an inpatient of a particular hospital, or of another hospital that has previously filed a request for payment under this part for such services; except that the reduction under this sentence for any day shall not exceed the charges imposed for that day with respect to such individual for such services (and for this purpose, if the customary charges for such services are greater than the charges so imposed, such customary charges shall be considered to be the charges so imposed).".

(3) Section 1813(a)(2) (42 U.S.C. 1395e(a)(2)) is amended—

(A) by striking out "to any provider of services", and

(B) by inserting "as an inpatient of a particular hospital, or of another hospital that has previously filed a request for payment under this title for such services" after "such services".

(c) The amendments made by the preceding subsections apply to spells of illness beginning after September 1985.

ELIMINATION OF REQUIREMENT FOR A RAILROAD RETIREMENT BOARD CARRIER CONTRACT

SEC. 122. (a) Section 1842(g) (42 U.S.C. 1395u(g)) is repealed.

(b) The first sentence of section 1841(i) (42 U.S.C. 1395t(i)) is amended by striking out "and section 1842(g)".

(c) The amendments made by the preceding subsections are effective one year after the date of enactment of this Act, or as such earlier time as the Secretary and the Railroad Retirement Board may agree.

TITLE II—MEDICAID

LIMITATION ON STATES' ENTITLEMENT TO FEDERAL PAYMENTS FOR MEDICAL ASSISTANCE

SEC. 201. (a) Section 1903 (42 U.S.C. 1396b) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(v)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, no State (other than Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, or American Samoa) shall be entitled to payment with respect to expenditures for medical assistance under paragraphs (1) and (5) of subsection (a), for fiscal year 1986 or any succeeding fiscal year, in excess of such State's allotment under paragraph (2).

"(2)(A) For fiscal year 1986, the allotment of each State subject to this subsection shall be an amount which bears the same ratio to $22,130,121,000 as the amount the State is entitled to receive under paragraphs (1) and (5) of subsection (a) for medical assistance expenditures for fiscal year 1984 bears to the total amount all such States are entitled to receive for such expenditures.

"(B) For fiscal year 1987 and each subsequent fiscal year, each State's allotment shall be an amount equal to its allotment for the preceding fiscal year, multiplied by the change in the MCPI (as defined in subparagraph (C)) for such subsequent fiscal year.

"(C) For purposes of this paragraph, the 'change in the MCPI' for a specified fiscal year means the ratio of (i) the annual average index of the medical care expenditure category of the Consumer Price Index for all urban consumers (U.S. city average) published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics for the first fiscal year preceding such specified fiscal year, to (ii) such index as so measured for the second such preceding fiscal year.

"(3) For purposes of paragraph (2), the amounts States are entitled to receive under paragraphs (1) and (5) of subsection (a) for medical assistance expenditures for fiscal year 1984 shall be the amounts approved by the Secretary before October 1, 1985, on the basis of expenditure reports received by the Secretary on or before January 20, 1985.

(b)(1) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1903(v) of the Social Security Act, the Secretary shall make payments totaling $300,000,000 to qualifying States, for fiscal year 1986 only, in addition to payments subject to the limitation under section 1903(v)(1), in accordance with this subsection.

(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term "qualifying State" means a State (other than Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, or American Samoa)—

(A) which applies to the Secretary before January 1, 1986, for funding under this subsection, and

(B) the Federal share of whose medical assistance expenditures for fiscal year 1986, as approved by the Secretary before July 1, 1987, on the basis of expenditure reports received by the Secretary before January 1, 1987, exceed 108 percent of the State's allotment as determined under section 1903(v)(2)(A), and

(C) which can demonstrate either—

"(i) that the rate of increase in the Federal share of medical assistance expenditures from the 12-month period ending on September 30, 1983 to the 12-month period ending on September 30, 1985 did not exceed the percentage increase in the annual average index of the medical care expenditure category of the Consumer Price Index for all urban consumers (U.S. city average) published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics (MCPI) from the 12-month period ending on September 30, 1983 to the 12-month period ending on September 30, 1985, or

(ii) that the percentage change in the rate of increase in the Federal share of medical assistance expenditures between fiscal years 1984 and 1985 and fiscal years 1985 and 1986 did not exceed the percentage change in the rate of increase in the MCPI between those same periods.

For purposes of this paragraph, the Federal share of each State's medical assistance expenditures shall be calculated without regard to subsections (s) and (t) of section 1903 of the Social Security Act, and as if the Federal medical assistance percentage in effect in the State for fiscal year 1984 was the Federal medical assistance percentage in effect in the State for every fiscal year.

(3) The amount payable to a qualifying State under this subsection shall be that amount which bears the same ratio to $300,000,000 as the excess of the Federal share of the State's medical assistance expenditures for fiscal year 1986 (as determined under paragraph (2)(A)) over 108 percent of its allotment under section 1903(v)(2)(A) bears to the total of all such excess amounts for all qualifying States.

(4)(A) The Secretary shall make interim payments totaling $300,000,000 in accordance with paragraph (3) not later than July 1, 1986, to those States that appear to be qualifying States on the basis of the most recent estimates received by the Secretary as of January 1, 1986.

(B) The Secretary shall make fiscal adjustments in payments under this subsection (including reductions and increases as necessary in payments made under subparagraph (A)) not later than July 1, 1987.

GRANTS TO STATES FOR COSTS OF ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 202. (a) Section 1903 (42 U.S.C. 1396b), as amended by section 201 of this Act, is further amended by adding after subsection (v) the following new subsection:

"(w)(1) The Secretary shall, in accordance with the succeeding provisions of this subsection, make grants for fiscal year 1986, and each fiscal year thereafter, to each State other than Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, The Northern Mariana Islands, and American Samoa, for the proper and efficient administration of its plan approved under this title in lieu of payments under paragraphs (2), (3), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (a) for quarters in such fiscal year.

"(2) The amount payable to a State under paragraph (1) for any fiscal year shall be that amount which bears the same ratio to the total amount appropriated to carry out such paragraph for such fiscal year as the amount payable by the Secretary under paragraphs (2), (3)(B), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (a) with respect to such State's administrative expenditures made for fiscal year 1984 bears to such amounts payable to all the States to which this subsection applies.

"(3) For purposes of paragraph (2), the amount payable by the Secretary under paragraphs (2), (3)(B), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (a) with respect to a State's administrative expenditures made for fiscal year 1984 shall be determined on the basis of expenditure reports sent to the Secretary by January 20, 1985, and approved by the Secretary prior to October 1, 1985.

"(4) Grants pursuant to paragraph (1) shall be made quarterly, in amounts as nearly equal as is feasible (unless the State's report pursuant to subsection (d) indicates that a lesser amount will be needed during the coming quarter for the proper and efficient administration of the State plan), reduced by amounts previously paid under this section that were not used by the State for such purpose.

"(5)(A) There are authorized to be appropriated for grants under paragraph (1) $1,191,148,000 for fiscal year 1986, and, for any subsequent fiscal year, the amount appropriated for the preceding fiscal year multiplied by the change in the GNP deflator (as defined in subparagraph (B)) for such subsequent fiscal year.

"(B) For purposes of this paragraph, the 'change in the GNP deflator' for a specified fiscal year means the ratio of (i) the gross national product implicit price deflator, measured for the second quarter of the first fiscal year preceding such specified year, published by the Bureau of Economic Analysis, Department of Commerce, before August 31 of such preceding fiscal year, to (ii) such deflator, as so measured, for the second such preceding fiscal year.

"(6) No amount shall be payable under paragraph (2), (3), (5), (6), or (7) of subsection (a) to any State for any quarter for which a grant under this subsection may be made to such State.".

FLEXIBILITY IN DETERMINING BENEFITS

SEC. 203. (a) Section 1902(a)(10) (42 U.S.C. 1396a(a)(10)) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (A), in the matter preceding clause (I), to read as follows:

"(A)(i) for making medical assistance available, including at least the care and services listed in paragraphs (1) through (5), (7), and (17) of section 1905(a), to all individuals—";

(2) by redesignating paragraph (A)(ii) and paragraph (B) as paragraph (B) and paragraph (A)(ii), respectively;

(3) in subparagraph (A)(ii), as redesignated,—

(A) by inserting ", with respect to the care and services listed in paragraphs (1) through (5), (7), and (17) of section 1905(a)" after "any individual described in subparagraph (A)"; and

(B) by striking out "subparagraph (A)" each place it occurs and inserting instead "clause (i)";

(4) in subparagraph (B), as redesignated,—

(D) by redesignating subclauses (I) through (VI) as clauses (i) through (vi); and

(E) by adding at the end "and"; and

(5)(A) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (C); and

(B) by striking out subparagraph (D).

(b) Section 1902(a)(10)(C) (42 U.S.C. 1396a(a)(10)(C)) is amended—

(1) in clause (i), by striking out all that follows "all such groups" and inserting instead "not described in subparagraph (A) or (B); ".

(2) in clause (ii), by inserting "and" at the end; and

(3) by striking our clause (iv).

(c) Section 1902(a)(17) (42 U.S.C. 1396a(a)(17) is amended to read as follows:

"(17) include the standards and methods (which shall be reasonable) for determining eligibility for and the extent of medical assistance under the plan for each group of individuals not described in paragraph (10)(A) for which medical assistance is provided under the plan which—

"(A) in the case of the methodology used in determining income and resource eligibility for each group, shall be the same methodology which would be employed under the cash assistance program described in paragraph (10) (A) in effect in the State to which such group is most closely categorically related,

"(B) provide for taking into account only such income and resources as are, as determined in accordance with regulations of the Secretary, available to the applicant or recipient, except to the extent otherwise provided in paragraph (E);

"(C) do not take into account the financial responsiblity of any individual for any applicant or recipient of assistance under the plan unless such applicant or recipient is such individual's spouse or such individual's child who is under age 21 or (with respect to States eligible to participate in the State program established under title XVI), is blind or permanently and totally disabled, or is blind or disabled as defined in section 1614 (with respect to States which are not eligible to participate in such program);

"(D) take into account, in accordance with regulations of the Secretary, the costs of the applicant or recipient (or family members living with the applicant or recipient), whether in the form of insurance premiums or otherwise, for medical care or for any other type of remedial care recognized under State law; and

"(E) in determining the amount of income and resources which an individual residing in a medical institution who has been determined to be eligible may be required to contribute to the cost of medical care covered under the State plan (including income or resources of a spouse or parent as permitted under subparagraph (C))—

"(i) may take into account, to the extent permitted by the Secretary, income and resources of the applicant or recipient and of individuals financially responsible for the applicant or recipient (as described in paragraph (C)) which are not taken into account in determining eligibility, and

"(ii) do not take into account more than 20 percent of that portion of the total annual income of individuals financially responsible for the applicant or recipient (as described in paragraph (C)) that exceeds 200 percent of the poverty line as revised by the Secretary pursuant to section 652 of the Head Start Act;".

(d) Section 1902(f) (42 U.S.C. 1396a(f)) is amended by striking out "incurred medical expenses" each place it occurs and inserting instead "medical expenses".

(e) Section 1903(f) (42 U.S.C. 1396b(f)) is amended in paragraph (3) by striking out "incurred by such family" and inserting instead "of such family".

"(C) "The Secretary shall not find a showing of a State unsatisfactory, with respect to the requirement to conduct annual onsite inspections in mental hospitals, skilled nursing facilities, and intermediate care facilities under paragraphs (26) and (31) of section 1902(a), for failure to review the care of each person receiving medical assistance (or, as permitted by the Secretary, each person in a sample group of such individuals) where the showing demonstrates, with respect to each institution subject to this requirement, that the State did not fail to meet the requirement with respect to more than—

"(i) (in the case of an institution with more than fifty such patients) the lesser of ten such individuals or two percent of the total number of such individuals in the institution, or

"(ii) (in the case of an institution with fifty or fewer such patients) one individual.".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 215. (a) The amendments made by sections 201 and 202 shall become effective upon enactment.

(b) The amendments made by sections 203 through 214 shall be effective with respect to calendar quarters beginning on or after the first day of the first fiscal year for which sections 201 and 202 are in effect.

SUMMARY OF PROPOSED HEALTH CARE FINANCING COST REDUCTION AMENDMENTS OF 1985

SHORT TITLE AND REFERENCES IN ACT

Section 1 would assign the draft bill the short title "Health Care Financing Cost Reduction Amendments of 1985".

TITLE I—MEDICARE

PART A—CHANGES IN ELIGIBILITY AND COST SHARING

USE OF MEDICARE PHYSICIANS' SERVICES ECONOMIC INDEX TO INCREASE ANNUALLY THE SUPPLEMENTARY MEDICAL INSURANCE DEDUCTIBLE

Section 101 would increase the Supplementary Medical Insurance (SMI) deductible (currently set at $75) each year, beginning with 1987, by the percentage increase in the economic index used to determine the allowable increase in prevailing charges for physicians' services, rounded to the next higher multiple of $1. This section would allow the SMI deductible to keep pace with changes in physician fees in the future.

FIRST FULL MONTH OF MEDICARE ELIGIBILTIY

Section 102 would provide for eligibility for Medicare benefits to begin in the first month throughout which all the eligibility requirements have been met.

ONE PERCENT COINSURANCE FOR HOME HEALTH BENEFITS

Section 103 would impose a coinsurance of one percent of the inpatient hospital deductible for each home health visit after the twentieth in any calendar year.

CHANGES IN SUPPLEMENTARY MEDICAL INSURANCE PREMIUM

Section 104 would increase the SMI premium over a period of five years from 25 percent of the estimated per capita costs of the SMI program to 35 percent. Under current law, the monthly premium for 1986 and 1987 will be set at 25 percent of the estimated per capita costs; annual increases in the monthly premium for later years is to be limited by the percentage increase in Social Security benefits. The proposed changes would provide a more reasonable balance between Federal and beneficiary shares of total program costs, which were originally intended to be evenly shared.

EXTENSION OF WORKING AGED PROVISIONS TO INDIVIDUALS OVER 69

Section 105 would expand the provisions that make Medicare the secondary payer for working beneficiaries (and spouses) to include individuals over 69 years of age (as well as those between 65 and 70), and would require an employer to continue to provide group health coverage to all older employees and spouses of employees, not only those under 70, to the same extent as the employer provided those benefits to employees and spouses under 65.

APPLICABILITY OF LIFETIME LIMIT ON PSYCHIATRIC CARE TO CERTAIN PSYCHIATRIC UNITS OF GENERAL HOSPITALS

Section 106 would apply the 190 day lifetime limit on inpatient psychiatric care to patients in a psychiatric unit of a general hospital if Medicare pays for services furnished in the unit on a cost rather than prospective basis. Under current law hospitals have little incentive to limit the length of stay of patients in such units.

PART B—CHANGES IN REIMBURSEMENT

EXTENSION OF FREEZE ON PAYMENTS FOR PHYSICIANS' SERVICES

Section 111 would extend the freeze on payments for physicians' services for another year, through fiscal year 1986. Prevailing charges for services furnished after the freeze would not include an allowance for the lack of an increase during the freeze. For physicians who were not participating physicians during fiscal years 1985 and 1986, actual charges for services furnished during that period that were above their actual charges from April, through June of 1984 would not be recognized in determining their customary charges for fiscal year 1987. For physicians who were participating physicians during fiscal year 1985 but not during fiscal year 1986, only actual charges from April through September 1985 would be considered in determining their customary charges for fiscal year 1987. For physicians who were participating physicians during fiscal year 1986, only actual charges from October 1985 through March 1986 would be considered in determining their customary charges for fiscal year 1987. For physicians who were not participating physicians during fiscal year 1986, actual charges from April through September of 1986 that were above their actual charges from April through June of 1984 would not be recognized in determining their customary charges for fiscal year 1988.

REDUCTION IN AMOUNTS PAID FOR THE INDIRECT COSTS OF MEDICAL EDUCATION

Current law requires that hospitals under the diagnosis related groups (DRG) system be paid additional amounts for the indirect costs of medical education equal to double the amounts determined under regulations for those costs before the DRG system was placed in effect. Section 112 would eliminate the doubling factor and limit the educational adjustment factor to not more than 5.795%.

FREEZE ON PAYMENTS FOR CLINICAL DIAGNOSTIC LABORATORY TESTS AND POTENTIAL PERMANENT APPLICATION OF FEE SCHEDULES TO SUCH TESTS FOR HOSPITAL OUTPATIENTS

Section 113 would freeze Medicare payments for clinical diagnostic laboratory tests for the 15 month period beginning in July 1985, and would set fees in future years without an allowance for the lack of an increase for that period. Section 113 would also apply fee schedules to such tests for hospital outpatients through September 1987, and permanently if the Secretary so decided before July 1987; current law applies fee schedules to tests for hospital outpatients only through June 1987.

FREEZE ON PAYMENTS FOR ROUTINE SERVICE COSTS OF SKILLED NURSING FACILITIES

Section 114 would freeze for one year, through June 1986, the limits on payments for routine service costs of skilled nursing facilities, and would preclude later adjustments for the lack of an increase during that year.

DIRECT APPORTIONMENT OF MALPRACTICE COSTS TO MEDICARE

Section 115 would provide explicit statutory authority for the Secretary to accumulate separately and directly apportion on a claims paid or other basis to Medicare the costs of malpractice insurance premiums and self-insurance fund contributions. The section would retroactively ratify regulations or instructions issued previously to carry out the effect of this section.

INCLUSION OF LABOR OR DELIVERY ROOM DAYS IN DETERMINING HOSPITAL ROUTINE INPATIENT PER DIEM COSTS

Section 116 would provide explicit statutory authority for the Secretary, for purposes of determining hospital routine inpatient per diem costs, to treat as inpatient days any days on which a patient is in a labor or delivery room. The section would retroactivity ratify regulations or instructions issued previsouly to carry out the effect of this section.

REDETERMINATION OF ALLOWABLE COSTS NOT TO AFFECT CERTAIN PAYMENTS TO HOSPITALS

Section 117 would preclude any retroactive changes in payments to hospitals subject to the prospective payment system (including retroactive changes to the hospital-specific portion of payments to those hospitals), due to redeterminations of any allowable costs of inpatient hospital services. Permitting such changes following judicial or other redeterminations of allowable costs for earlier cost reporting periods would erode the prospective nature of the hospital prospective payment system by introducing an element of uncertainty incompatible with the purpose of the system.

PART C—ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES

ASSIGNMENT OF INPATIENT HOSPITAL BENEFIT PERIOD, DEDUCTIBLE, AND COINSURANCE IN THE ORDER OF FILING OF PAYMENT REQUESTS

Section 121 would change the order in which hospitals are responsible for collecting from a Medicare beneficiary the inpatient hospital deductible, coinsurance, and charges for services furnished after the Medicare coverage period has expired for a particular spell of illness, in cases in which the beneficiary is an inpatient of two or more hospitals during the same spell of illness. The responsibility for collecting these amounts is currently assigned in the chronological order in which services are furnished. Section 121 would instead assign the responsibility in the order in which hospitals submitted requests for Medicare payments, so that a hospital that provided services after another hospital, but submitted its request first, would be responsible for collecting the inpatient hospital deductible and would be credited with the first 60 days of Medicare coverage (for which no coinsurance is required). This change would simplify the administration of the Medicare program by eliminating the need to make later adjustments in amounts payable to specific hospitals.

ELIMINATION OF REQUIREMENT FOR A RAILROAD RETIREMENT BOARD CARRIER CONTRACT

Section 122 would eliminate the requirement for a separate Railroad Retirement Board carrier contract. Under the section, SMI claims of railroad retirees would be processed by the same organizations that process other SMI claims. The section would reduce administrative costs and improve service to beneficiaries.

TITLE II—MEDICAID

LIMITATION ON STATES' ENTITLEMENT TO FEDERAL PAYMENTS FOR MEDICAL ASSISTANCE

Section 201 would limit States' entitlement to Federal matching payments with respect to medical assistance expenditures. For FY 1986 Federal matching payments would be limited to $22,130,121,000; each State's share of this amount would be proportional to its share of Federal matching payments for FY 1984. For FY 1987 and succeeding fiscal years, each State's limit would be its FY 1986 ceiling, indexed by the medical care component of the Consumer Price Index. This amendment would not apply to the territories, whose Federal matching payments are already capped.

For FY 1986 only, the Secretary would be authorized to distribute additional funds appropriated, up to a ceiling of $300 million, in additional grants to States whose Federal medical assistance payments, but for their ceiling, would be more than 108 percent of such payments as limited by the ceiling.

GRANTS TO STATES FOR COSTS OF ADMINISTRATION

Section 202 would provide for grants to States (other than the territories) for costs of administration, in lieu of present authority for Federal matching payments for such costs.

Each such State's grant for FY 1986 and each succeeding fiscal year would be a proportion of the total appropriation for this purpose equal to that State's proportional share of Federal matching payments to all such States for administrative expenditures for FY 1984 (other than development costs of Medicaid management information systems (MMIS)), determined on the basis of expenditure reports sent to the Secretary by January 20, 1985, and approved by the Secretary prior to October 1, 1985.

Appropriations would be authorized for this purpose of $1,191,148,000 for FY 1986, and the prior year's appropriation adjusted by the GNP deflator for FY 1987 and succeeding fiscal years.

FLEXIBILITY IN DETERMINING BENEFITS

Section 203(a) would eliminate most minimum benefit requirements for the current "categorically needy" groups, retaining the requirements only for current mandatory services for the mandatory eligibles.

Subsection (b) would amend paragraph (10)(C) of section 1902(a) to eliminate the requirement that a State whose "medically needy" program includes care in institutions for mental diseases or in intermediate care facilities for the mentally retarded provide to all "medically needy" groups a minimum benefit package comparable to that required for the "categorically needy". This subsection would also eliminate from paragraph (10)(C) provisions concerning income and resource determinations which duplicate or overlap provisions of paragraph (17).

Subsection (c) would amend section 1902(a)(17) to contain all requirements concerning standards and methods for determining eligibility and benefits of individuals other than mandatory eligibles. As amended—

Section 1902(a)(17)(A) would maintain the requirement that the methodology used to determine income and resource eligibility must be the same as that of the cash assistance program for the group most closely categorically related to the optional medical assistance group;

Section 1902(a)(17) (B) and (C) would maintain the requirements to take into account only income and resources actually available to the applicant or recipient, and not to take into account the financial responsibility of any other individual (other than a spouse or parent);

Section 1902(a)(17)(D) would maintain the requirement to take into account costs of medical or remedial care, but eliminate the reference to "costs incurred" in order to allow States to consider also costs for which payment has not yet been made and foreseeable future costs;

Section 1902(a)(17)(E) would explicitly provide, that, in determining the amount an eligible individual residing in a medical institution must contribute to the cost of care—

(1) income and resources may be taken into account that were not counted in determining eligibility, to the extent the Secretary may permit (this is a clarifying amendment; the rule is necessarily implied to avoid results inconsistent with the intent of the Congress, and has been applied since the inception of the program in 1965, but the absence of an explicit statement is a source of recurring confusion); and

(2) up to 20 percent of that portion of the annual income of financially responsible spouses and parents that exceeds 200 percent of the Federal poverty line may be deemed available to the applicant or recipient (this is new authority).

Subsections (d) and (e) would amend section 1902(f) (the "209B eligibility provision") and section 1903(f) (which limits Medicaid eligibility to those whose income and resources do not exceed 133⅓ percent of the cash assistance standard for families with dependent children) to eliminate the restriction of spenddown to incurred medical costs, in order to include also costs for which payment has not yet been made and foreseeable future costs.

ELIGIBILITY OF CERTAIN INDIVIDUALS WHO BECOME INELIGIBLE FOR SUPPLEMENTAL SECURITY INCOME OR STATE SUPPLEMENTAL PAYMENTS

Section 204 would clarify that the disregard of certain income provided by section 503 of Public Law 94-566, for purposes of determining Medicaid eligibility, applies only to those individuals who become ineligible for supplemental security income (SSI) as a direct result of a cost-of-living increase in social security benefits, and would therefore, without this section, be ineligible for Medicaid as well. It is clear from the legislative history of section 503 that this provision was never intended to afford relief to individuals who lost SSI eligibility for reasons apart from the cost-of-living increase, but who, if that increase were deducted from their total income, would qualify for SSI (despite the contrary outcome in Lynch v. Rank).

STATEWIDENESS REQUIREMENTS RETAINED ONLY FOR MANDATORY SERVICES TO MANDATORY ELIGIBLES

Section 205 would amend the present requirement that the State plan be in effect throughout the State to apply only with respect to mandatory services to those groups the State is required to cover.

AMENDMENT CONCERNING "FREEDOM OF CHOICE"

Secton 206 would limit applicability of the requirement that recipients have freedom of choice in selection of a provider from whom to receive covered services to mandatory services for the categorically needy.

AMENDMENTS CONCERNING HEALTH MAINTENANCE ORGANIZATIONS

Section 207(a) and (b) would permit States to extend the minimum enrollment period now available to individuals enrolled in Federally qualified HMOs to individuals enrolled in (1) a case management system approved under the Medicaid freedom-of-choice waiver authority, or (2) all types of HMOs, both State and Federally qualified.

Subsection (c) would permit the Secretary to grant States waivers of the "freedom of choice" requirement with respect to entities qualifying as health maintenance organization under the Medicaid definition.

AMENDMENTS CONCERNING COPAYMENTS

Section 208 would amend provisions concerning copayments by Medicaid recipients. No premiums or like charges could be made for mandatory services for the mandatory groups, and copayments for such services could only be nominal. States would have the option to exempt from copayment requirements services furnished to children, pregnant women, inpatients subject to spenddown requirements, HMO services, and emergency services. There would be no restrictions on copayments for optional services for any individuals.

ELIMINATION OF FEDERAL REQUIREMENTS CONCERNING STATE PAYMENT RATES

Section 209 would eliminate all statutory requirements with respect to minimum payment rates for Medicaid services, but States would be required to include in their plans a description of the methods used to set payment rates for hospitals, skilled nursing facilities, and intermediate care facilities.

ELIMINATION OF REQUIREMENTS CONCERNING STATE AGENCY STAFF AND COOPERATIVE ARRANGEMENTS WITH OTHER STATE AGENCIES IN ADMINISTRATION OF STATE PLAN

Section 210 would eliminate requirements that the State agency cooperate with State health and rehabilitation agencies in the administration of services; and that it specify in its plan the health professionals to be used in plan administration.

SIMPLIFICATION OF REQUIREMENT TO VERIFY THAT MEDICAL SERVICES WERE FURNISHED AS CLAIMED

Section 211 would repeal the present requirement that MMIS systems provide for written notice to be given to individuals (or to a sample of individuals) of the medical services furnished under the State plan to those individuals, and would instead require the State plan to provide an adequate method for verifying whether services for which payment is claimed under the State plan were actually furnished to covered individuals.

ELIMINATION OF PENALTY FOR FAILURE TO PAY PREMIUMS FOR INDIVIDUALS ELIGIBLE FOR MEDICARE PART B BENEFITS

Section 212 would eliminate the reduction in Federal reimbursement with respect to expenditures which would not have been incurred by the State if it had exercised its option to pay Medicare part B premiums on behalf of eligible Medicaid recipients.

ELIMINATION OF REVIEW REQUIREMENTS AND PENALTIES RELATED TO MECHANIZED INFORMATION SYSTEMS

Section 213 would eliminate requirements and related penalties with respect to operation of States' mechanized claims processing and information retrieval systems.

AMENDMENT TO UTILIZATION CONTROL PENALTY

Section 214 would amend the utilization control penalty requirement to add a tolerance for error. Under present law, substantial penalties must be assessed if the State teams making onsite inspections in mental hospitals and skilled and intermediate care facilities fail to review the care of a single patient. Under this amendment, a State would not be penalized for failure to meet this requirement, so long as the number of individuals in any one institution whose care was not reviewed did not exceed the lesser of two percent of the Medicaid population or ten patients (or one patient, in the case of a small institution).

EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 215 would provide that amendments made by sections 201 and 202 of the bill would be effective upon enactment, and that amendments made by sections 203 through 214 would be effective with respect to calendar quarters beginning on and after the first day of the first fiscal year for which sections 201 and 202 are in effect.

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. HEINZ, and Mr. CHAFEE):

S. 1551. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to provide for administrative appeals and judicial review under part B of Medicare; to the Committee on Finance.

FAIR MEDICARE APPEALS ACT

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today, I join my distinguished colleagues Senator HEINZ and Senator CHAFEE in introducing the "Fair Medicare Appeals Act of 1985" to bring Medicare's part B appeals process up to date by providing for the appeal of part B claim determinations beyond the level of the fiscal intermediary.

Mr. President, the Social Security Act already provides for judicial review for disputes regarding the entitlement to benefits under both parts A and B of the Medicare Program. However, judicial review for disputes regarding the amount of benefits is only allowed under part A, but not under part B.

The Medicare Program is undergoing dramatic upheaval. In just the past few years Congress has legislated major Medicare systems reform at a rate unprecedented in the Halls of Congress. Using the vehicles of competition and consumer choice we have introduced needed financial incentives to encourage the cost effective delivery of quality care to our Nation's 30 million elderly and disabled beneficiaries.

Congress has reformed the way Medicare pays for inpatient hospital services—setting a prospective price for services provided based on a list of 468 diagnosis related groups [DRG's]. We have given Medicare beneficiaries the option to use their Medicare entitlement to purchase coverage from private health plans—the new Medicare voucher legislation. And we have developed and implemented a new peer review system to closely monitor the quality of care provided to Medicare beneficiaries.

But in all this flurry of activity we've overlooked one very important part of the program that now sticks out like a sore thumb—the appeals process under Medicare's supplemental insurance program, part B.

Part B is Medicare's optional insurance program that provides coverage for basic noninstitutional services including physician visits, outpatient procedures, plus medical home health care and durable medical equipment. It's an important part of the Medicare Program with 98 percent of Medicare beneficiaries opting to enroll.

I was, therefore, surprised to learn that under current law, there is no provision for judicial review of claims disputed by Medicare's beneficiaries. For amounts of benefits over $100, appeals are heard only by a hearing officer who is not only appointed by the carrier, but employed by him as well. The decision made by the hearing officer is final. There is absolutely no further review provided Medicare beneficiaries beyond the carrier level.

The part B appeals process was modeled after AETNA's Federal employee health benefit plan. When part B was designed it was the thought that claims under part B were relatively small when compared to part A, Medicare's Hospital Insurance Program. It was the intent of Congress to limit judicial review of part B claims to prevent the needless overloading of the courts with minor claim disputes.

Yet the health care system is not the same system it was 20 years ago. We are moving away from hospital-based services, financed primarily under part A, to services provided in doctor's offices, hospital outpatient units and home health agencies—financed primarily under part B. Many factors are contributing to the shift from part A to part B.

Medicare's new hospital prospective payment system limits the amount it will pay hospitals for services provided on the prospectively determined prices, associated with the 468 diagnosis related groups [DRG's]. Hospitals now have new financial incentives which encourage them to discharge patients as soon as it is medically possible. This shift places greater demands on post-hospital service providers.

New and increasingly sophisticated advances in medical technology have made possible the performance of many surgical procedures on an outpatient basis. At the same time, Medicare's new peer review program is contributing to the growth in out-patient surgery by effectively reducing hospital admissions for procedures that can safely be performed in an outpatient setting.

The rationale used to preclude judicial review—that part B claims are relatively small when compared to part A—can no longer be justified. In fact, under Medicare's current reimbursement system, certain procedures can cost the Medicare Program more if performed on an outpatient basis compared to its inpatient hospital rate. For example, the fixed inpatient DRG payment for cataract surgery is about $1,500. For outpatient surgery, the average charge is $2,200 and can go as high as $4,500.

Last week I introduced the "Medicare Outpatient Surgery Savings, Access, and Quality Act" (S. 1489) to bring Medicare's payment of outpatient surgery into line with its true costs. S. 1489 establishes fixed prospective prices for outpatient surgery based on the same fixed prospective rate paid to ambulatory surgical centers and hospital outpatient settings. My bill will bring down the costs of surgical procedures paid for under part B. But, the trend toward the use of more part B covered services will obviously continue.

Finally, technological advances have contributed to the increased availability of and demand for home health medical services equipment making home health care a new service option for many who would otherwise be institutionalized.

All these factors have contributed to an increase in part B payments at the rate of about 20 percent per year. Forty-one percent of the increase in part B payments can be attributed to an increase in the volume of claims filed. At the same time, there has been a substantial increase in the number of part B appeals filed at the carrier level. According to a recent HCFA's carrier appeals report, carrier review requests increased by 35 percent from October to December in 1983 to the same quarter in 1984. In fact, the report states that the number of cases pending at the end of 1984—248,493—was the highest ever recorded.

We mustn't ignore the facts any longer. Use of part B covered services under Medicare is increasing. Beneficiary appeals of part B claim determinations are increasing. Yet, carriers are paying out less under their review determinations than ever before—$350,000 during October-December 1984 compared to $512,000 for the same period in 1983.

In addition to the lack of judicial review, the Health Care Financing Administration recently issued an intermediary manual change which took away the Medicare beneficiaries' option to be represented in an appeals hearing by their own physician. This was a major regulatory change in the administration of the Medicare Program that was never published or presented for public comment.

The reality of how the appeals process works for the average Medicare beneficiary disputing a part B claim determination clearly points to the need for reform.

Imagine youself a 70-year-old retired person who has just received a bill for $1,000, for relatively minor surgical procedure performed in your doctor's office. Upon submitting the bill for reimbursement, you find that Medicare will pay only half the charge. You are out $500.

You submit an appeal to the carrier to review your claim. After waiting for several months for a decision, the carrier denies your appeal, provides no explanation why your appeal was denied, plus correspondence from the carrier is written in a language you cannot understand. But that's it. You are stuck with the carrier's decision—under current law there is no appeal beyond the carrier.

Reform of the part B appeals process is needed to guarantee Medicare beneficiaries their right to due process. As Congress continues to reform the Medicare Program, we must closely monitor the quality of care being provided, the administration of benefits, and the appropriate payment of claims.

The "Fair Medicare Appeals Act of 1985" provides the following:

(1) Where the amount of dispute is between $100 and $500 beneficiary appeals will be settled by the carrier.

(2) Beneficiaries with disputes concerning a dispute greater than $500, but less than $1000, may appeal the claim determination to an administrative law judge appointed by the Department of Health and Human Services.

(3) Where the amount in dispute is greater than $1000, a beneficiary may appeal the administrative law judge's decision to the courts.

(4) Provides for the right of beneficiaries to choose representation by their providers in any of the appeals procedures under both Part A and Part B.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 1551 be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1551

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Fair Medicare Appeals Act of 1985."

AMENDMENTS TO SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

SEC. 2. (a) section 1869(a) of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting "or part B" after "part A".

(b) Section 1869(b) of such Act is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1)(C), by inserting "or part B" after "part A";

(2) in paragraph (2), by inserting after "$100" the following: "in the case of benefits under part A, or $500 in the case of benefits under part B"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(3) In the case of any hearing or judicial review conducted or requested pursuant to paragraph (1)(C), the beneficiary may allow the provider which furnished the services involved to act as such beneficiary's representative.

"(4) In determining the amount in controversy, the Secretary, under regulations, shall allow two or more claims to be aggregated if the claims involve the delivery of similar or related services to the same individual or involve common issues of law and fact arising from services furnished to two or more individuals.".

(c) Section 1842(b)(3)(C) of such Act is amended by striking out "$100 or more" and inserting in lieu thereof "at least $100, but not more than $500,".

(d) Section 1879(d) of such Act is amended by striking out "sections 1869(b)" and all that follows through "part (B)" and inserting in lieu thereof "sections 1869(b) and 1842(b)(3)(C), as may be applicable,".

(e) The amendments made by this Act shall apply to hearings and judicial review with respect to determinations under section 1869(a) of the Social Security Act made on or after the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today Senator DURENBERGER, Senator CHAFEE, and I are introducing legislation to improve the effectiveness and fairness of appeals and procedural protections available to Medicare beneficiaries. I am pleased to state that these amendments are supported by a broad-based coalition of beneficiary, provider, practitioner, and supplier organizations.

Congress has long recognized that the cost of medical care to the elderly can be enormous. For this reason, the Medicare Program was enacted, in 1965, to provide "help for old people who need assistance in meeting medical costs." The part B medical insurance program was created to provide security to all of the Nation's elderly faced with huge medical bills.

Part B of Medicare covers the costs of a variety of noninstitutional health care services. While most part B payments, which totaled $19.3 billion in fiscal year 1984, are for physician services, the program also covers many other services, such as outpatient laboratory tests, home health services, and durable medical equipment.

To deal with disputes that arise over the amount of payment due a beneficiary or provider of services under the Medicare Program, various appeal processes have been instituted. Unfortunately, under current law, part B beneficiaries whose claims are denied wholly or partially have had a very limited appeals process available to them. This has raised questions about whether the due process requirements of the Constitution have been met.

To begin to deal with this problem, I asked the General Accounting Office [GAO] in August of 1984 to review the current appeals process and due process protections for beneficiaries under part B of Medicare. That review was recently completed and I am releasing the GAO report today.

The GAO made two significant findings: First, with regard to the adequacy of the beneficiary appeals process under the due process principle of the Constitution, the GAO stated that their review of court decisions showed that courts have found the Health and Human Services Department's appeals procedures do not satisfy the requirements of due process.

Second, the GAO found that the Department's Health Care Financing Administration has not acted to implement GAO's 1980 and 1981 recommendations to improve protection against underpayments to beneficiaries because to do so would increase administrative costs and program payments. GAO stated that while it recognized that costs would increase, HCFA has an equally important obligation to pay for services that are covered in order to protect the elderly and disabled from inequitable out-of-pocket expenses.

For part B beneficiaries, as well as providers, the Medicare statute and recent court decisions have effectively precluded judicial review of part B programs and claims paid or not paid. Beneficiaries who receive low reimbursement for charges they have paid to their doctors may know that something is wrong, but are generally powerless to do anything about it.

Presently, a beneficiary may request an in-house paper review of unsatisfactory reimbursement, but the beneficiary plays no part in the process and must accept the result. Only if a dissatisfied claimant has a claim of more than $100 and expenses for a "fair" hearing is there any opportunity for direct examination of his or her file and a chance to express his or her side of the story. According to many claimant's attorneys, the "fair" hearing is mostly an exercise in arithmetic, with no opportunity to examine the underlying decisions and no further opportunity for review for disappointed beneficiaries.

A case in point is that of Mr. Salvatore Civello, a 69-year-old former truck driver from Ridgewood, NY. Mr. Civello paid his doctor $1,150 for the removal of a tumor. His initial Medicare reimbursement was $602.00. After he requested a review of that determination, he received an additional $353.00. The carrier never told him why or how these figures were derived.

The judge ruling in the case in which Mr. Civello was a plaintiff, stated that the language used in the review determination letter is "bureaucratic globbledegook, jargon, double talk, a form of officialese, federalese, and insurancese, and doublespeak. It does not qualify as English."

Mr. President, during fiscal year 1984, the beneficiaries' liabilities on unassigned claims for the difference between actual and allowed charges were almost $3 billion, up from $882 million in fiscal year 1978. And, as the GAO found in 1980, there is a high risk of underpayment in beneficiary submitted claims. This is illustrated by the fact that during fiscal year 1983, of 2,337,779 reviews conducted by carriers, 1,363,934, or 59 percent, were reversed. The vast majority of these reversals were made in favor of the beneficiary—68 percent—with awards to beneficiaries totaling $154,813,518. And carrier review requests are on the rise. They have increased dramatically—by 33.5 percent—from the last quarter in 1983 to the first quarter in 1984—576,448 to 769,557.

Mr. President, the legislation I am introducing today would give part B beneficiaries basic due process protections, without overburdening the courts with minor matters. Simply stated, it provides a hearing by an administrative law judge for any part B claim greater than $500. For disputes of more than $1,000 judicial review will be available if the beneficiary is not satisfied with the results of the administrative law judge review. It also allows beneficiaries to be represented in an appeals proceeding by their doctor or hospital.

Mr. President, this legislation is needed and it is needed now. Since the inception of the prospective payment system and DRG method of hospital payment, more medical services are being rendered in outpatient settings, thereby creating much larger part B bills than under the previous payment system. Already the percentage of claims submitted by beneficiaries is high and beneficiary liability for Medicare reasonable charge reductions is approaching $3 billion a year. For the individual beneficiary, living on a fixed income, close to the subsistence level, the losses may impose severe hardship and emotional strain.

Attorneys for beneficiaries have long complained that present procedures do not meet due process requirements, but the problems with the part B appeals process have not been fully resolved by the courts of this country. Our Nation's elderly Medicare beneficiaries are entitled to the due process protections afforded by the Constitution. This bill assures that they receive due process.

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues from Minnesota and Pennsylvania in introducing the Fair Medicare Appeals Act of 1985.

Under current law there is a difference between the manner in which disputes concerning the amount of benefits under part A and part B of Medicare are resolved. There is a two-track system for the appeal of carrier decisions. Under part A if a beneficiary has a dispute with a provider, he or she may appeal the decision by the carrier to an administrative law judge. If the dispute involves more than $1,000 the beneficiary may appeal the administrative law judge's decision through full judicial review. On the other hand, if there is a dispute under part B of the program, the beneficiary is entitled only to receive a hearing with a hearing officer who is not a lawyer, is employed by the carrier, and works out of a manual—with no consideration of case law or even previous decisions made by the carrier. The carrier's decision is final; there is no appeal.

This legislation would make four major changes in the part B appeals process. Disputes involving amounts between $100 and $500 will continue to be settled by the carrier. Disputes involving amounts between $500 and $1,000 will have recourse to a full hearing by an administrative law judge. If the amount in dispute is greater than $1,000, a beneficiary may appeal the administrative law judge's decision through full judicial review. Finally, all beneficiaries will have the right to choose representation by their providers in any appeals procedures under part A and part B.

The difference between these two appeal procedures was not a problem when the part B program was small. However, today with the increased complexity and increased number of claims the difference is difficult to justify.

The current part B appeals process was designed 20 years ago. It has been 13 years since Congress last took a serious look at Medicare appeals procedures and procedural protections. I believe it is time to reexamine the system and make much-needed reforms.

Part B of Medicare has become an integral part of health care for the elderly. Congress has added services under the program to address the changing needs of the elderly. With the advent of prospective payment system under part A of Medicare, beneficiaries rely heavily on the services offered under part B. That system has created pressures on hospitals to discharge patients sooner than in the past and consequently beneficiaries need the services of post-hospital providers, which are paid for through part B of the program, like physician and home health care services.

In addition to these demands, advances in medical technology have made possible the performance of many surgical procedures on an outpatient basis. Technological advances have also created increased availability and demand for beneficiaries to receive medical care in their homes rather than in hospitals or other institutional settings.

In short, the Medicare Program has changed dramatically in both structure and nature since its beginnings 20 years ago. Yet beneficiary and provider protections have not kept up with these changes. As Congress continues to reform and restructure the Medicare Program, our goals must be high quality of care, fair administration of benefits, appropriate payment of benefits, and a speedy and fair resolution of disputes. The Fair Medicare Appeals Act of 1985 will further these goals.●

By Mr. HEINZ:

S. 1552. A bill to amend the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 to establish a National Public Works Corporation for purposes of providing financial assistance to States and local governments for the construction, rehabilitation, and repair of certain public facilities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

NATIONAL PUBLIC WORKS CORPORATION ACT

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr President, today I send to the desk a bill entitled the "National Public Works Corporation Act of 1985." This measure is designed to preserve and enhance the national infrastructure by establishing a National Public Works Corporation for purposes of providing financial assistance to State and local governments for the construction, rehabilitation, and repair of public facilities.

Mr. President, although there is no precise definition of what constitutes the "national infrastructure," it would certainly include this country's 557,000 bridges, 3.9 million miles of roads and streets, 8,400 public libraries, 106,000 public elementary and secondary schools, 1,250 public colleges and universities, 43,000 dams, 3,100 courthouses, 4,200 parks, and 4,700 public airports. In addition, a complete catalog of the national infrastructure would include innumerable water systems, waste water treatment facilities, jails, ports, waterways, and levees. To borrow an eloquent description crafted by the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico, the national infrastructure may be summed up as "those things that make us a civilized and healthy society."

Regrettably, our national infrastructure has been deteriorating at an accelerating pace over the past several decades. According to Dr. Pat Choate, author of "America in Ruins" and perhaps the foremost expert in the United States on infrastructure investment, this country's public facilities are wearing out faster than they are being replaced, and are doing so at a time when the United States is seriously underinvesting in its public infrastructure. Dr. Choate reports that public works investment, measured in noninflated purchasing power—1972 dollars—fell from $30 billion in 1965 to $25 billion in 1984—a 17-percent decline. Measured against the value of the GNP, public works investment declined from 3.2 percent of the GNP in 1965 to 1.5 percent in 1984—a 52-percent decline. This underinvestment is the primary cause of America's public works deterioration.

Deterioration is evident in nearly every facet of the national infrastructure. The Congressional Budget Office notes that, by 1990, 41 of the Nation's 71 major airports will routinely experience peak-hour delays of 30 minutes due to antiquated traffic control systems. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers estimates that, of the 184 principal locks on the inland waterway system, more than 100 are more than 50 years old, the average lifespan of a lock; 54 of these aged locks need major attention immediately. The U.S. Department of Transportation reports that 120,000 of the Nation's 557,000 bridges are structurally deficient while another 121,000 are obsolete. The Federal Highway Administration reveals that fully half of the primary, secondary, and urban roads in the United States are listed in only fair condition.

In my home State of Pennsylvania, the need for infrastructure investment is particularly acute. More than 9,400 of Pennsylvania's 55,000 bridges are either structurally deficient or functionally obsolete; 765 dams, out of a total of 3,000 pose a potential threat to life and property. More than 900 sewerage projects costing over $3.5 billion must be constructed in order to enable Pennsylvania to meet the minimum requirements of the Federal Clean Water Act. Most, if not all, of Pennsylvania's municipal waste disposal facilities will have to be replaced or expanded in the next 10 years, before they are filled to capacity.

Increasing the amount of money invested in the national infrastructure is not only necessary, but makes good economic sense as well. As proof, I would cite the conclusions of a study commissioned by the Associated General Contractors of America. According to the AGC, a sustained investment program of, say, $10 billion a year for 6 years would cause production in most industries to rise 0.2 percent per year. The Nation's hardhit industries would enjoy production increases of 0.5 to 1.0 percent annually. Overall, a $60 billion, 6-year construction program would lead to an increase in employment of 1.92 million man-years over the length of the undertaking.

Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today is identical to H.R. 2818, a bill introduced in the House of Representatives on June 20, 1985 by Congressman WILLIAM CLINGER of Pennsylvania. This measure, titled the Public Works Corporation Act, establishes a revolving loan fund for purposes of enabling State and local governments to repair and replace badly-deteriorated bridges, roads, sewers, water lines, and other facilities which generate a dependable stream of income.

Let me take a few minutes to describe the substantive provisions of this legislation.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A CORPORATION

Under the terms of this act, a National Public Works Corporation would be established to oversee and administer a revolving loan fund jointly capitalized by the Federal Government and the several States. This corporation, to be controlled by a bipartisan board of directors, would handle all fiduciary matters connected with this fund, and would act on loan requests submitted by participating States. The quasi-independent corporation's review of loan requests would be limited to: First, financial matters regarding the integrity of the corporation's reserves, and, second, the technical and competitive aspects of the projects submitted for funding. The corporation will reject only those requests which threaten the solvency of the loan fund or which the corporation has determined to be extravagant or unworkable. Individual States will determine for themselves what priority to assign to projects submitted and how much money each will receive.

CAPITALIZATION AND RESERVE-FUND

The National Public Works Corporation Act authorizes the Federal Government to deposit with the corporation $2.5 billion, to be matched by a $2.5 million contribution from the participating States. This $5.0 billion stake will be placed in reserve and leveraged up to $50.0 billion through the sale of taxable bonds backed with the full faith and credit of the U.S. Government. All proceeds from the sale of such bonds would be placed in a National Infrastructure Loan Fund, from which interest-bearing loans can be made to State and local governments for the purpose of replacing and rehabilitating public facilities. At no time may the total amount of outstanding loans exceed 10 times the amount of capital held in reserve.

Although the States are required to collectively contribute $2.5 billion to the loan fund, the effect of the legislation in practical terms is to permit them to leverage 20 times that amount in project loan funds. Moreover, in recognition of the fact that different States have different fiscal capabilities, this measure allows States to set their own timetables for contributing their share of the loan fund reserves.

Participation in this program is voluntary. States choose the amount and timing of their contributions. The maximum contribution is limited to the figure that bears the same ratio to $2.5 billion as the State's population bears to the national population. For example, a State with 10 percent of the country's population may contribute up to $250 million to the loan fund. The Federal Government will match this contribution with an equal amount. Assuming the loan fund is fully capitalized, the State is then under the bill's formula, entitled to receive loans of up to $5.0 billion, depending on the size of the State's original contribution to the fund. As the loans are repaid, the State is entitled to second-generation funds for other projects it wishes to advance.

LOANS TO STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

The corporation is authorized to make loans to participating States and to units of local government within those States. States may request loans for amounts less than total estimated project-cost, if other funds are available from Federal and State grant programs, local entities, or private contributors. Loans are generally available for the construction, reconstruction, rehabilitation, or repair of any public facility. However, the repayment of the loan and the operation, maintenance, and replacement costs of the project must be tied to a guaranteed stream of revenues associated with the facility.

The interest rate charge on the loan will be based upon the cost of borrowing funds at the time the loan is granted and the corporation's administrative costs. Interest rates may be reduced across the board through a direct appropriation by Congress. This authority is to be used when high interest rates would make the cost of loans from the corporation an inordinate burden on borrowers.

The corporation may only approve loans that have the approval of the Governor of a participating State. The board shall ensure that the project is technically feasible and that awards are made on the basis of competitive bidding. The corporation is granted further powers to audit the borrower's compliance with the loan requirements and to take remedial actions when necessary.

51-059 O-86-32 (Pt. 16)

DEFAULTS

In the event of a default on the loan by a State and local government, half of the amount of the default would be charged against the State's portion of the loan fund reserve. A State may replenish its reserves within 2 years, but after that time, if the reserves go unreplenished, the amount of loans available to the State in the future would be substantially reduced.

Mr. President, this bill is not a panacea for the ills of the Nation's infrastructure. Nor is it a comprehensive program designed to replace all other infrastructure programs currently operating under the auspices of the Federal Government. However, the creation of a Natonal Public Works Corporation and revolving loan fund is a major step in the right direction and important precedent for the future. I urge my colleague to give this measure their careful scrutiny and enthusiastic support.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the National Public Works Corporation Act be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1552

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Public Works Corporation Act".

SEC. 2. Title II of the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE II—PUBLIC WORKS CORPORATION

"ESTABLISHMENT OF THE PUBLIC WORKS CORPORATION

"SEC. 201. There is established a body corporate to be known as the National Public Works Corporation (referred to in this title as the 'Corporation') which shall be an instrumentality of the United States and shall have succession until dissolved by Act of Congress.

"BOARD OF DIRECTORS

"SEC. 202. (a) The management of the Corporation shall be vested in a Board of Directors consisting of seven directors who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One director shall be appointed as Chairman and one director shall be appointed as Vice Chairman in accordance with subsection (b). Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, the term of each director shall be eight years. Any director appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired portion of the term. Any director may continue to serve as such after the expiration of the term for which he was appointed until his successor has been appointed and has qualified.

"(b) Of the members first appointed to the Board of Directors, one shall be appointed for a term of two years, one shall be appointed for a term of three years, one (who shall be appointed Vice Chairman) shall be appointed for a term of four years, one shall be appointed for a term of five years, one shall be appointed for a term of six years, one shall be appointed for a term of seven years, and one (who shall be appointed Chairman) shall be appointed for a term of eight years. Any person appointed as a director thereafter to fill the seat held by the Vice Chairman shall be appointed as Vice Chairman and any person appointed as a director thereafter to fill the seat held by the Chairman shall be appointed as Chairman.

"OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

"SEC. 203. (a) The Board of Directors of the Corporation shall appoint a President of the Corporation and such other officers and employees as it deems necessary to carry out the functions of the Corporation, subject to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and persons so appointed shall be paid in accordance with the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates. The President of the Corporation shall be an ex officio member of the Board of Directors and may participate in meetings of the Board except that he shall have no vote except in case of an equal division. No individual other than a citizen of the United States may be an officer of the Corporation. No officer of the Corporation shall receive any salary or other remuneration from any source other than the Corporation during the period of his employment by the Corporation.

"(b) No director, officer, attorney, agent, or employee of the Corporation shall in any manner, directly or indirectly, participate in the deliberations upon or the determination of any question affecting his personal interests, or the interests of any corporation, partnership, or association in which he is directly or indirectly interested.

"(c) The Chairman and Vice Chairman shall be compensated at the rate payable under level III of the Executive Schedule under section 5314 of title 5, United States Code. The other directors shall be compensated at the rate payable under level IV of the Executive Schedule under section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.

"(d) Not more than four directors serving at any time may be from one political party.

"(e) The Corporation shall not engage in political activities nor provide financing for or assist in any manner any project or facility involving political parties, nor shall the directors, officers, employees, or agents of the Corporation in any way use their connection with the Corporation for the purpose of influencing the outcome of any election.

"CORPORATE POWERS

"SEC. 204. (a) The Corporation shall have power—

"(1) to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal;

"(2) to make contracts;

"(3) to lease such real estate as may be necessary for the transaction of its business;

"(4) to sue and be sued, to complain and defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal;

"(5) to select, employ, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as shall be necessary for the transaction of the business of the Corporation;

"(6) to define the authority and duties of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and to dismiss at pleasure such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents;

"(7) to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its Board of Directors, bylaws, rules, and regulations governing the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the powers granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed together with provision for such committees and the functions thereof as the Board of Directors may deem necessary for facilitating its business under this title; and

"(8) to exercise, to the extent not inconsistent with the provisions of this title, the general corporate powers of a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the District of Columbia.

"(b) The Board of Directors of the Corporation shall determine and prescribe the manner in which its obligations shall be incurred and its expenses allowed and paid.

"(c) The Corporation shall be entitled to the free use of the United States mails in the same manner as the executive departments of the Government.

"(d) The Corporation, with the consent of any board, commission, independent establishment, or executive department of the Government, including any field service thereof, may avail itself of the use of information, services, facilities, officers, and employees thereof in carrying out the provisions of this title.

"PRINCIPAL OFFICE

"SEC. 205. The principal office of the Corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia.

"BORROWING AUTHORITY

"SEC. 206. (a) The Corporation may issue notes, debentures, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness in such amounts and on such terms and conditions as its Board of Directors may determine subject to the limitations prescribed in this title.

"(b) Except as provided in section 209(b) of this title, the aggregate outstanding indebtedness of the Corporation under this section at any time may not exceed ten times the reserve fund of the Corporation under section 207(a) of this title at that time.

"(c) The obligations of the Corporation issued under this section shall be guaranteed with the full faith and credit of the United States.

"(d) Any of the obligations issued by the Corporation may be secured by its pledging or granting of security interests in all or any part of its revenues or other receipts or all or any part of its assets.

"(e) Neither the Directors nor any other person executing obligations shall be subject to any personal liability or accountability by reason of the issuance thereof.

"(f) All obligations of the Corporation shall be negotiable instruments, subject only to any provisions for registration of ownership of obligations.

"CAPITALIZATION AND RESERVE FUND

"SEC. 207. (a) The capitalization of the Corporation shall consist of amounts appropriated pursuant to subsection (b) of this section and amounts contributed by participating States in accordance with subsection (c) of this section. The amount of the capitalization shall constitute a reserve fund which shall not be available for making loans under this title. The Corporation may invest any portion of the reserve fund which is not, in its judgment, required to meet current needs. Such investments may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States with maturities suitable for the needs of the Corporation. The interest on and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of any such obligation shall be credited to and form a part of the reserve fund.

"(b) There is authorized to be appropriated for the capitalization of the Corporation for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1985, not to exceed $2,500,000,000.

"(c) A State electing to participate in the Corporation may make contributions to the Corporation at such times and in such amounts as the State chooses. Except as provided in section 209(d) of this title, the total contributions of a State to the Corporation shall not exceed an amount equal to the amount which bears the same ratio to $2,500,000,000 as the population of such State bears to the population of all the States.

"LOANS TO STATES AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

"SEC. 208. (a) The Corporation is authorized to make loans to participating States and to units of local government located in participating States for projects for the construction, rehabilitation, and repair of public facilities in accordance with this section. Any such loan may be in an amount sufficient to pay for all or a portion of the cost of completing an approved project, except that the amount of any such loan may not be used for payment of the non-Federal share of the cost of any project for which a Federal grant is made.

"(b)(1) Except as otherwise provided in section 209(c) of this title, the total amount of the loans outstanding under subsection (a) of this section shall at no time exceed the aggregate outstanding indebtedness of the Corporation under section 206(b) of this title.

"(2)(A) Except as otherwise provided in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph and section 209(c) of this title, the total amount of the loans to a State and to units of local government within such State outstanding under subsection (a) of this section shall at no time exceed that amount which bears the same ratio to the total amount allowable under paragraph (1) of this subsection as the amount of contributions made by such State to the Corporation under section 207(c) of this title bears to the amount of contributions made by all participating States to the Corporation under section 207(c) of this title.

"(B) In no event shall the total amount allowable under subparagraph (A) for loans to a State and to units of local government in such State exceed the amount which would be allowable for loans to such State and such units under subparagraph (A) if (i) the full amount authorized by section 207(b) were appropriated, (ii) each State made the maximum contribution allowable to such State under section 207(c), and (iii) the Corporation incurred the maximum allowable indebtedness under section 206(b).

"(c) The Corporation may not make a loan for a project for a public facility unless the Corporation determines that the public facility after completion of the project will generate fees for the use of the facility in amounts sufficient to repay the principal and interest on the loan and to create a sufficient reserve for operation and maintenance of the project and for replacement costs over the useful life of the project. An applicant for a loan under this section shall demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Corporation that such applicant (or the agency or instrumentality for whom such applicant is applying under subsection (h)(1) or (h)(2)) has the legal authority to assess and collect such fees with respect to the project and that such fees will provide sufficient revenues to meet the requirements of the preceding sentence.

"(d) As a condition of any loan made under this title for a project for a public facility, the Corporation shall require that fees for the use of the facility be collected over the term of the loan in amounts sufficient to meet the requirements of subsection (c) and that all such fees be deposited in separate accounts (1) for the payment of principal and interest on such loan, and (2) for the payment of operation, maintenance, and replacement costs.

"(e) The Corporation may disapprove a loan application under this section for a project if it determines that the project is not feasible from an engineering standpoint, that the project will not generate revenues sufficient to satisfy the requirements of subsection (c) of this section, or that it is otherwise inconsistent with this title.

"(f) Each loan made under this title shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Corporation to be necessary to provide a return to the Corporation sufficient to pay for the Corporation's cost of borrowing funds and for the Corporation's administrative costs (including the costs of salaries of directors, officers, and employees).

"(g) The term of repayment for any loan made under this section shall not exceed the useful life of the project (as determined by the Corporation), except that in no event shall such term exceed twenty five years.

"(h)(1) The Governor of a State shall submit applications for loans for projects involving public facilities of such State or any agency or instrumentality of such State. In the case of any agency or instrumentality of two or more States, the Governors of such States shall jointly submit applications for loans for projects involving public facilities of such agency or instrumentality.

"(2) The responsible official of a unit of local government shall submit applications for loans for projects involving public facilities of such unit of local government or any agency or instrumentality of such unit. In the case of an agency or instrumentality of two or more units of local government, the responsible officials of such units shall jointly submit applications for loans for projects involving public facilities of such agency or instrumentality.

"(3) The Corporation shall not approve an application for a loan submitted by one or more units of local government within a State unless the Governor of such State has certified approval of the application.

"(4) The Governor of a State shall not submit applications for loans for such State and approve applications for loans for units of local government in such State in aggregate amounts which exceed the amount allowable for loans in such State under subsection (b)(2). Any application for a loan for a project for an agency or instrumentality of two or more States shall contain an agreement among such States as to the apportionment of costs among such States for purposes of this paragraph and section 208(b)(2).

"(5) The Governor of a State shall ensure a proper distribution of the funds allowable for loans in such State under subsection (b)(2) between urban and rural areas by selecting projects for submission under paragraph (1) and projects for approval under paragraph (2) so that the percentage of funds borrowed for projects in units of local government having a population of fifty thousand or more is not more than 5 per centum greater nor less than 5 per centum lower than the percentage of the State's population residing in units of local government having a population of fifty thousand or more. After the end of the two-year period beginning on the date the first loan is made under this title to a State or a unit of local government in such State, the Corporation shall only make a loan to such State or such a unit if, after taking into account that loan and all previous loans made to such State and such units, the Governor will be in compliance with the preceding sentence or will be more closely in compliance with the preceding sentence than before such loan was made.

"(i) As a condition of any loan under this title, the Corporation shall require that all contracts made with the proceeds of such loan be awarded on the basis of competitive bidding.

"(j) The Corporation shall conduct such audits as may be necessary to enforce this title. If the Corporation determines that fees are not being collected in sufficient amounts to meet the requirements of section 208(c) of this title, the Corporation shall notify the loan recipient of the amount by which such fees need to be increased. The Corporation shall not make additional loans to such recipient until the fees are so increased.

"(k) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Corporation for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1983, such additional sums as may be necessary to reduce interest rates paid by borrowers under this title. Any amount appropriated under this subsection for a fiscal year shall be applied uniformly, as determined by the Corporation, to reduce interest rates for all recipients of loans under this title during such fiscal year.

"DEFAULTS

"SEC. 209. (a)(1) If the Corporation determines that any loan is in default, the Corporation shall notify the recipient (and the State in which a unit of local government is located if such unit is the recipient) of such default.

"(2) During the period beginning on the date of such notification and ending on the earlier of the date such default is cured or the date which is two years after the date of such notification, the Corporation shall not make loans to such recipient and, in any case in which the recipient is a State, the Corporation shall not make loans to any unit of local government within that State.

"(3) If the recipient (or the State on behalf of a recipient which is a unit of local government) does not cure any default within two years after the date of notification under paragraph (1), the Corporation shall reduce the reserve fund established under section 207(a) by the amount of the loan which remains in default. Such amount shall be set aside for purposes of repaying the holders of the obligations issued under section 206 of this title.

"(b) A reduction in the reserve fund under subsection (a)(3) of this section shall not affect any outstanding obligation for purposes of applying the limitation on indebtedness under section 206(b) of this title. The Corporation shall not issue any obligation under section 206 of this title after such a reduction if the outstanding indebtedness of the Corporation after the issuance of such obligation exceeds an amount equal to ten times the reserve fund, as so reduced.

"(c) A reduction in the reserve fund under subsection (a)(3) of this section shall not affect any outstanding loan for purposes of applying the limitations on amounts allowable for loans under paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 208(b) of this title. Any reduction in the amount available for loans which results from such a reduction in the reserve fund shall first be applied to reduce the amount available for future loans to the State which is found to be in default and to units of local government within such State. To the extent necessary, after the amount available to such State and such units is reduced to zero, such a reduction in the reserve fund shall be applied to reduce the amount available for future loans to the other States and units of local government within such States in proportion to the contributions of each such State to the Corporation.

"(d) At any time after a reduction is made in the reserve fund under subsection (a)(3) of this section on account of a default by a State or a unit of local government in such State, such State may contribute all or a portion of the amount of such reduction to the reserve fund. Any additional amount of authority to make loans under section 208(b)(1) resulting from such contribution shall first be made available to States other than the State making such contribution and to units of local government in such States to the extent that the amount available to such other States and units was reduced under subsection (c) of this section, and any excess authority to make loans resulting from such contribution shall be made available to the State making such contribution and to units of local government in such State.

"TAXABLE STATUS

"SEC. 210. The Corporation, its property, its franchise, capital, reserves, surplus, security holdings, and other funds, and its income shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States or by any State or local taxing authority; except that (1) any real property and any tangible personal property of the Corporation shall be subject to Federal, State, and local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other such property is taxed, and (2) any and all obligations issued by the Corporation shall be subject both as to principal and interest to Federal, State, and local taxation to the same extent as the obligations of private corporations are taxed.

"AUDIT BY GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE

"SEC. 211. The General Accounting Office shall audit the financial transactions of the Corporation, and for this purpose shall have access to all its books, records, and accounts.

"ANNUAL REPORT

"SEC. 212. The Corporation shall submit an annual report to the Congress and the President as soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year on the status of the Corporation and its reserve fund. Each such report shall include a description of the projects for which loans were made during the preceding fiscal year.

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 213. For purposes of this title—

"(1) the term 'construction' means the actual building of a new public facility at a site where no similar facility previously existed, including the acquisition of land for such facility and nonstructural alternatives, and the reconstruction of a public facility at an existing site or adjacent to an existing site;

"(2) the term 'maintenance' means routine and regularly scheduled activities intended to keep a public facility operating at its designed specifications;

"(3) the term 'public facility' means any facility owned or operated by a State, a unit of local government, or an agency or instrumentality of one or more States or units of local government, including, but not limited to, highways, streets, bridges, mass transit facilities and equipment, airports, water supply and distribution systems, sewers, locks and dams, buildings, ports, waterways, and docks; except that such term does not include any highway on a Federal-aid system (as defined in title 23, United States Code);

"(4) the term 'rehabilitation' means the correction of structural flaws in a public facility so as to extend the design life of such facility;

"(5) the term 'repair' means the correction of a structural flaw in a public facility without adding significantly to the design life of such facility;

"(6) the term 'State' means the several States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas; and

"(7) the term 'unit of local government' means a city, county, town, township, parish, village, or other general purpose political subdivision of a State, and an Indian tribe.".●

By Mr. HATFIELD (for himself, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. STAFFORD, and Mr. KERRY):

S. 1553. A bill entitled the "Beverage Container Reuse and Recycling Act;" to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

BEVERAGE CONTAINER REUSE AND RECYCLING ACT

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, today I have the pleasure of introducing a bill aimed at the protection of our environment and resources, the Beverage Container, Reuse and Recycling Act. We can no longer afford to discard nearly 100 billion beverage containers annually—containers that are recyclable and reusable.

Each year, over 380 trillion Btu's of energy is expended in the manufacturing of beverage containers in the United States. Under this legislation, 70 to 130 Btu's would be saved. Through the mandatory deposit on beverage containers we will have the means to recycle 10.5 million tons of refuse each year. Presently nine States; including Oregon, Michigan, Maine, New York, Massachusetts, Iowa, Connecticut, Delaware, and Vermont, have laws similar to the one I am introducing in the 99th Congress, as I have each session since 1977. These States understand the importance and necessity of preserving our natural resources and eliminating waste of both those resources and our energy supply.

In 1980, the General Accounting Office [GAO] reported on four of the nine States which have refund and recycling systems. The report entitled, "States' Experience with Beverage Container Deposit Laws Show Positive Effects," found that an 80-percent reduction of beverage container waste could be realized. As a result, a 40-percent reduction in total litter is estimated. Another study conducted by New York State Commission found that roadside litter diminished as much as 30 percent, saving the taxpayer approximately $50 million per year. In addition, the GAO projected that a national law would create 97,100 new jobs nationwide.

The trend toward a national bottle bill has been displayed by American industry. A recent development, the reverse vending machine, is a system which enables consumers to feed empty beverage containers into a machine and in turn receive money or coupons. It meets the demands of supermarkets and convenience stores, entices even the most harried consumer, and has become a promising enterprise. This new technology is one more step toward increasing the efficacy of the act.

How will this law effect an already rushed consumer? In those States which have implemented beverage container laws, the public has shown overwhelming approval. In Oregon, for example, there is a 90-percent approval rate, while Vermont has 97 percent public support. The law does not infringe on any citizen's covenience. The consumer still has the option of discarding containers, but will have paid for the decision to do so. Instead the law provides an incentive for those who choose to participate in the recovery of resources, saving scarce energy, and maintaining a clean environment.

We have languished too long in the wastefulness of a throwaway society, frivolously using our natural resources. We cannot continue to live in this fashion. The choice is clear, conservation or plunder, we must give value for value. As stewards of the Earth, the consumption of our resources must be balanced with renewal whenever possible. This bill is not only a substantive step in that direction, but a symbolic one as well. It will serve to end the flip-top, snap-tab, throwaway society.

Oregonians, as well as several other States, have demonstrated that a beverage container law can work. It is now essential for the entire Nation to share in the responsibility of protecting our environment. It is my hope that the 99th Congress will adopt such legislation. I ask that the text of the Beverage Container Reuse and Recycling Act appear at this point in the text.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1553

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Beverage Container Reuse and Recycling Act".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 2. Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the failure to reuse and recycle empty beverage containers represents a significant and unnecessary waste of important national energy and material resources;

(2) the littering of empty beverage containers constitutes a public nuisance, safety hazard, and esthetic blight and imposes upon public and private agencies unnecessary costs for the collection and removal of such containers;

(3) empty beverage containers constitute a significant and rapidly growing proportion of municipal solid waste, disposal of which imposes a severe financial burden on local governments;

(4) the reuse and recycling of empty beverage containers would eliminate these unnecessary burdens on individuals, local governments, and the environment;

(5) a uniform national system for requiring a refund value on the sale of all beverage containers would result in a high level of reuse and recycling of such containers;

(6) a national system for requiring a refund value on the sale of all beverage containers would result in significant energy conservation and resource recovery;

(7) a national system for requiring a refund value on the sale of all beverage containers would be anti-inflationary and would help create jobs in areas of commerce; and

(8) a national system for requiring a refund value on the sale of all beverage containers would be inexpensive to administer because of its self-enforcing nature.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this Act, the term—

(1) "beverage" means beer or other malt beverage, mineral water, soda water, or a carbonated soft drink of any variety in liquid form and intended for human consumption;

(2) "beverage container" means a container designed to contain a beverage under pressure of carbonation;

(3) "refundable beverage container" means a beverage container which has clearly, prominently, and securely affixed to, or printed on, it (in accordance with section 4) a statement of the amount of the refund value of the container;

(4) "consumer" means a person who purchases a beverage in a beverage container for any use other than resale;

(5) "distributor" means a person who sells or offers for sale in commerce beverages in beverage containers for resale;

(6) "retailer" means a person who purchases from a distributor beverages in beverage containers for sale to a consumer or who sells or offers to sell in commerce beverages in beverage containers under pressure of carbonation to a consumer. The Administrator shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to establish what person is a retailer with respect to the sale of beverages in beverage containers under pressure of carbonation to consumers through beverage vending machines;

(7) "Administrator" means the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency;

(8) "commerce" means trade, traffic or transportation—

(A) between a place in a State and any place outside thereof;

(B) within the District of Columbia or any territory of the United States; or

(C) which affects trade, traffic, commerce, or transportation described in subparagraph (A) or (B); and

(9) "State" includes the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, or any territory or possession of the United States.

REQUIRED BEVERAGE CONTAINER LABELING

SEC. 4. No distributor or retailer may sell or offer for sale a beverage in a beverage container under pressure of carbonation unless there is clearly, prominently, and securely affixed to, or printed on, it (in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Administrator) a statement of the amount of the refund value of the container, such amount being not less than 5 cents.

RETURN OF REFUND VALUE OF BEVERAGE CONTAINERS

SEC. 5. (a)(1) If a consumer tenders for refund an empty and unbroken refundable beverage container to a retailer or distributor who sells (or has sold at any time during the period of three months ending on the date of such tender) a brand of beverage which was contained in the container, the retailer or distributor respectively shall promptly pay the consumer the amount of the refund value stated on the container.

(2) If a retailer tenders for refund an empty and unbroken refundable beverage container to a distributor who sells (or has sold at any time during the period of three months ending on the date of such tender) a brand of beverage which was contained in the container, the distributor shall promptly pay the retailer—

(A) the amount of the refund value stated on the container, plus

(B) an amount equal to 2 cents per container to help defray the retailer's cost of handling.

The payment amount specified in clause (B) may be adjusted by the Administrator, following evaluation and public comment, to reflect the true cost of recycling beverage containers. This paragraph shall not preclude a retailer from tendering refundable beverage containers to persons other than distributors.

(b) The opening of a refundable beverage container in a manner in which it was designed to be opened and the compression of a metal refundable beverage container shall not, for the purposes of this section, constitute the breaking of the container if the statement of the amount of the refund value of the container is still readable.

RESTRICTIONS ON METAL BEVERAGE CONTAINERS WITH DETACHABLE OPENINGS

SEC. 6. No distributor or retailer may sell or offer for sale a beverage in a metal beverage container a part of which is designed to be detached in order to open such container.

PREEMPTION OF STATE AND LOCAL LAW

SEC. 7. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, no State or political subdivision thereof may establish or continue in effect any law respecting a refund value of beverage containers sold with a beverage under the pressure of carbonation to the extent the Administrator determines the law is inconsistent with this Act.

(b) No State or political subdivision thereof may, for the purposes of determining the amount of any tax imposed by such State or subdivision on the sale of any refundable beverage container, take into account any amount charged which is attributable to the refund value of such container.

(c) Subsection (a) does not prevent a State or political subdivision thereof from establishing or continuing in effect any law respecting a refund value on containers other than for beverages or from regulating redemption and other centers which purchase refundable beverage containers from retailers and consumers.

PENALTIES

SEC. 8. Whoever violates any provision of sections 4, 5(a), or 6 shall be fined not more than $1,000 for each violation.

EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 9.(a) Except as otherwise provided in subsections (b) and (c), this Act shall take effect on the date of its enactment.

(b) The provisions of sections 4, 5, and 7 shall apply with respect to beverage containers sold or offered for sale in interstate commerce on or after two years after the date of enactment of this Act.

(c) The provisions of section 6 shall apply with respect to beverages in beverage containers sold or offered for sale in interstate commerce on or after one year after the date of enactment of this Act.

(d) The provisions of section 7(a) shall preempt State and local laws to the extent to which they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act only on and after the respective effective dates of such provisions.●

By Mr. FORD (for himself, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. PELL, Mr. NUNN, Mr. GARN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. ZORINSKY, and Mr. GORE):

S. 1556. A bill to provide for 2-year Federal budget cycle, and for other purposes; pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, referred jointly to the Committee on Governmental Affairs and the Committee on the Budget.

BUDGET PROCEDURES IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I was delighted to learn last night that the chairmen of the Senate Budget and Governmental Affairs Committees have now publicly announced their intention to hold joint hearings on the subject of 2-year budget bills and other proposals to improve the Federal budget process. In view of this action I am today introducing, for myself and a number of cosponsors, a 2-year budget bill virtually identical to those bills which I have been introducing in the Senate since September 1981.

I look forward to those hearings and I express the sincere hope that out of these hearings will emerge from the appropriate committees a 2-year budget bill with such other improvements as the members of those committees deem desirable, so that the Senate and the House of Representatives can take definite action to put in place the 2-year budget and appropriation cycle.

As I have said many times before, on this floor and elsewhere, a 2-year budget and appropriation cycle won't begin to solve all of our many problems related to Federal spending and revenues. But, such a change will make some modest but important improvements in the budget and appropriation process.

We will gain precious time. Clearly recent experience shows that it is impossible in these complex times to complete annual appropriations in an orderly manner. With our available time essentially doubled we should be able to do the job better, and also gain time to do needed oversight work.

The results of 2-year appropriation cycles should also benefit the Nation by permitting State governments to plan earlier with more certainty. Also, we should gain a new measure of economic stability throughout the public and private economic sectors.

Mr. President, when we return from the August recess we will have less than a month to complete the 1986 appropriation bills before the new fiscal year begins. As of today not one regular 1986 appropriation bill has been completed and enacted.

The need for a 2-year budget cycle becomes painfully more evident with the passage of each year. I sincerely hope we will not have to wait much longer for corrective action by Congress and the President.

Mr. President, I now send the 2-year budget bill to the desk and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1556

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, this Act may be cited as the "Budget Procedures Improvement Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds and declares that the present annual Federal budgeting process—

(1) allows insufficient time for the fulfillment by the Congress of its legislative and oversight responsibilities;

(2) allows insufficient time for the review and consideration by the Congress of authorizing legislation, budget resolutions, and appropriation bills and resolutions and other spending measures;

(3) allows insufficient time for the evaluation of costly and complicated Federal programs, and thereby contributes to the unrestrained growth of the Federal budget; and

(4) allows insufficient time for agencies and State and local governments to plan for the implementation of programs.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to establish a more thorough and timely process for the adoption of the Federal budget by—

(1) establishing a two-year cycle for the adoption of the budget;

(2) requiring the separate and distinct consideration of authorizing legislation, the budget, and appropriation bills and resolutions and other spending measures and thereby allowing full evaluation of the need for and the merits and costs of the various programs and agencies of the Federal Government;

(3) strengthening congressional procedures for the consideration of budget resolutions, reconciliation bills and resolutions, appropriation bills and resolutions, and other measures providing spending authority; and

(4) strengthening the requirement for congressional oversight of Federal programs by authorizing committees.

(q)(1) Title IV of such Act (2 U.S.C. 651 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"REPORTS

"SEC. 405. (a)(1) The reports required by sections 301(c), 302(b), 308(b), and 308(c) shall contain the tables described in subsection (b).

"(2) Any—

"(A) concurrent resolution on the budget reported by the Committee on the Budget of the Senate or the House of Representatives under section 301, 304, or 310 of this Act; and

"(B) bill or resolution reported by a committee of the Senate or the House of Representatives which provides, modifies, or terminates budget authority or spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C), or which contains or modifies estimates of budget outlays, shall be accompanied by a report containing the tables described in subsection (b). The conference report on any bill or resolution described in clause (A) or (B) of the preceding sentence shall be accompanied by a joint statement of the managers containing such tables.

"(b)(1) The tables required by subsection (a) shall set forth estimates of budget authority, spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C), and budget outlays for each of the accounts (to which the report, bill, or resolution referred to in such subsection pertains) which are set forth in the Budget Accounts Listing contained in the Budget of the United States Government submitted by the President pursuant to subsection (a) of section 1105 of title 31, United States Code, during the Congress in which the report referred to in subsection (a)(1) is made or the bill or resolution described in subsection (a)(2) is reported. If any such report, bill, or resolution contains provisions involving budget authority, spending authority, or outlays for which accounts have not been included in such Budget Accounts Listing, the estimates therefor in the table required by this subsection shall be set forth in account records with account identification codes assigned by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office.

"(2) The tables described in paragraph (1) which are required to be included in the reports required by sections 301(c), 302(b), 308(b), and 308(c), and in the reports accompanying any concurrent resolution on the budget reported under section 301, 304, or 310 shall also set forth estimates for the budget authority and spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) which will become available without further congressional action and estimates of the outlays that will result from such budget authority and spending authority. With respect to the reports required by sections 301(c) and 302(b), the estimates described in the preceding sentence are only required for the accounts or portions of accounts relating to the subject matter within the legislative jurisdiction of the committee submitting the report.".

(2) The table of contents in section 1(b) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 404 the following new item:

(r) Section 904(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (2 U.S.C. 621(b)) is amended by inserting "or any provision of a first concurrent resolution on the budget requiring a procedure pursuant to section 301(b)(2)" after "title III or IV".

AMENDMENTS TO TITLE 31, UNITED STATES CODE

SEC. 5. (a) Section 1101 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) 'two-fiscal-year budget period' has the meaning given to such term in paragraph (6) of section 3 of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (2 U.S.C. 622(6))".

(b) Section 1104(c) of title 31, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" after the subsection designation;

(2) by striking out the last sentence thereof; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) The budget submitted pursuant to section 1105 for the 2-fiscal-year budget period beginning on October 1, 1988, and the estimates of outlays and proposed budget authority required to be submitted under section 1109 for such 2-fiscal-year budget period, shall be set forth in the same accounts which are set forth in the Budget Accounts Listing contained in the budget submitted for fiscal year 1987 under section 1105. Any change in the accounts used in the budget submitted under section 1105 for the 2-fiscal-year budget period beginning on October 1, 1988, or any succeeding 2-fiscal-year budget period, or in the estimates of outlays and proposed budget authority required under section 1109 for any such 2-fiscal-year budget period, from the accounts set forth in the Budget Accounts Listing contained in the budget submitted under section 1105 for fiscal year 1987 or the preceding 2-fiscal-year budget period, as the case may be, shall be made only in consultation with the Committees on Appropriations, the Committees on the Budget, and the committees having legislative jurisdiction over the programs or activities which will be affected by such changes. The provisions of this paragraph do not prohibit the inclusion of new accounts in the Budget Accounts Listing contained in the budget submitted pursuant to section 1105 solely for purposes of presenting estimates for new programs.".

(c)(1) So much of section 1105(a) of title 31, United States Code, as precedes paragraph (1) thereof is amended to read as follows:

"(a) By January 15 of each odd-numbered year, beginning with 1987, the President shall transmit to the Congress, the budget for the 2-fiscal-year budget period (as defined in section 3(6) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (2 U.S.C. 622(6))) beginning on October 1 of the succeeding calendar year. The budget transmitted under this subsection shall include the President's Budget Message, summary data and text, and supporting detail. The budget shall set forth in such form and detail as the President may determine—".

TITLE AND STYLE OF APPROPRIATION ACTS

SEC. 6. Section 105 of title 1, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 105. Title and style of appropriation Acts

"(a) The style and title of all Acts making appropriations for the support of the Government shall be as follows: 'An Act making appropriations (here insert the object) for the 2-fiscal-year budget period ending September 30 (here insert the even-numbered calendar year.).'.

"(b) All Acts making regular appropriations for the support of the Government shall be enacted for a 2-fiscal-year budget period, and shall specify the amount of appropriations provided for each fiscal year in such period.

"(c) For purposes of this section, the term '2-fiscal-year budget period' has the same meaning as in section 3(6) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (2 U.S.C. 622(6)).".

AMENDMENTS TO THE LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1946

SEC. 7. (a) Section 136(a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 is amended—

(1) by striking out "Congress" in the matter preceding paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "Senate and the House of Representatives";

(2) by striking out "its" each place it appears in paragraphs (1) and (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "their";

(3) by inserting "(except the Committees on Appropriations, the Committees on the Budget, the House Committee on House Administration, the House Committee on Rules, and the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct)" after "Representatives" in the matter following paragraph (2); and

(4) by striking out the second and third sentences thereof.

(b) Section 136 of such Act is further amended by striking out subsections (b) and (c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new subsections:

"(b) During the period beginning on January 15 of each odd-numbered year and ending October 1 of the following year, each standing committee of the House of Representatives and the Senate to which subsection (a) applies shall review and study—

"(1) the application, administration, execution, and effectiveness of those laws (or parts of laws) the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of that committee, and in order to determine whether such laws and the programs thereunder are being implemented and carried out in accordance with the intent of the Congress and whether such programs should be continued, modified, or eliminated. During such period, each such committee shall also review and study any conditions or circumstances which may indicate the necessity or desirability of enacting new or additional legislation within the jurisdiction of that committee (whether or not any bill or resolution has been introduced with respect thereto). Such committee may carry out the required reviews and studies by contract, or may require a Government agency to do so and furnish a report thereon to the committee. Such committees may rely on such techniques as pilot testing, analysis of costs in comparison with benefits, or provision for evaluation after a defined period of time. The findings and determinations made by each such committee from its oversight activities under this section in any year shall be reported to the House of Representatives or the Senate no later than October 1 of such even-numbered year, and shall constitute the basis for such committee's legislative work during the succeeding Congress.

"(2) the organization and operation of the Federal agencies and entities having responsibilities in or for the administration thereof,

"(c) To assist a standing committee in carrying out its responsibilities under this section, the head of each Federal agency which administers the laws or parts of laws under the jurisdiction of such committee shall provide to such committee such studies, information, analyses, reports, and assistance, including the requests for appropriations and the justifications therefor submitted by the agency to the President pursuant to section 1108 of title 31, United States Code, as may be requested by the chairman and ranking minority member of the committee, except that such request and justifications for a 2-fiscal-year budget period shall not be submitted under this subsection until after the day the President transmits the Budget to the Congress under section 1105 of such title for such period.

"(d)(1) To assist a standing committee in carrying out its responsibilities under this section, the head of any agency shall furnish without charge to such committee computer tapes or discs, together with explanatory documentation, containing information received, compiled, or maintained by the agency as part of the operation or administration of a program, or specifically compiled pursuant to a request in support of a review of a program, as may be requested by the chairman and ranking minority member of such committee.

"(2) The Committee on House Administration of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate shall prescribe rules and regulations for their respective Houses which will minimize duplication of requests under paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(e) Within thirty days after the receipt of a request from a chairman and ranking minority member of a standing committee having jurisdiction over a program being reviewed and studied by such committee under this section, the Comptroller General of the United States shall furnish to such committee summaries of any audits or reviews of such program which the Comptroller General has completed during the preceding six years.

"(f) Consistent with their duties and functions under law, the Comptroller General of the United States, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office, the Director of the Office of Technology Assessment, and the Director of the Congressional Research Service shall furnish to each standing committee of the Senate or the House of Representatives such information, studies, analyses, and reports as the chairman and ranking minority member may request to assist the committee in conducting reviews and studies of programs under this section.

"(g) This section does not require the public disclosure of matters that are specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and are in fact properly classified pursuant to such Executive order, or which are otherwise specifically protected by law. This section does not require any committee of the Senate to disclose publicly information the disclosure of which is governed by Senate Resolution 400, Ninety-fourth Congress, or any other rule of the Senate.".

AMENDMENTS TO RULES OF SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SEC. 8. (a) Paragraph 8 of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate is repealed.

(b)(1) Clause 4(a)(1)(A) of rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by inserting "odd-numbered" after "each".

(2) Clause 4(a)(2) of rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by striking out "such fiscal year" and inserting in lieu thereof "the 2-fiscal-year budget period in which such fiscal year occurs".

(3) Clause 4(b)(2) of rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by striking out "fiscal year" and inserting in lieu thereof "2-fiscal-year budget period".

(4) Clause 4(f) of rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by striking out "annually" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "biennially".

(5) Clause 4(g) of rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended—

(A) by striking out "March 15 of each year" and inserting in lieu thereof "May 15 of each odd-numbered year";

(B) by striking out "fiscal year" the first place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "2-fiscal-year budget period"; and

(C) by striking out "that fiscal year" and inserting in lieu thereof "each fiscal year in such ensuing 2-fiscal-year budget period".

(6) Clause 4(h) of rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by striking out "fiscal year" and inserting in lieu thereof "2-fiscal-year budget period".

(c)(1) Clause 2(l)(1)(C) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended—

(A) by striking out "fiscal year" and inserting in lieu thereof "2-fiscal-year budget period";

(B) by striking out "that year" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "that 2-fiscal-year budget period";

(C) by inserting "for each fiscal year in that 2-fiscal-year budget period" after "committee's recommendations";

(E) by inserting "for each such fiscal year" before "in the most recently".

(2) Clause 4(a) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by striking out "fiscal year if reported after September 15 preceding the beginning of such fiscal year" and inserting in lieu thereof "2-fiscal-year budget period if reported after August 1 of the year in which such 2-fiscal-year budget period begins".

(d) Clause 2 of rule XLIX of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by striking out "fiscal year" and inserting in lieu thereof "2-fiscal-year budget period".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 9. The provisions of this Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect the first day of the One-hundredth Congress, except that—

(1) the amendments made by section 5(i) of this Act shall take effect on November 9, 1986; and

(2) the provisions of section 10 of this Act shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

FISCAL YEAR 1988

SEC. 10. (a) Notwithstanding the amendments made by sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 of this Act, the President shall submit to the Congress a budget for fiscal year 1988, and the estimates of outlays and proposed budget authority that would have been required under section 1109 of title 31, United States Code (as such section was in effect on November 8, 1986). The provisions of section 201 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921 (now 31 U.S.C. 1105), as such provisions were in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act, shall apply to the submission by the President of the budget for fiscal year 1988. The provisions of section 1109 of title 31, United States Code (as such provisions were in effect on November 8, 1986) shall apply with respect to the submission of such estimates by the President.

(b) Notwithstanding the amendments made by sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 of this Act, the Congress shall complete action on the concurrent resolutions on the budget that would have been required for fiscal year 1988 under the provisions of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 as such provisions were in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act. The provisions of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (as such provisions were in effect on the day before the date of enactment of this Act) shall apply with respect to concurrent resolutions on the budget for fiscal year 1988, bills and resolutions providing new budget authority or new spending authority for fiscal year 1988, and bills and resolutions authorizing the enactment of new budget authority for fiscal year 1988, except that—

(1) the provisions of section 301(b)(1) of such Act (as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act) shall not apply with respect to fiscal year 1988, and the provisions of section 301(b)(2) of such Act (as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act) shall not apply with respect to fiscal year 1988 to the extent that such provisions are inconsistent with clause (2) of this subsection;

(2) it shall not be in order in the Senate or the House of Representatives to consider any first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1988 required by section 301 of such Act (as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act) if such concurrent resolution on the budget—

(A) directs any committee to determine and recommend changes in bills, laws, or resolutions; or

(B) includes any matter with respect to any subject other than budget outlays, budget authority, the surplus or deficit in the budget, revenues (including off-setting receipts and off-setting collections), or the level of the public debt.

(3) prior to the adoption of the second concurrent resolution on the budget required for a fiscal year under section 310(a) of such Act (as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act), it shall not be in order in the Senate or the House of Representatives to consider under section 304 of such Act (as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act) any concurrent resolution on the budget revising the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget for such fiscal year if the concurrent resolution making such revisions—

(A) directs any committee to determine and recommend changes in bills, laws, or resolutions; or

(B) includes any matter with respect to any subject other than budget outlays, budget authority, the surplus or deficit in the budget, revenues (including offsetting receipts and offsetting collections), or the level of the public debt.

(4) bills and resolutions providing new budget authority for fiscal year 1988 or new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of such Act for fiscal year 1988 shall not be enrolled until the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act (as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act) for such fiscal year has been agreed to, and if a reconciliation bill or reconciliation resolution, or both, are required to be reported under section 310(c) of such Act (as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act) for such fiscal year, until Congress has completed action on that bill or resolution, or both;

(5) it shall not be in order in the Senate or the House of Representatives to consider any concurrent resolution on the budget required under section 310(a) of such Act (as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act) for fiscal year 1988 if such concurrent resolution directs any committee to determine and recommend changes in laws, bills, and resolutions directly or indirectly authorizing the enactment of new budget authority for fiscal year 1988;

(6) it shall not be in order in the Senate or the House of Representatives to consider any reconciliation bill or resolution for fiscal year 1988 or any amendment thereto or any conference report thereon which changes any provision of law other than provisions of law which—

(A) provide new budget authority or spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of such Act;

(B) relate to revenues; or

(C) specify the amount of the statutory limit on the public debt.

(7) section 405 of such Act, as added by section 4(q) of this Act, shall apply with respect to fiscal year 1988; and

(8) section 1104(c)(2) of title 31, United States Code, as added by section 5(b) of this Act, shall apply with respect to fiscal year 1988.

By Mr. METZENBAUM:

S. 1557. A bill to provide the public with information concerning the use of products containing aspartame, to provide for the conduct of studies to determine the health effects of using products containing aspartame, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

ASPARTAME SAFETY ACT

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill entitled "the Aspartame Safety act of 1985." I consider this legislation the absolute minimum that Congress needs to do in order to protect the health and safety of the 100 million American consumers who are using this chemical sweetner under its better-known brand name of "Nutrasweet."

In 1984, Americans consumed over 7 million pounds of aspartame, which is equivalent to 1.4 billion pounds of sugar. This year we will consume over 20 billion cans of diet soft drinks, the vast majority of which are 100 percent Nutrasweet. We had better be sure that the questions which have been raised about the safety of this product are answered.

I must say at the outset, this product was approved by the FDA in circumstances which can only be described as troubling. The FDA originally approved aspartame in 1974. However, that decision was stayed after concerns were raised about health and safety problems. In March of 1976 a special FDA task force released its report on testing practices at GD Searle Co., the manufacturer of aspartame. That report contained the following conclusions:

At the heart of FDA's regulatory process is its ability to rely upon the integrity of the basic safety data submitted by sponsors of regulated products. Our investigation clearly demonstrates that, in the G.D. Searle Company, we have no basis for such reliance now.

Through our efforts, we have uncovered serious deficiencies in Searle's operations and practices which undermine the basis for reliance on Searle's integrity in conducting high quality animal research to accurately determine or characterize the toxic potential of its products.

". . . The studies we investigated reveal a pattern of conduct which compromises the scientific integrity of the studies."

Now, Mr. President, one might ask what does a 1976 report on testing practices at G.D. Searle have to do with aspartame, a chemical sweetner approved by the FDA in 1981? The answer is simple. Over 90 percent of the tests submitted by G.D. Searle to the FDA in order to get aspartame approved were submitted prior to March 1976, when the report was issued. In addition, of the 25 Searle tests examined by the FDA task force, 11 were tests done on aspartame. One of the major questions hanging over the approval process is this question of how the FDA resolved the issues raised by its own task force in 1976. There are serious questions about the quality of tests used to approve this chemical sweetner.

Mr. President, the questions do not stop with the 1976 task force report. For in 1977, the FDA wrote to the U.S. attorney in Chicago requesting a grand jury investigation of G.D. Searle Co. I quote from the letter sent by the chief counsel of the FDA, Richard Merrill:

We request that your office convene a grand jury investigation into apparent violations of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act . . . and the False Reports to the Government Act, by G.D. Searle and Company and three of its responsible officers for their willful and knowing failure to make reports to the Food and Drug Administration required by the Act, and for concealing material facts and making false statements in reports of animal studies conducted to establish the safety of the drug Aldactone and the food additive Aspartame.

In 1980, the FDA established a public board of inquiry on aspartame. What did they conclude? "The Board has not been presented with proof of a reasonable certainty that Aspartame is safe for use as a food additive under its intended conditions of use."

In May 1981, 2 months before the FDA Commissioner, Arthur Hayes, approved aspartame for use in dry foods, three FDA scientists informed the Commissioner that they did not believe that aspartame had been proven safe beyond a reasonable doubt. They questioned the reliability of key brain tumor tests which were submitted by G.D. Searle. These three FDA scientists comprised half of the so-called "Commissioner's Team" which was set up to advise the Commissioner on aspartame approval.

Despite all the questions raised by the chronology I have outlined, the FDA Commissioner decided to approve aspartame in July of 1981. He later approved aspartame for use in soft drinks in July 1983.

In May of this year I asked the GAO to undertake a full investigation of the aspartame approval process. That investigation is now under way and I have high hopes that it will shed some light on the questions surrounding the Commissioner's decision to approve this product.

Pending the completion of that report, however, there are a number of steps which Congress should take with relation to aspartame. The bill I am introducing today outlines the minimum steps I feel are necessary.

The bill mandates that independent tests on aspartame be conducted under the auspices of the National Institutes of Health. These tests will focus on the general effects which aspartame has on brain chemistry as well as the specific behavioral and neurological reactions experienced by individuals—headaches, mood alterations, memory loss et cetera.

The tests will also examine the health effects of aspartame on pregnant women and fetuses and whether aspartame consumption can lower the threshold for seizures. Another important area for investigation is how aspartame reacts to medicines particularly MAO inhibitors which are used in the treatment of depression, dopa used in the treatment of Parkinson's disease, and aldomet used in the treatment of hypertension.

Under the bill, there will be a moratorium imposed on new uses of aspartame in foods and drugs pending the completion of independent test or for the period of 1 year—whichever comes sooner.

There are credible questions which have been raised by eminent scientists, regarding aspartame.

Dr. Richard Wurtman of MIT has examined questions relating to aspartame's effect on brain chemistry, Dr. William Pardridge of UCLA has expressed his concerns about fetal IQ, Dr. Elsas of Emory University has warned us about groups in the population at high risk from large concentrations of phenylalanine in the blood. Dr. Matalon at the University of Illinois is particularly concerned about individuals who are genetically susceptible to phenylalanine—PKU carriers—and who may be a sizable risk group as far as aspartame is concerned. Nearly 5 million Americans are PKU carriers.

Two researchers in Philadelphia, Profs. Gautieri and Mahalik, have done studies on mice which show that aspartame affected the vision of newborn mice whose mothers had been exposed to the chemical sweetner.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reports and statements concerning these scientists be placed in the RECORD following my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, one final point concerning tests. The Journal of the American Medical Association recently published a report on aspartame which, with some significant disclaimers, stated it was safe for most people. I wish that this report could ease my concerns. It does not. It merely restates the FDA position which relies solely on the tests conducted by G.D. Searle. As I have indicated, these tests are under a cloud. In addition, the concerns raised recently by the scientists I mentioned above were not even considered in the report.

Mr. President, the FDA is content to have the manufacturer of aspartame, G.D. Searle, conduct these studies. How absurd. We do not need the people who are making millions of dollars on aspartame telling us it's safe.

Has the FDA forgotten that in 1977 it sought to have a grand jury investigation into allegations that Searle conducted fraudulent tests on aspartame? Doesn't anyone in the agency know they are presently considering prosecuting that company for withholding information on adverse effects from another one of their drugs, Theo-24?

It is a sad fact that the current FDA is a mere shadow of what that agency used to be. Now it is more of a handmaiden to the food and chemical industry than it is a defender of the health and safety of American consumers.

In addition to mandating independent tests, my bill will require labeling which will inform consumers how much aspartame they are ingesting. This information is important not only for consumers who wish to regulate their intake of aspartame but also for physicians who may be treating individuals who feel they have experienced side effects. Such side effects are likely to be dose related and the physician will want to know how much aspartame has been consumed. In addition, consumers have a basic right to know the makeup of the foods which they consume.

The label will also contain the maximum allowable daily intake established by the FDA. How many consumers even know that the FDA has attached such a limit to aspartame consumption? The current ADI is 50 mg per kg. of body weight. It was originally 20 mg/kg. However, in 1983 the FDA decided to ignore its standard 100-fold safety factor by more than doubling the maximum allowable daily intake. Why did they decide to make an exception for aspartame? In 1983, they approved aspartame for soft drinks, so they decided to increase the limit knowing consumption was bound to increase. The justification the FDA used for violating its standard 100-fold safety factor was that the tests showed it was safe at the new levels of consumption. And guess who was responsible for all the tests—G.D. Searle Co., of course.

I intend to fully investigate the manner in which the FDA altered its safety standard for this product. In the meantime, consumers have a right to know at least that some such standard exists. Sure, if you weigh 130 pounds you would have to drink 4 to 5 liters of diet soft drink to hit the limit. But if you are a child who weighs 30 pounds, you hit that limit with 3 to 4 cans of diet soft drink. That's even without the gum, pudding, breakfast cereal—all sweetened with aspartame.

Under this bill, the Secretary will be responsible for deciding how best to express the ADI on the label so consumers can understand what it means. For example, on diet soft drinks the label might read: "Maximum Allowable Daily Intake: 3 cans per 25 lbs. of body weight." There may be better ways to express this concept. The Secretary can work on that but consumers have a right to this information particularly since the advertising for this product has left the impression that everyone in the population, including children, can consume as much as they want of this chemical sweetener and still remain within the standard FDA recommended range of a 100-fold safety factor.

My bill designates one other labeling requirement. The label will advise that aspartame is not intended for infant feeding.

Mr. President, I would like to quote from an FDA document dated February 28, 1980:

> Nevertheless, in consideration of the remote possibility that a parent might use aspartame as a non-sugar sweetener in the infant formula or food, there may be some merit in the inclusion of a statement on the label to the effect that aspartame-containing foods are not intended for use in infant feeding. Such labeling may provide added assurance that aspartame will not be fed to infants.

Did the FDA ever follow up on this recommendation? Of course not. Too troublesome for industry. How remote is the possibility that a parent will give nutrasweet to a child? A little diet coke in a bottle? Some pudding? A little kool-aid? Maybe some cereal?

This bill ensures that parents will know that aspartame-containing foods are not intended for infant feeding.

Finally, Mr. President, my bill will establish a Clinical Adverse Reaction Committee within the FDA. Consumers who feel they have experienced side effects from aspartame should have the right to have their complaint investigated.

The FDA claims such complaints have declined to almost zero. Isn't that interesting. What the FDA doesn't tell us is that since February of 1984, G.D. Searle has not forwarded any complaints they have received to the FDA. In addition, we learn that the FDA informed its regional office to forward only "serious complaints," for example, a complaint severe enough to require the attention of a physician. And did the FDA notify physicians that they were interested in collecting and analyzing reports of adverse reactions to aspartame? Absolutely not. So how are physicians to know they should even be notifying the FDA of such reports? The only notification physicians around the country have received is a medical bulletin from G.D. Searle quoting the FDA that aspartame is completely safe.

Now, however, the FDA has informed myself and Senator HEINZ that they are considering establishing a Clinical Adverse Reaction Committee to collect and evaluate reports of side effects.

This bill makes it easy for the FDA. It mandates the FDA to collect and study reports of side effects and to alert physicians around the country that they are interested in knowing about such reactions.

Only then can we get an accurate picture of the problem.

Mr. President, I said at the outset this bill represents a minimum response to the FDA which recently sent me a letter rejecting proposals for labeling and informing me that G.D. Searle's tests are insufficient to settle the questions raised.

To put it mildly, that response was totally unsatisfactory. We have an agency desperately attempting to explain away its unwillingness to protect the safety of American consumers. Clearly, at today's FDA politics and ideology come before the public health.

I know there are career FDA personnel who are committed to doing a good job. They are trying to be honest and professional. Their task is becoming impossible under the weight of leadership which has raised political interference to an art form. On the issue of aspartame, as on the issue of food dyes and infant formula, there are those of us in Congress who will not rest until this agency meets its responsibilities to the American consumer. That, I can promise.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, the letter, and scientific studies mentioned during my remarks, and other supporting materials be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1557

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Aspartame Safety Act of 1985".

LABELING REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 2. (a) Section 403 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(q)(1) If it contains aspartame, unless its label and labeling—

"(A) specify the total number of milligrams of aspartame contained in each serving;

"(B) specify the allowable daily intake of aspartame (in milligrams) for each kilogram of human body weight, as established by the Secretary; and

"(C) bear the following statement: 'THIS PRODUCT CONTAINS ASPARTAME, WHICH IS NOT INTENDED FOR USE IN INFANT FEEDING' ".

"(2) The Secretary shall by regulation require that the information required by subparagraph (1)(B) to be specified on the label and labeling of any food containing aspartame be included on such label and labeling in a manner which is the most useful to individuals who consume such food.

"(3) The statement required by subparagraph (1)(C) shall be located in a conspicuous place on the label and labeling of each food containing aspartame as proximate as possible to the name of such food and shall appear in conspicuous and legible type in contrast by typography, layout, and color with other printed matter on such label and labeling.".

(b)(1) Section 502 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(u)(1) If it is a drug containing aspartame, unless—

"(A) its label and labeling—

"(i) specify the total number of milligrams of aspartame contained in each dosage;

"(ii) specify the allowable daily intake of aspartame (in milligrams) for each kilogram of human body weight, as established by the Secretary; and

"(iii) bear the following statements: 'THIS PRODUCT CONTAINS ASPARTAME, AND IS NOT INTENDED FOR USE BY INFANTS 'PHENYLKETONURICS: CONTAINS PHENYLALANINE'; and

"(B) the manufacturer, packer, or distributor (including all retail establishments) thereof includes in all advertisements and other printed and descriptive matter issued or caused to be issued by the manufacturer, packer, or distributor with respect to such drug the information described in clauses (A)(i) and (A)(ii) and the statements specified in clause (A)(iii).".

"(2) The Secretary shall by regulation require that the information required by subparagraph (1)(A)(ii) to be specified on the label and labeling of drugs containing aspartame be included on such label and labeling in a manner which is the most useful to individuals who consume such drugs.

"(3) The statements required by subparagraph (1)(A)(iii) shall be located in a conspicuous place on the label and labeling of each drug containing aspartame as proximate as possible to the name of such drug and shall appear in conspicuous and legible type in contrast by typography, layout, and color with other printed matter on such label and labeling.".

(2) The first sentence of section 503(b)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "and (1)," and inserting in lieu thereof "(1), and (u)(1)(B),".

MORATORIUM

SEC. 3. During the period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act and ending—

(1) on the date which is one year after the date of enactment of this Act, or

(2) the date on which all studies required under section 4 are completed, whichever is earlier, the Secretary of Health and Human Services (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") shall not approve or permit any use of aspartame in any food or drug if such use was not approved or permitted on the date of enactment of this Act.

RESEARCH

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary, through the Director of the National Institutes of Health, shall request proposals for, and make grants and enter into contracts for the conduct of, clinical studies on aspartame, including studies concerning—

(1) the effect of the consumption of aspartame on brain chemistry;

(2) the health effects of the consumption of aspartame on pregnant women and fetuses;

(3) behavioral and neurological effects experienced by individuals who have consumed aspartame, especially children who have consumed aspartame;

(4) the interaction of aspartame with drugs, including monoamine oxidase inhibitors, alpha-methyldopa, and L-dihydroxyphenylalanine; and

(5) the effect of the consumption of aspartame in increasing the probability of seizures.

(b) In making grants and entering into contracts under subsection (a), the Secretary shall provide for the completion of the studies required under such subsection within one year after the date of enactment of this Act.

(c) To carry out this section, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary.

(d) The authority of the Secretary to enter into contracts under this section shall be to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in appropriated Acts.

CLINICAL ADVERSE REACTION COMMITTEE ON ASPARTAME

SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary, through the Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, shall establish a Clinical Adverse Reaction Committee on Aspartame. The Committee shall collect reports of individual reactions to the consumption of foods containing aspartame, including reports of reactions from individuals taking various medications, and shall evaluate and prepare appropriate responses to such reports.

(b) The Secretary shall announce the establishment of the Committee under subsection (a) through the mailing of written notices to physicians and other health care providers and through advertisements in medical journals and in publications read by the general public. Such advertisements shall include the telephone number of the telephone service established pursuant to subsection (c).

(c) The Secretary shall establish a telephone service for the reporting by individuals of reactions to the consumption of products containing aspartame. Calls on such telephone service shall be without charge to the caller.

SCIENTISTS SUGGEST NUTRASWEET LINK TO BRAIN DAMAGE

(By Geogory Gordon)

WASHINGTON (UPI).—Two pediatric and genetic researchers say many pregnant women who consume aspartame, the popular sugar substitute sold as NutraSweet in soft drinks and 70 other products, may have babies with permanent brain damage.

In a contention rejected by NutraSweet's manfacturer, one of the scientists, Dr. Louis Elsas of Emory University in Atlanta, also said he believes a key aspartame component can cause similar damage to infants if they ingest it in the six months following birth.

"There's no reason why the pregnant female should be taking aspartame," Elsas said, "and there's no reason why a child less than six months old should be taking aspartame. Period." He said the damage may not show up for years.

Meanwhile, lawyers for a 5-year-old boy who a research team said became "unconsolably and wildly emotional" after drinking NutraSweet products have filed a $2 million damage suit against the product's manufacturer, G.D. Searle Co. of Skokie, IL.

The suit, filed three weeks ago in Washington, charges that aspartame is an "unreasonably dangerous and harmful food additive" that causes permanent effects when combined with glucose and given to children under six years old.

It was disclosed last month the General Accounting Office is investigating the manner in which Commissioner Arthur Hull Hayes of the Food and Drug Administration approved aspartame in 1981 over the objections of several agency scientists who challenged brain tumor studies.

Officials of G.D. Searle, which last year sold more than $600 million in NutraSweet for diet soft drinks and other products, dismiss all the allegations and criticisms of aspartame. They assert the product has undergone the most extensive testing of any food additive ever approved by the FDA.

"I think quite clearly, the data on aspartame does support the safety of the product," Roger Thies, Searle's associate general counsel, said in a recent interview.

Dr. Lewis Stegink, a professor of pediatrics and biochemistry at the University of Iowa who, with funding from Searle, performed some of the pivotal studies that supported FDA approval, said, "Am I concerned about the safety? The answer is no. Would I like to see additional studies done? Of course. That's what science is all about."

Dr. Richard Guall, vice president for nutrition and medical affairs of Searle's NutraSweet group, said aspartame "has no adverse effects on the behavior of children" with the exception of a select group who are alerted to the contents in warning labels.

Elsas, director of medical senetics at Emory, and Dr. Reuben Matalon, professor of pediatrics and senetics at the University of Illinois Medical School, have yet to publish any findings that specifically refer to aspartame. But both said they have extensively studied a key component of the sweetener—phenylalinine—and that they consider it a hazard for fetuses and infants.

The scientists said in interviews that they approached Searle in the 1970s about their concerns, but that they believe company-sponsored studies of aspartame have not adequately tested the substance for its effects on the human fetus.

"The don't want to listen," Elsas said. "The people at Searle would like to have you think that nothing happens as long as the phenylalinine level is below the tenfold elevation level" that is the FDA's safety standard.

Elsas said that besides pregnant mothers, he is concerned about aspartame ingestion by newborn babies and young children who eat diet gelatins and puddings. He called Searle's studies on phenylalinine "a whitewash anecdote" that has received no scientific peer review. Elsas also noted that women who consume the substance while nursing could present a similar risk to their babies because the extent of phenylalinine in mother's milk has yet to be investigated.

Elsas and Matalon said consuming even moderate amounts of NutraSweet raises the concentration of phenylalinine in the blood. Matalon said he was "not too concerned" about older children consuming aspartame because the effects on them should be "reversible" through dietary changes.

Matalon, who began a study April 1 with a grant from the National Institutes of Health, said that one in 50 women are particularly sensitive to high phenylalinine consumption and if they ingest aspartame during pregnancy "it may cause birth defects" such as mild retardation. He said the defects would be a matter of concern because 8 to 10 million American women are believed to be sensitive to phenylalinine.

The affected women, Matalon said, are known as "carriers" of PKU—phenylketonuria—a disease resulting in reduced IQ's in babies. If not put on a special diet, PKU infants will suffer severe mental retardation as they grow, he said.

Although the FDA requires all aspartame products to carry a warning for PKU victims, no warnings is required for carriers, those who do not have the disease but have one PKU gene and are susceptible to phenylalinine.

The problem is complicated because carriers generally are not identified unless they have PKU offspring. "We don't know them and they don't know themselves," Matalon said.

Matalon, head of the PKU clinic at the University of Illinois, said he was concerned about studies showing that any rises in phenylalinine levels from aspartame consumption would still be within safe limits. Matalon said those studies are "not based on a lot of experiments."

He said Searle did not adquately test the levels and effects of breakdown products—known as metabolites—of phenylalinine in the body.

Gaull and Stesink, however, defended Searle's testing and said it shows that even at "abuse levels"—extremely heavy consumption of aspartame—the phenylalinine levels in the blood do not rise significantly.

Gaull also said the levels of phenylalinine quickly drop. He said that while PKU carriers "have less ability to metabolize" than those with the disease, "it is not limiting in their abililty to fully metabolize" the substance.

Consumption of aspartame, he argued, results in increases in blood phenylalinine levels "no greater than the increase in concentration after a meal . . . consisting of a hamburger and a milkshake."

Elsas, who already had published one study on humans, said he believes the potential danger extends to all present women who regularly consume aspartame, and possibly to young children who may experience behavioral and neurological disorders if they drink or eat aspartame.

Elsas said a woman who drinks one can of a soft drink sweetened with aspartame may experience a four-fold increase in her blood phenylalinine level. As a result, he said, the concentration found in the fetus can reach a level four times as high as the prospective mother's, because the chemical concentrates on the fetal side.

"Now the fetus's brain is growing, and that phenylalinine interferes at critical movements of brain cells, and that child could come out with severe mental retardation that's unrelated to anything you could measure after birth," Elsas said.

"I'm concerned that this could be a major health hazard that has been totally unexplored."

Gaull called Elsas's findings "incorrect," contending the fetus concentrates phenylalinine only at about 1.5 times the level in the mother.

Stegink called Elsas's projections of blood phenylalinine "totally impossible" but acknowledged no research has been conducted on the effect of aspartame on pregnant women.

The Washington lawsuit is based on research by Dr. Keith Conners of D.C. Children's Hospital, who said "Stephen," a 5-year-old boy "repeatedly ran full force into the wall, knocking himself to the floor, crying, and repeating the performance until we was restrained," after consuming aspartame.

The suit seeks $2 million in negligence and liability damages from Searle due to the alleged immediate adverse effects and long-term damages to a child's neurological, or brain, nervous and motor systems.

Asked about the suit, Gaull said, "The bottom line is that aspartame has no adverse effects on children. In view of the fact that this case is in litigation, I don't want to comment on it."

Stephen's doctors allege his injuries, subject of one of numerous complaints about NutraSweet to the Centers for Disease Control, include psychotic neurosis and other neurologic and psychiatric disease and side effects, ranging from behavioral changes to nightmares.

Negligence charges, that the company failed to test aspartame, failed to warn of its possible dangers, and failed to report "adverse studies regarding the safety and efficacy of aspartame," also were lodged.

Conners, a specialist in hyperactivity and neurologic disorders in children, would not comment on his research concerning aspartame. But in testomony to Congress, he said, "we are inclined to believe that the clear results . . . conclude that aspartame (and-or its vehicle) are causing deviant behavior of quite severe proportions in this boy."

"The FDA has never required adequate neurological pediatric testing to determine this kind of reaction on children. And to allow this on the market without testing it on kids is a crime," Aaron Levine, a lawyer representing Stephen, said.

Although Searle officials maintain the product is safe, four company-sponsored tests—investigating aspartame's possible effect on hyperactivity and seizures in children, seizures in adults, and headaches—are under way.

STUDY ON MICE SHOWS ASPARTAME PROBLEMS, RESEARCHERS SAY

PHILADELPHIA (AP).—Two researchers are calling for further studies into the effects on pregnant women of the artificial sweetener aspartame, saying that their study using mice showed that offspring had trouble with their eyes.

Aspartame is sold as a sugar substitute under the trade name Equal and as an additive under the name Nutrasweet.

"We don't advocate stopping the use of aspartame, but we do think there is a need for more studies on its use by pregnant women," said Ronald F. Gautieri, professor of pharmacology at the Temple University School of Pharmacy.

Gautieri and Michael P. Mahalik, assistant professor of pharmacology at the Philadelphia College of Osteopathic Medicine, reported their findings in a recent issue of Research Communications in Psychology, Psychiatry and Behavior.

In their study, the eyes of newborn mice whose mothers were not exposed to aspartame began focusing 20 days after birth. Babies born to pregnant mice fed 1 gram of the sweetener per kilogram of their weight took 2 days longer to focus, and 4 grams extended the focusing time to 4 days.

"Something affected the neurosensory system," Gautieri said.

In the last year, a growing number of researchers have warned pregnant women to avoid aspartame because of unknown consequences to fetuses.

"Something could happen over the long term," Mahalik said. "We feel that byproducts of aspartame somehow affect the process of myelimization, the sheath that covers nerves.

"We think the study supports the previously-stated opinion that aspartame could affect some brain functions."

The Food and Drug Administration and the National Centers for Disease Control, reacting to more than 500 consumer complaints of headaches, dizziness, and insomnia, have said tests reveal no problems with the sweetener. But the CDC also said it did not examine any possible problems relating to pregnancy.

The National Institutes of Health is conducting a 3-year study on aspartame.

The FDA's acceptable daily intake of the sweetener is 3 grams for a person weighing 130 pounds. That is equivalent to six quarts of soda containing NutraSweet or 150 packets of Equal.

GAO INVESTIGATING NUTRASWEET APPROVAL

(By Gregory Gordon)

WASHINGTON (UPI).—The General Accounting Office is investigating the manner in which the Food and Drug Administration approved the popular artificial low-calorie sweetener aspartame in 1981 over the objections of several agency scientists, it was disclosed Wednesday.

The inquiry was begun at the request of Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, who said in a letter last week to Comptroller General Charles Bowsher that there were "serious deficiencies" in tests more than a decade ago on the product—marketed as NutraSweet by the G.D. Searle & Co.

Officials of G.D. Searle, a Skokie, IL.-based firm that last year sold more than $600 million in aspartame, said Wednesday they are absolutely convinced the product, widely used in diet soft drinks, is safe.

They acknowledged they have commissioned eight new studies on the effects of the sweetener on humans, including whether it may be linked to intense headaches, seizures in children and adults and hyperactivity in children—all subjects of hundreds of consumer complaints filed with the Centers for Disease Control.

Dr. Gerald Gaull, vice president for nutrition and medical affairs of Searle's NutraSweet group, said the FDA had concluded the company's earlier studies were sound. He said Searle is conducting new tests, four of which should be completed by early next year.

"If there is a real problem we'd better be the first ones to know because we're going to need some lead time to correct it, take the product off the market, or whatever," Gaull said.

James Turner, a Washington consumer lawyer who has challenged the FDA's approval process that began in the early 1970s, asserted that "Searle's undertaking of these new tests is an admission that this product has not been shown to be safe for marketing."

Turner is appealing a federal court lawsuit aimed at forcing the FDA to hold public hearings on the safety of aspartame.

Internal government memoranda obtained by the United Press International show that Commissioner Arthur Hull Hayes of the Food and Drug Administration overruled several agency scientists in approving G.D. Searle's application to market aspartame in 1981.

Three of six scientists on the "Commissioner's Team on Aspartame" said on May 18 and 19, 1981, that tests they had reviewed did not prove the product's safety with "reasonable certainty of no harm," as required by FDA regulations, according to agency memos obtained by UPI intern Joshua Meyer.

Metzenbaum last week asked the FDA to require labels showing the amount of aspartame a product uses; to ensure that "focused clinical tests" take place; and to commission a qualified independent lab to repeat the animal tests questioned by the FDA researchers.

In his letter to Bowsher, he said that "very serious questions have been raised regarding this approval process, questions which must be resolved if consumers are to have complete confidence in the safety of aspartame."

GAO officials confirmed that Congress' investigative arm is following up on Metzenbaum's request for an inquiry into:

The validity of G.D. Searle's tests on brain tumors in rats, challenged in 1975 for being sloppy and unscientific by an FDA task force and criticized again by the three scientists on the panel advising Hayes.

Why Hayes overruled the FDA-appointed Public Board of Inquiry, which opposed the approval of aspartame in 1980 on grounds the brain tumor studies were inadequate. Walle Nauta, chairman of the board of inquiry, has indicated the panel may have opposed the approval even more strongly had it known that G.D. Searle planned to widely market it in soft drinks. Nauta has said that a different set of tests should have been conducted for soft drink use.

Roger Thies, Searle's associate general counsel, asserted in an interview Wednesday that the likelihood aspartame would be used in carbonated beverages was made clear to the board and that the dosages tested proved safety of aspartame as a food or beverage additive. He said. "It would be almost inconceivable to me that somebody could drink enough (diet) soft drink in a day to go beyond the consumption levels that we have shown to be safe."

Hayes' decision to overturn the board of inquiry based on a summary of a "Japanese study" submitted after the board's decision. The study, UPI learned, was conducted by the Ajinomoto Co., Inc., the Japanese licensee of Searle's aspartame patent. Turner has alleged that Hayes had no legal basis to rely on a study that was not part of the administrative record.

The extent the FDA evaluated the concerns of Dr. Richard Wurtman of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who raised questions with the FDA regarding the effects of aspartame on brain chemistry, and Dr. William Pardridge of UCLA, who suggested women who consume aspartame may give birth to infants with lower I.Q. levels.

Whether officials of the Carter White House, Reagan White House or Reagan transition team discussed aspartame approval with FDA officials. Thies denied that Searle Chairman Donald Rumsfeld, a former top aide to President Gerald Ford, had any contact with White House or FDA officials about aspartame after joining the firm in 1977.

The same tests questioned by FDA scientists continue to be the foundation of proof of safety relied on by the agency in approving NutraSweet.

Gaull contended that aspartame, the three components of which are aspartic acid, phenylalanine and methanol, is "the most tested product ever approved by the FDA."

The Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta recently issued a report on the side effects of aspartame on humans, asking the FDA to start "focused, clinical studies" on the product's safety on "an expedited basis."

Two-thirds of 200 complaints reviewed in the report were considered adverse neurological or behavioral reactions—anxiety, seizures, extreme headaches, dizziness, severe depression and mood swings.

Other reactions consumers have blamed on the sweetener include the formation of benign skin tumors, menstrual irregularities and many other problems.

Thies said a small segment of the 100 million Americans who have tried aspartame products may have a "sensitive or allergic reaction, or idiosyncratic reaction" to aspartame.

In opposing aspartame approval, three of the six FDA scientists advising Hayes focused on G.D. Searle's brain tumor studies and concluded that aspartame "has not been shown to be safe and therefore may not be approved for marketing," the term head wrote in 1981.

One of the three, Dr. Satya Dubey, said in a letter to team leader Joseph Levitt that "statistical results obtained so far point out many problems . . . and some of them may be considered serious."

Also objecting were Dr. Robert Condon and Dr. Douglas Park, the staff science adviser for the FDA Office of Health Affairs.

Gaull said that although "three internal scientists raised questions about the brain tumor studies and the statistics on that, there is nothing new about the fact that not everyone agrees within a regulatory agency on every decision."

A SWEETENER'S EFFECTS: NEW QUESTIONS RAISED

(By Marian Burros)

In 1984, G.D. Searle & Company of Skokie, Ill. sold $600 million worth of the artificial sweetener aspartame, on which it holds the exclusive United States patent. Produced under the trademark NutraSweet as a food additive and Equal as a table-top sweetener, aspartame is found in a wide variety of products—from puddings, bubble gum and breakfast cereals to some of the best known diet soft drinks marketed by Coca-Cola, Pepsi and Seven-Up.

Recently, however, aspartame has been the target of criticism from several scientists conducting studies of the sweetener or its components. While their findings are not conclusive, preliminary data have indicated that aspartame may be responsible for a range of problems from temporary dizziness to mental retardation.

Their contentions are strongly denied by Searle, which has done its own studies on aspartame in the past and is conducting new ones. "When any new product is marketed and attention is called to it, people tend to ascribe any adverse experience to that new product," said Dr. Frank M. Sturtevant, a pharmacologist who is director of the office of scientific affairs at Searle. "We expected a lot more in the way of complaints than we got: only 600 out of 70 million people who have used it."

Aspartame has been controversial since Searle first sought to market it in 1974. After considerable debate about its safety, the sweetener was approved by the United States Food and Drug Administration in 1981. But this spring questions about its effects began to surface again.

In May, the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources received testimony from two researchers favoring quantitative labeling of products containing aspartame. In accordance with Federal law, it is now listed on labels as an ingredient; no amount is specified. Dr. William Pardridge, an associate professor of medicine at the University of California at Los Angeles, said that too much of the artificial sweetener might cause subtle brain changes in young children. Dr. Richard J. Wurtman, director of the clinical research center at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, said that consuming aspartame with carbohydrates might double aspartame's effect on the brain.

On June 17, Dr. Louis Elsas, director of the division of medical genetics at Emory University in Atlanta, said that neither pregnant women nor infants under the age of 6 months should consume aspartame because of the chance of brain damage to the fetus or infant.

Dr. Sturtevant, who calls these contentions "at best, highly speculative," says dozens of tests done by Searle prove the safety of aspartame. Dr. Sanford Miller, director of the F.D.A.'s Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition, says that the claims against aspartame are unfounded. And the American Diabetics Association has reaffirmed its faith in aspartame, saying that F.D.A.'s studies "appear sufficient to demonstrate its safety."

Since the marketing of aspartame four years ago, the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta has received over 600 complaints from people who said they suffered dizziness, headaches, blurred vision or grand mal seizures (a type of epilepsy) after consuming aspartame. The centers called for studies to determine individual sensitivity to the sweetener.

On May 23, a $2 million lawsuit was filed against Searle in United States District Court in Washington on behalf of a 5-year-old boy in Olney, Md. The suit charged that consumption of NutraSweet caused irreversible brain damage, but it did not specify the amount consumed.

In granting approval of aspartame—which is 180 to 200 times sweeter than sugar with only one-tenth of the calories—Dr. Arthur Hull Hayes Jr., the F.D.A. Commissioner in 1981, overruled several of the agency's scientists and an independent public board of inquiry set up to evaluate the Searle studies of aspartame's effect on animals. These scientists said that the company's research did not adequately answer the safety questions about carcinogenicity. According to Congressional testimony from Dr. Alexander M. Schmidt, a former F.D.A. Commissioner, some of the experiments were "poorly conceived, carelessly executed or inaccurately analyzed or reported."

After a recent review of the Searle studies, Dr. M. Adrian Gross, a senior science adviser at the Environmental Protection Agency and a former pathologist at the F.D.A., wrote to the office of Senator Howard M. Metzenbaum, a member of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources. His letter said that despite the shortcomings of the experiments, "at least one of those studies has established beyond any reasonable doubt that aspartame is capable of inducing brain tumors in experimental animals."

In a telephone interview, Dr. Sturtevant asserted that some of the data presented to Dr. Gross for review were incorrect. The correct tabulations, he contended, were contained in a document that he wrote for the board of inquiry impaneled by the F.D.A. The document showed, he said, "that there is no statistically significant increase in brain tumors in experimental animals."

Aspartame-sweetened foods now carry a warning directed at phenylketonurics—people who are unable to metabolize phenylalanine, one of two amino acids that make up aspartame. Victims of phenylketonuria, or PKU, will become permanently retarded if the condition is not diagnosed at birth and consumption of phenylalanine strictly controlled.

According to Dr. Elsas, about 2 percent of the population are carriers of the PKU gene and are unaware of the condition. He has expressed concern about the effects of phenylalanine on unborn children of PKU carriers.

"A small change in the phenylalanine level in a pregnant woman's blood is magnified by the placenta into the fetal blood, and the fetal brain will concentrate that further," Dr. Elsas explained. "High levels of phenylalanine in unformed or forming brains could cause irreversible damage. No one knows what degree of elevation in the mother's blood may cause brain damage in the fetus."

Dr. Elsas's concern is based on two studies of the effects of phenylalanine on two groups of people—10 in each group ranging in age from 8 to 24—who have PKU but have developed normally. In these studies, the first of which was published in the Journal of Clinical Investigation in January, Dr. Elsas observed that the patient's reaction time was affected and the production of adrenalinlike chemicals in the brain was reduced.

The second study, just completed, confirms the first, he said, adding, "All of the brain changes were reversible within a three-week period, but it took longer for full mental functions to return."

Dr. Elsas said that anybody over the age of 6 months should consume "aspartame in moderation, and if they have symptoms, they should get their phenylalanine blood level checked."

Dr. Sturtevant says that Dr. Elsas "is scaring people unnecessarily." "It is not physically possible for an unknown PKU carrier to maintain a phenylalanine blood level in the unsafe range by means of consuming products containing NutraSweet." he said. "There is no experimental evidence to suggest a risk to the fetus." Searle has eight studies of its own under way exploring the effects of aspartame on the brain.

Dr. Wurtman of M.I.T. does not believe that moderate amounts of aspartame are a hazard to normal people. "But" he said in a recent interview, "I think there are some numbers of people who are at risk." Dr. Wurtman, who is a consultant to Searle on products other than aspartame, said that when he and Searle "talk about aspartame we tend not to agree."

Dr. Wurtman's own animal studies show that "you double the effect of the phenylalanine in the brain when you have aspartame and carbohydrates together, and no one knows what a safe amount is," he said. "There are several groups of people who might be especially susceptible to high doses. These include people who are taking drugs that act on the brain like antihypertensives, people with a history of seizures, young people and pregnant women." For adults who do not fall into the above categories, Dr. Wurtman said half a gram to one gram of aspartame a day should be safe.

"But," he added, "if a 7-year-old, weighing about 45 or 50 pounds, drinks a 2-liter bottle of Diet Coke, which contains about 1,200 milligrams, he is already exceeding the allowable daily limit for aspartame suggested by F.D.A."

Dr. Wurtman said he knew of a dozen patients "with first-time seizures confirmed in university hospitals who were consuming very large amounts of aspartame." "It is very important," he said, "that such people be subjects in controlled studies."

Dr. Wurtman also said all foods containing aspartame should state the amount on the label.

But Searle and soft-drink manufacturers disagreed. "We have no objection to F.D.A. requiring quantitative labeling for food ingredients in general," Dr. Sturtevant said, "but we do object to F.D.A. singling out aspartame, because there is no scientific evidence suggesting that it need be."

"Aspartame is safe," said Dr. Miller of the F.D.A., but he added: "We are not moving very rapidly to approve new uses. If there is another segment of the population besides phenylketonurics who are sensitive, we will do whatever we have to do—from putting something on the label up to banning it if the population is large enough."

EXPERT STILL TROUBLED BY ASPARTAME

(By David Zinman)

Aspartame, the low-calorie sugar substitute marketed as NutraSweet, is one of the amazing success stories of the 1980s. In the four years since the artificial sweetener found its way onto grocery store shelves, more than 100 million Americans have tried it. They have tasted it in more than 90 types of products ranging from diet soft drinks to sugarfree gum. Last year, its manufacturer, G.D. Searle & Co., reported sales soaring to $535 million. By 1986, some expect it to top $1 billion.

But there is a possible dark side to all this. Aspartame contains a potentially harmful component, an amino acid called phenylalanine. Too much of it can cause brain damage, especially in fetuses and newborn of genetically susceptible women, according to studies done by Dr. Louis Elsas of Emory University in Atlanta.

"The big unanswered question," said Elsas, "is if pregnant women taking artificial sweeteners can elevate their blood level of phenylalanine to concentrations that adversely affect their fetuses. Is the damage from phenylalanine produced by a threshold effect? Or do little bits of the problem occur at lower levels?

"Aspartame is being promoted as something good for you. But I don't think that it is a legitimate thing for our nation to be exposed to in large quantity."

Searle said reports about potential adverse effects of aspartame on pregnant women and infants were "misleading and do a disservice to consumers." The Chicago-based firm pointed out that in 1981, the Food and Drug Administration found the product to be safe and effective.

Searle does not dispute the contention that high levels of phenylalanine can cause damage in fetuses. But it says there is no cause for alarm because current consumption amounts are not even close to a point where they might pose a problem. Most important, it says that studies on pregnant animals show that even at "abuse levels," aspartame presents no hazard to the fetus.

Nonetheless, Elsas, director of medical genetics at the Atlanta school, said he is concerned, in part, because the sweetener's sale has been so massive and there are still some unknowns about the product. What worries him—and this is not based on any study but his own personal thoughts as a scientist—is the notion that aspartame's effects could be slow and subtle. They could take a generation or more to uncover.

"It's not going to be so overt an explosion," Elsas said recently on "Nightline," an ABC-TV news program. "We may not be able to see the effects for a generation. And then we'll suddenly see a lot of kids with behaviorial abnormalities—with IQs that aren't reaching what . . . we anticipated from their educational or their genetic input."

Searle says that more than 20 years of testing in animals has shown aspartame to be safe over long periods. Elsas acknowledges there has been no documented negative side effects of aspartame. Nor has he personally conducted a study on the sweetener.

But he has done research with children and young adults with gene defects who ingested phenylalanine at high levels and found that their reaction time had slowed. That means phenylalanine can produce quantifiable changes in brain function. "I believe," he says, "the unlimited use of phenylalanine products should be moderated especially in certain groups."

A pediatrician and a biochemist, Elsas is focusing on patients with a rare genetic disorder called phenylketonuria or PKU. These individuals cannot metabolize foods containing phenylalanine. As a result, the chemical concentrates in their brains. This can cause retardation in fetuses and newborns who have this genetic disorder. Many states require tests to discover PKU babies who must then be kept on special diets.

Elsas is also concerned about parents of these children, who are normal but may carry one of the two genes needed to have PKU. "There is a genetically susceptible subpopulation of well over a million women whose fetuses may be at risk if they take indiscriminate amounts of phenylalanine," says Elsas. They, too, he says, may also have an impaired ability to metabolize phenylalanine.

Since it is not always possible to detect these single gene carriers before a PKU baby is born, the vast majority don't know who they are. About 1 percent of babies delivered each year are born to mothers who are PKU carriers.

People in whom high levels of phenylalanine may pose problems, Elsas said, are:

Pregnant women. If blood phenylalanine rises to a level high enough to cause problems, the child's brain development could be affected.

Children under 6 months. A high level of blood phenylalanine can produce irreversible brain damage by slowing formation of mature brain cells and by altering the formation of myelin cells that insulate parts of the brain.

Older children and adults carrying the PKU disorder. A high blood concentration of phenylalanine will reduce the brain's ability to function as quickly and efficiently. But these changes are reversible once the level of phenylalanine returns to normal.

The flaw in Elsas' argument, says Daniel Azarnoff, president of research and development for Searle, is that he has no idea what is a dangerous level of phenylalanine concentration. Moreover, he said, Elsas' concern that people may be getting toxic amounts of phenylalanine flies in the face of scientific data. "He is saying people eat a lot of aspartame," says Azarnoff. "The evidence is they don't."

The FDA has set 50 milligrams of aspartame per kilogram (2.2 pounds) of body weight as an acceptable daily intake. To reach that amount, Searle says, a 132-pound person would have to drink 18 cans of diet soda in a day. The average 12 oz. can of diet soda contains 170 milligrms aspartame, Searle says.

But Dr. William Patridge of the University of California at Los Angeles says the FDA has underestimated consumption of aspartame. Patridge could not be reached for comment. However, the magazine Common Cause said Patridge wrote to the FDA in 1983 citing figures showing how children eating aspartame-sweetened foods all day could be on their way to consuming the maximum amounts the FDA uses for its safety assessment.

Searle says that tests it sponsored show no harmful effects have been seen even at levels of 200 milligrams—four times the FDA's intake standard. However, the quality of Searle-sponsored studies has been criticized. Sen. Howard Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) has complained that the FDA overruled many scientific questions raised about the reliability of testing. A federal investigation is now under way.

Elsas also argues that the FDA's own publications show that the daily phenylalanine intake of some children ages 7 to 9 goes as high as 70 milligrams per kilogram of body weight—exceeding the agency's acceptable daily amount of 50 milligrams. What Searle's studies do not show, he says, is long-term effects at intermediate levels. In addition, one scientist, Richard Wurtman of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, says some foods intensify the effects of phenylalanine. "If one drinks a beverage containing aspartame at the same time one eats a carbohydrate-rich food," Wurtman says, "then aspartame's effect on brain phenylalanine is doubled."

To try to clarify the situation, Dr. Reuven Matalon of the University of Illinois has started a study funded by the National Institutes of Health to look at the effects of aspartame on PKU carriers as well as on normal individuals. The study will take about two years.

"In the meantime, I don't think it is fair to express concerns about aspartame as conclusions," he said. "There is no data to implicate it in any difficulty. At the same time, we do not know what a high level of intake will do and where the danger point comes. Until we get the data, if I were the FDA, I would recommend that pregnant women use caution. Moderation should be the key."

SWEET SUSPICIONS

STEVE WILSON. They say it's the biggest breakthrough in diet drinks, a better taste from a new product everybody is talking about.

Commercial.

STEVE WILSON. 7-up has got it, too. And orange soda, and Dr. Pepper. And the fact is it's virtually impossible to find a can of diet soda without NutraSweet.

Commercial.

STEVE WILSON. Powered drink mixes have it too: like Kool-Aid, Wylers fruit drinks, chocolate drink mixes. It's in Jello, it's in all kinds of sugar-free products. You can buy it in little packets under the brand name Equal. It's 200 times sweeter than sugar and Americans sure like the way it tastes. The company that makes it at $80 a pound made more than half-a-billion dollars worth last year and may sell twice as much in 1985—unless nagging safety questions slow down sales.

MOS. My girlfriend just told me yesterday it's not supposed to be good for you. So, now I'm not too sure if I'm drinking the right thing.

MOS. I'd like to know how safe it is. I imagine it is safe to a degree because it's in everything you drink now-a-days.

ROBERT SHAPIRO. It's safe.

STEVE WILSON. Unquestionably?

ROBERT SHAPIRO. Unquestionably!

STEVE WILSON. Not a doubt in your mind?

ROBERT SHAPIRO. Not a doubt in my mind.

STEVE WILSON. Nobody expresses more confidence in the stuff than the man who is president of the NutraSweet Group, the division that brings in 70 percent of the total profits of the big Searle Pharmaceutical Company.

STEVE WILSON. Why is it that you can't seem to convince so many others of that?

ROBERT SHAPIRO. That's just not right. The fact is we have convinced all the folks whose opinion matters.

STEVE WILSON. He's not talking about Joyce Moscado. She's one of thousands of people who have complained about serious side effects, one of those who believes when all the facts are known.

JOYCE MOSCADO. Everybody's going to be convinced that there are people who do have an adverse reaction to the consumption of NutraSweet.

STEVE WILSON. Mary Carr is another one who's not convinced by Searle's multi-million-dollar advertising and public relations blitz.

MARY CARR. My body went through hell with this stuff, I really did. I think that they should take it off the market and do more research because I would not want to put anyone through this.

STEVE WILSON. But it's not just all the letters from consumers who are reporting adverse effects. It's what so many respected scientists are saying.

Dr. WOODROW MONTE. Every time a truly impartial team of scientists have looked at NutraSweet, it has been turned down, it has been denied. It's not been tested correctly. The tests that have been done that I consider to be honest tests show extreme dangers over the long term.

WILSON. When our report continues, a closer look at some of the complaints and why some scientists are still saying that despite government approval, your diet soft drink may not be as safe as you've been led to believe.

STEVE WILSON. Are you telling me I shouldn't drink the stuff?

Dr. WOODROW MONTE. Yes, I am saying you shouldn't drink the stuff.

STEVE WILSON. It's dangerous.

Dr. WOODROW MONTE. Yes, I'm saying that I believe that with all my heart.

ROD LEONARD. Seizures, headaches; among women its the early onset of menopause, serious depression. People say they can't understand what's happening to them except that they keep getting more and more depressed until they want to kill themselves.

JOYCE MOSCATO. You really don't want to go to work, you don't want to deal with friends, you don't want to communicate with the rest of the world.

STEVE WILSON. They believe Nutrasweet, America's newest artificial sweetener, is responsible. And despite how good it tastes in diet drinks and gelatin and all kinds of sugar-free products, people all over the nation are reporting side effects. Like headaches—some mild, some unbearably painful; stomach problems; various allergic reactions, even seizures. But her complaints and thousands of others like them are "anecdotal", scientifically unsubstantiated stories that don't worry Robert Shapiro.

ROBERT SHAPIRO. No, I don't find it scary because I'm aware of what the evidence is and there is no evidence to suggest that younger females or anybody else has a problem with the product.

STEVE WILSON. He's president of the group that makes it, the Nutrasweet Group at the G.D. Searle Drug Company where they can't ship it fast enough to meet demand. But on Capitol Hill just last month, FDA chairman Frank Young admitted to a Senate Committee that while he believes it's safe for most of us, there is a big exception.

FRANK YOUNG. With the exception of a sub-group in the population, young females and that is under further study at this point.

STEVE WILSON. But diet drinks are big with lots of young women, a number of whom have reported the same problem Joyce Moscato had for the many months she consumed NutraSweet—her menstrual periods simply stopped.

JOYCE MOSCATO. December 27th I quit using NutraSweet and on January 25th I had my first period. I felt great and I've been normal ever since.

STEVE WILSON. Well, despite his claims nobody has a problem with his product, Shapiro knows better and reluctantly admitted NutraSweet—aspartame—can be trouble.

ROBERT WILSON. Now it's not just young women reporting side effects. Some of the nation's most respected scientists have some serious concerns about the product. Dr. Richard Wurtman at MIT believes it may adversely affect brain chemistry; that is can cause behavioral changes. Dr. John Olney at Washington University has raised questions about brain damage to children. And here on the campus of Arizona State University near Phoenix, Dr. Woodrow Monte says the big danger is from a substance left in our bodies when NutraSweet breaks down—methyl alcohol.

Dr. WOODROW MONTE. If I could get a public hearing, if I could have a Congressional hearing, if I could have a hearing before the Food and Drug Administration which they have been stopping, trying to stop, I could prove easily, show easily, that even these so-called small amounts of methyl alcohol can cause extremely serious consequences over the long term.

STEVE WILSON. Now these complaints we've been hearing from all over the country are certainly alarming but what may be even more alarming is how this product NutraSweet got past the Food and Drug Administration and onto our grocery shelves.

STEVE WILSON. Politics?

ROB LEONARD. I would call it politics.

STEVE WILSON. Steve Wilson (reporting).

JOYCE MOSCATO. Never for one minute did I suspect that a product that was on the market with the approval of the FDA would be causing such harm.

STEVE WILSON. Joyce Moscato and many others like her say the harm—in her case depression and menstrual problems—is linked to NutraSweet: The only artificial sweetner the Food and Drug Administration has declared safe.

ROBERT MCQUATE. For FDA to cavalierly approve something on a whim is totally out of the realm of possibility.

STEVE WILSON. But you weren't satisfied with the work that they'd done?

In fact the soft drink makers were so dissatisfied with what they believed was the lack of evidence NutraSweet was safe, they prepared a formal, 31-page protest—scientific chapter and verse raising serious questions. McQuate says now it was just designed to "spark discussion in the industry"—and it never WAS submitted to the FDA. He says secret tests his members paid for later answered all their questions. But others believe those who want to use NutraSweet discarded the scientific concerns for safety in favor of higher profits brought in from better-tasting diet products. But Searle—the big drug company—makes NutraSweet and has the legal responsibility to scientifically prove to the government that it's safe.

Dr. ADRIAN GROSS. They lied and they didn't submit the real nature of their observations because had they done that it is more than likely that a great number of these studies would have been rejected simply for adequacy.

STEVE WILSON. Dr. Gross was the chief scientist on a nine member task force that reported Searle made a number of "deliberate decisions" seemingly calculated to minimize the chances of discovering NutraSweet is toxic—a danger to our health.

Dr. GROSS. What Searle did, they took great pains to camouflage these shortcomings of the study. As I say filter and just present to the FDA what they wished the FDA to know and they did other terrible things for instance animals would develop tumors while they were under study. Well, they would remove these tumors from the animals.

STEVE WILSON. Other laboratory animals Searle used for tests on another product in the same lab seemed to die and come back to life—this one three times.

ROBERT SHAPIRO. It's apparently a recording keeping error.

The president of the NutraSweet Group at Searle says Dr. Gross and his task force are just wrong. But looking at other experiments on laboratory animals and other independent evidence, a scientific board of inquiry has also raised serious safety questions. So have other respected scientists. But the FDA approved it. So it's safe?

ROBERT SHAPIRO. It has been established by the people who are charged by law with the responsibility for making those decisions and they've made those decisions and the fact is it's safe.

Everybody who has looked at the cancer question has said this should not be marketed on the basis of the cancer question except for Dr. Hayes. The Reagan appointed commissioner of the FDA who now works as senior medical advisor to the Searle public relations firm.

STEVE WILSON. Dr. Arthur Hayes who approves wider use of NutraSweet is also now dean of the New York Medical College and refuses to speak publicly about this issue.

WILSON STAND-UP. Now we don't know if NutraSweet is safe or not. We do know that a lot of good scientists still have a lot of good questions and that's the point: The law requires the FDA to establish to a reasonable certainty that the stuff is safe before we start consuming it. About all that's certain at this point: there's big money riding on the outcome and so too is our health. At Searle Company headquarters in Chicago. . . . (Steve Wilson reporting).

NUTRASWEET UP-DATE

COMMERCIAL. "It's a little red swirl next to the name NutraSweet Brand Sweetner."

STEVE WILSON. Thanks to a fortune spent on ads like this, even young Americans know what NutraSweet is.

COMMERCIAL. "100 percent NutraSweet. Oh, that's the good stuff.

WILSON. But since we reported more about all the questions still unanswered in regard to the safety of NutraSweet, there have been some new developments.

Sen. HOWARD METZENBAUM. There's enough reason to be suspicious.

WILSON. Senator Metzenbaum says he's seen enough now to have real suspicions and he has directed the General Accounting Office to investigate. Specifically, his letter to the Comptroller General asks for an investigation of NutraSweet test results, what really happened during the formal FDA approval process, and to what extent was the White House involved in the approval of the product.

Sen. METZENBAUM. Where there's smoke, there's fire. The Food and Drug Administration ought to act with dispatch to investigate these, the safety of this product. Too many people are drinking too many diet drinks to permit this to go on and they shouldn't need a Congressional prod in order to do the job that is truly their own responsibility.

WILSON. By the way, another Metzenbaum letter, this one also signed by Senator Heinz, puts some sharp questions to the F.D.A. The Senators want to know if more stringent labeling requirements are in the works. So we'll know how much of the stuff is safe to drink, what's being done to validate the test data the manufacturer provided, and who's monitoring and encouraging medical reports from doctors across the nation when they see evidence of medical problems possibly related to NutraSweet?

Searle—the maker of NutraSweet—is still standing behind the product, calling it absolutely safe. But the company has acknowledged now at least eight more studies are being done on the product safety questions, perhaps the biggest here at Duke University. Scientists on this campus and elsewhere will study whether NutraSweet causes headaches, seizures and special problems for children.

In Atlanta, scientists at Emory University are out with a report that links NutraSweet consumption by pregnant women to birth defects and problems with infants who eat or drink it. And in Maryland late last month, what may be the first lawsuit as a result of the safety concerns. The mother of a little boy is seeking $2 million from Searle claiming the child has suffered serious and permanent neurologic and psychiatric injury as a result of NutraSweet.

The product, meanwhile, is still selling briskly. Sales are expected to top $1 billion this year.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
Rockville, MD, January 10, 1977.

Hon. SAMUEL K. SKINNER,
U.S. Attorney, Northern District of Illinois, 219 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, IL.

DEAR MR. SKINNER: We request that your office convene a Grand Jury investigation into apparent violations of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, 21 U.S.C. 331(e), and the False Reports to the Government Act, 18 U.S.C. 1001, by G.D. Searle and Company and three of its responsible officers for their willful and knowing failure to make reports to the Food and Drug Administration required by the Act, 21 U.S.C. 355(i), and for concealing material facts and making false statements in reports of animal studies conducted to establish the safety of the drug Aldactone and the food additive Aspartame. Concealing material facts relative to the Aldactone study also resulted in that drug being misbranded within the meaning of 21 U.S.C. 352(a) and 321(n), in violation of 21 U.S.C. 331(a).

I—THE STATUTORY/REGULATION SCHEME

A. Investigational New Drugs. The Food and Drug Administration has responsibility for assuring that drugs marketed in this country are safe for their intended uses and are accurately labeled. The Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act prohibits the marketing of any "new drug" in interstate commerce unless a new drug application (NDA) filed pursuant to 21 U.S.C. 355 containing substantial evidence of the safety and effectiveness of the drug has been approved by the FDA. Before an NDA is approved for any particular use of a drug, that drug may lawfully be used only for investigational tests, first in animals and thereafter in humans. This testing is permitted only in accordance with 21 U.S.C. 355(i) and regulations promulgated thereunder.

The original statutory basis for regulating the investigational use of new drugs was provided in 1938 by the basic Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. The Drug Amendments of 1962 authorized the FDA to establish by regulation new reporting requirements to assure that information about significant hazards, contraindications, side effects and adverse or unusual reactions associated with the investigational use of new drugs is disseminated rapidly. These regulations specify the form, content, and timeliness for the submission of such reports. Failure to comply with such requirements is prohibited under the Act, 21 U.S.C. 331(e).

A major purpose of the investigational drug regulations, 21 CFR Part 312, is to safeguard human subjects during the investigational phase of drug development. Accordingly, the regulations require that prior to the administration of any investigational drug to human subjects, the sponsor of the drug must file with the FDA a notice of claimed investigational exemption for a new drug (IND), which contains adequate information about preclinical (animal) investigations of the drug and any studies and other experience from which the sponsor has concluded that it is reasonably safe to initiate clinical (human) testing. A careful evaluation of the animal toxicity and pharmacological studies provides some assurance of the expected effects when the drug is administered to humans. If the data submitted in an IND justify the conclusion that the drug may safely be tested in humans, the FDA permits the sponsor to ship the drug to investigators. It is not uncommon, as is the case with Aldactone, that a drug may have an approved NDA for certain uses while simultaneously being tested in animals and/or humans for other uses under an IND.

Because the IND procedures provide a limited exemption for the distribution of a drug which has not as yet been shown to be safe and/or effective by adequate and well-controlled clinical investigations, the regulations require the sponsor to closely monitor the progress of pre-marketing investigations. The regulations provide that progress reports of such investigations be submitted to the FDA at reasonable intervals, not to exceed one year. 21 CFR 312.1(a)(5). In addition, the regulations require that a sponsor shall "promptly investigate" and report to the FDA "any findings associated with use of a drug that may suggest significant hazards, contraindications, side effects or precautions pertinent to the safety of the drug". If such a finding is "alarming", it must be reported "immediately" and clinical investigation discontinued or modified until the finding is adequately evaluated and a decision is reached that it is safe to proceed. 21 CFR 312.1(a)(6).

The results of drug testing are critical not only to establish the basic safety and effectiveness of the product, but also to identify possible side effects, contraindications, and the need for special warnings, all of which must be included in the drug labeling. The sponsor of every new drug submits proposed labeling for FDA approval at the time of initial marketing and thereafter to reflect new information resulting from its use.

B. Food Additive Petitions. The Act also provides for FDA approval of food additives. Approval of an additive is codified in a regulation prescribing conditions under which the additive may be safely used. The regulation is promulgated solely on the basis of a manufacturer's petition, filed pursuant to 21 U.S.C. 348(b), which contains reports of studies establishing the safety of the additive. As with investigational drugs, the FDA does not perform safety tests on food additives; it must rely upon the data developed by the petitioner. Studies supporting a petition are ordinarily performed only on animals; human testing is uncommon.

The major purpose of the food additive provisions, added to the Act in 1958, is to prevent the unrestricted marketing and consumption in human food of chemicals without reasonable proof that these chemicals will not adversely affect man, either immediately, over a life-time or in the next generation.

C. Monitoring Test Integrity. Reports of studies submitted to the FDA as part of INDs or NDAs and food additive petitions must be complete, balanced and truthful if the Agency is to fulfill its duty of assuring that these products are safe and that new drugs contain accurate labeling based on the result of preclinical and clinical testing.

The FDA has not routinely monitored the conduct of animal test results submitted in support of either new drugs or food additive petitions. The reliability of the testing is normally checked by FDA review of the sponsor's reports of the underlying raw data. If necessary, the FDA may review the underlying raw data itself in the possession of the sponsor. The FDA may also select manufacturers or preclinical testing laboratories for routine surveillance inspectors. When there is reason to believe that there are irregularities or discrepancies in the conduct of tests or the reporting of test data, the FDA may conduct a compliance inspection in order to evaluate the testing facilities, practices, and record keeping procedures to resolve any apparent discrepancy between the raw data and the report or to determine the truthfulness of data presented in the report.

Recent FDA experiences have identified significant problems in the manner in which many preclinical laboratory studies are performed. Deficiencies in the quality and integrity of reported data have prompted the Commissioner of Food and Drugs to establish a bioresearch monitoring program, and to propose the promulgation of good laboratory practices regulations which will delineate proper procedures for conducting preclinical laboratory studies. Congress has increased FDA's budget for the fiscal year 1977 by $16.6 million specifically to help achieve the goals of the new program.

II—THE SEARLE INVESTIGATION

The genesis of the investigation of studies conducted by and for G.D. Searle was the FDA's discovery in 1972 of certain discrepancies in Searle data submitted in support of a large-selling anti-infective drug Flagyl. FDA review of the data was initiated because independent investigators had reported evidence that Flagyl was a carcinogen (an agent capable of producing cancer). Searle's own long-term toxicity study, submitted in 1970, had not concluded that Flagyl was a carcinogen. In April 1974, Searle submitted more studies on the issue of Flagyl's carcinogenicity and also submitted corrections to the data from its original long-term study. These corrected data raised further questions, resulting in FDA inspections initiated at Searle beginning in May 1974 and proceeding intermittently until the first of July 1975. These initial inspections failed to satisfactorily resolve questions of discrepancies and inadequacies in Searle preclinical testing and reporting of test results.

On July 23, 1975, Dr. Alexander M. Schmidt, then the Commissioner of Food and Drugs, established a special internal Task Force to review the conduct of animal experiments conducted by and for G.D. Searle and report to him. Inspections were conducted at Searle and at three independent laboratories, Hazelton Laboratories, Vienna, Virginia, The Wisconsin Regional Primate Center, Madison, Wisconsin, and Microscopy for Biological Research, Albany, New York, which had conducted or participated in the evaluation of animal studies for Searle.

The Task Force reviewed inspection reports covering 25 separate studies on seven different products, totaling approximately 500 pages plus 15,000 exhibits. Based on this information, data originally submitted by Searle, the scientific evaluation of animal tissue slides and other raw data, the Task Force issued its report to the Commissioner on March 24, 1976. A copy of the Task Force report was forwarded to the Consumer Affairs Section, Antitrust Division, Department of Justice, and to your office in April. Among other observations, the Task Force questioned Searle's handling of data applicable to the drug Aldactone and the reporting of studies on the food additive Aspartame.

The Task Force report was provided to Searle and the firm requested an opportunity to submit a written reply and to meet with the Commissioner to respond to the conclusions and recommendations of the Task Force. The meeting was held on May 18; Searle submitted its written reply to the Task Force report on May 21. I am enclosing a copy of the transcript of the May 18 meeting and the written reply of Searle to the Task Force report (Exs. 1a, 1b). At the meeting, Searle requested an opportunity to make further written reply to two memoranda by FDA pathologist M. Adrain Gross, a Task Force consultant who had reviewed much of the Searle preclinical testing data. This Searle reply was sent to the Agency on June 21, 1976.

III—INFORMAL ADMINISTRATIVE HEARING

After review in my office and in the office of the Associate Commissioner for Compliance of all the material relating to this matter, on September 3, 1976, the Agency issued, pursuant to 21 U.S.C. 335, a Notice of Hearing to G.D. Searle and Company, and * * * for apparent violations of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act and related violations of 18 U.S.C. 1001 concerning Aldactone and Aspartame. The hearing, originally scheduled for September 21, 1976, was postponed at the request of Searle until October 20. An amended Notice of Hearing, dated September 15, 1976, was issued to correct an inadvertent omission from the earlier notice and to verify October 20 as the hearing date. A copy of the Notice of Hearing was forwarded to the Consumer Affairs Section and to Assistant United States Attorney Fred Branding of your office.

At the October hearing, Searle submitted lengthy written replies to the 305 Notice. Copies of these are enclosed. In addition, Searle reiterated a request for the Agency's investigational file covering the apparent violations which were the subject of the hearing. This request was denied, as was an earlier Searle request for "discovery" which referenced the Jencks Act, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and Brady v. Maryland. Copies of correspondence concerning these requests have been provided to the Consumer Affairs Section and Mr. Branding.

As you know, preliminary reports of discrepancies in preclinical testing conducted by and for Searle were partially responsible for hearings on drug-related research held before the Senate Subcommittee on Health of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and the Subcommittee on Administrative Practices and Procedures of the Committee on the Judiciary both chaired by Senator Edward Kennedy on July 10, 1975. Subsequent testimony updating the investigation and the positions of the FDA and Searle were taken before the joint subcommittees on January 20 and April 8, 1976.

IV—FAILURE TO SUBMIT SAFETY DATA ON ALDACTONE

A. The Drug. Aldactone is a new drug marketed by Searle pursunat to NDA 12-151. The drug was first approved in 1960 for use as a diuretic (an agent that increases the secretion of urine) for congestive heart failure and for hyperaldosteronism, a relatively rare but severe disorder of the adrenal cortex often resulting in a marked increase in high blood pressure. By 1974, Aldactone and a related drug utilizing the same active ingredient, Aldactazide, constituted approximately —— of Searle's total pharmaceutical sales, approximately —— a year. Current sales are reported to be —— a year.

In 1963, Searle submitted IND 714 to conduct studies to develop data for the use of Aldactone in massive doses in the treatment of myasthenia gravis (serious muscular paralysis). In 1969, Searle amended its IND to cover testing of Aldactone for severe congestive heart failure at dosage levels much higher than those approved in the NDA.

B. The MBR ("Mauro") Report. In 1970 Searle designed two 78-week toxicity studies in the rat on Aldactone, one to support the long-term use of the drug at dosage levels approved in the NDA and the other to support higher dose levels in the treatment of severe congestive heart failure. The first study, later extended to 104 weeks in duration, was conducted by Hazelton Laboratories Vienna, Virginia; the second was performed by Searle in its own laboratories. The study conducted at Searle began in August 1970 and rates were sacrificed and necropsied (autopsied) during February and March 1972.

In November 1972, consistent with prior practices, Searle submitted the slides of sections of organ tissues of the rats from the study it had performed to an outside consultant pathologist for examination. The slides were examined by Dr. Jacqueline Mauro, a board certified pathologist, at Microspsy for Biological Research, Ltd. Alabany, New York (MBR). The report of her "readings"—the MBR report—was submitted to Searle on March 21, 1973. In a letter to MBR dated June 1, 1973, Dr. —— acknowledged receipt of the report which "looks just fine."

In the summary of the MBR report, Dr. Mauro stated that her pathology review of the data suggested a group relationship, meaning a drug-related or drug-induced relationship, with tumors (adenomas) of the testes and liver. She also noted a significant number of thyroid tumors and non-tumorous thyroid lesions which she called "adenomatous goiter". Dr. Mauro recommended that these findings be measured for statistical significance. A statistical review of pathology findings is important since an absolute cause-and-effect relationship usually cannot be established in experimental biology. Therefore, an association between an agent and an effect is determined as a probability. If the incidence of a toxic response, such as a lesion, is found among animals treated with the agent under study to a significant degree greater than in animals not exposed to the agent, the established practice is to regard the agent as responsible for that toxic reaction. Where, as here, the toxic reaction is the development of tumors, it is likely to result in restrictive labeling imposed by FDA or even revocation of marketing approval.

C. Searle's Reaction to the MBR Report. In early August 1973, a statistically significant relationship between the administration of Aldactone and liver and testicular tumors, as well as thyroid tumors, was confirmed by Searle's Mathematics-Statistics Department based on the MBR report. Thereafter, at the request of ——, some of the liver tissue slides were reviewed by a then recently hired Searle pathologist Dr. Rudolf Stejskal. He concluded that Dr. Mauro's analyses were "incorrect" and thus "unreliable" since certain slides which she had diagnosed as revealing benign tumors (adenomas) were, in his opinion, lesser lesions (hyperplasia) and that other slides that she had diagnosed as being benign tumors were in fact malignant tumors. On the basis of Dr. Stejskal's limited review of the liver slides, Searle did not submit the MPR report to the FDA.

In April or May 1974, Dr. Stejskal reviewed more of the slides which had been analyzed in the MBR report. This time, he felt that the slides revealed more thyroid tumors than had been reported by Dr. Mauro. Thus, while having concluded that her characterization of the liver slides was too extreme, he also found that her characterization of the thyroid lesions was too restrained. In various interviews with FDA personnel and in written submissions to the Agency, Dr. Stejskal has never commented on the MBR diagnosis of testicular tumors which, according to Searle's Mathematics-Statistics Department, were, as Dr. Mauro suggested, drug-related and statistically significant.

In August 1974—sixteen months after it received the MBR report—Searle sent the same slides examined by Dr. Mauro, and approximately 1,000 additional slides from the same study, to another contract pathologist, Dr. Donald A. Willigan. His report was received by Searle in December 1974. It reveals a statistically significant drug-related increase in tumors of the thyroid and tests, as did the MBR report, but most important to Searle, not tumors of the liver. The concern at Searle over the liver pathology of the MBR report must have been particularly acute; undoubtedly the firm recognized that this information would have to be included in the Aldactone labeling, with a probable decrease in sales. The production of tumors in the testes and thyroid of the test animals, at statistically significant levels, must also have been unwelcome news but, insofar as Aldactone is felt to be active in these endocrine glands, Searle was prepared to argue that these tumors would be less likely to concern the FDA and the prescribing physician. We disagree with Searle's discounting the tumors of endocrine glands. However, the liver findings were more alarming because there was no theory upon which they could be discounted. Thus, unlike the MBR report, the Willigan report was submitted to FDA promptly upon receipt at Searle.

Immediately after the first Congressional hearings and the Commissioner's establishment of the Task Force, and immediately prior to the initiation of inspections by the FDA Task Force, which Searle had every reason to believe would include studies on Aldactone, Searle finally disclosed the MBR report to the FDA in July 1975, some 27 months after it had been received.

D. Violation of 21 U.S.C. 331(e) and 18 U.S.C. 1001. The FDA regards the MBR report as containing "alarming findings", namely, statistically significant drug-related tumors of the liver and also of the thyroid and the testes, especially given the wide use of the drug in humans. Accordingly, Searle was required to report these findings to the Agency "immediately" pursuant to 21 CFR 312.1(a)(6). If one were to conclude that these findings were not "alarming", they unquestionably were of the type that suggested significant hazards, contraindications, effects and precautions pertinent to the safety of the drug and therefore should have been submitted to the Agency "promptly" as also required by 21 CFR 312.1(a)(6). Even if one took the view most favorable to Searle that these findings were neither alarming nor suggestive of significant precautions, they were significant and thus were required to be submitted to the Agency at least within one year of receipt by Searle. 21 CFR 312.1(a)(5).

The primary purpose of the requirement that test findings be submitted to the FDA promptly is to permit the agency to assess for itself whether the investigational exemption should be modified or revoked. A manufacturer is not entitled to withhold damaging information in the hope that ultimately it might be proved incorrect. Moreover, the regulations do not preclude a manufacturer from filing expert criticism along with or following the reported study. In short, under any view of the facts, Searle was not entitled to discount the entire MBR report on the basis of Dr. Stejskal's review of some of the slides for only one of the tissue types. Moreover, to give great weight to Dr. Stejskal's analyses is to conclude that in May 1974 Searle had reason to believe, based upon his subsequent review of more of the slides, that administration of Aldactone in the study had caused even a greater number of thyroid tumors than reported by Dr. Mauro.

21 U.S.C. 331(e) prohibits the failure to make any report required by regulations under the IND provisions of the Act. The decision not to submit the MBR report was a conscious one and thus our Notice of Hearing charged this violation as a intentional act under the felony provisions of the Act, 21 U.S.C. 333(b). Failure to submit the MBR report also constitutes concealment of a material fact, a violation of 18 U.S.C. 1001.

E. Labeling of Aldacone: Violation of 21 U.S.C. 331(a). When in March 1975 the FDA received from Searle the report of Dr. Willigan which confirmed the statistically significant incidences of thyroid and testes tumors reported to Searle two years earlier by Dr. Mauro, the Agency became concerned that the labeling for Aldactone was inadequate. On June 10, 1975, it convened the Cardio-Renal Advisory Committee, a group of non-FDA experts, to review the data then known on Aldactone. Even prior to the disclosure of the MBR report in July 1975, and based upon the result of the tissue slide examination by Dr. Willigan and the analysis at FDA's request of certain liver slides by Dr. John Boitnott, a pathologist at Johns Hopkins University, the Advisory Committee concluded that while the toxicological studies were incomplete they showed "definite and significant increases in neoplasia (tumors) of the thyroid gland, testes and possibly breasts and liver. They certainly warrant a warning to the medical profession and a curtailment in the recommendations for use." A copy of the Committee's report is enclosed. Aldactone has now been relabled consistent with the Committee's views.

In view of the similar statistically significant thyroid and testes tumor findings in the MBR and Willigan reports, and the findings of liver lesions by both pathologists, we believe Searle's failure to submit the MBR report resulted in violation of 21 U.S.C. 331(a) for causing the shipment in interestate commerce of Aldactone which was misbranded within the meaning of 21 U.S.C. 352(a) in that its labeling did not reveal the potential of the drug to cause tumors, a potential disclosed by the MBR report. As you can see, the Advisory Committee's conclusion also supports FDA's view that the findings in the MBR report were "alarming".

V—ANALYSIS OF SEARLE'S EXPLANATIONS FOR FAILURE TO SUBMIT THE MBR REPORT

The administrative process, including the special Task Force and the 305 Notice and hearing, has been extensive; much of the dialogue between Searle and the FDA invovles complex issues. The following portion of this letter, as well as parallel dicussions of apparent violations involving Aspartame, must necessarily be specific in order to comprehensively and accurately reflect the context of this case. Regrettably, the length of this letter bespeaks our goal.

Searle's explanation for its failure to submit the MBR report, set forth in various documents, is best summarized in the firm's response to the Notice of Hearing which was submitted to the FDA on October 20, 1976. Without attempting to provide at this time a point-by-point critique of the Searle submission, comment upon the main recurrent themes provided in Searle's defense may be useful.

1. From the beginning, Searle has repeatedly taken the position that the MBR report was "proven" by its own pathologist to be "incorrect" and thus Searle was under no obligation to submit it to the Government.

Searle's contention that Dr. Mauro's pathology results were unreliable must be evaluated in light of the fact that pathology is a judgmental discipline. Proliferative lesions of the liver cells can be subclassified according to the particular nature of the proliferation. A diffuse increase in hepatocellular elements is usually termed "diffuse hyperplasia", or mostly, "hyperplasia". When such proliferation is not diffuse but rather a spotty distribution throughout the tissues with islands or zones of proliferating cells, the term "nodular hyperplasia" is utilized. When such nodules of hyperplasia contain cells which the pathologist deems as having been permanently altered or "transformed" into neoplastic or tumor cells, the term "neoplastic nodule" is applied; this is taken to represent a group of proliferating cells which have "crossed the boundary" on the way to becoming a liver tumor. Various pathologists utilize other recognized terms such as "adenoma" to signify a benign liver tumor. A tissue slide characterized by one pathologist as an "adenoma" would also meet the criteria for "neoplastic nodule". The most extreme form of cellular proliferative stage, the malignant tumor variety, is commonly termed "hepatocellular carcinoma".

What is important, however, is that all these various terms represent a series of characterizations of stages of the proliferative process which can be viewed as a continuum. It is entirely possible that two pathologists may examine a given lesion and characterize it somewhat differently. This does not necessarily mean that one is "right" and the other is "wrong". Therefore, one must examine characterizations of liver alterations in a set of animals and ask whether a pathogenic process, such as a poliferative change, is evident.

Accordingly, it is proper to focus on the similarities among pathologists rather than emphasize the differences among them.

When Dr. Mauro refers to "adenomas" and Drs. Stejskal and Willigan reference "nodular hyperplasia" and Dr. Robert Squire, a cancer expert at the National Institutes of Health who reviewed some of the liver slides at the request of the FDA Task Force, talks about "neoplastic nodule", each one is calling attention to a proliferative change in the liver. One may grade such a proliferation along the continuum or by different phrases from another one, but basically they imply the same problem. The proclivity of experts to use different terms in liver pathology was recently demonstrated at a workshop at the National Cancer Institute published in "Cancer Research", Vol. 35, Nov. 1975.

Searle also alleges "extreme variation and contraindications in diagnosis" between Drs. Stejskal and Willigan on the one hand and Dr. Mauro on the other. FDA believes that the differences in diagnoses were not extreme and reflect merely the continuum of diagnostic evaluations of the same class that are well recognized in the field of pathology.

2. Searle argues that the IND regulations presuppose that the data which must be submitted must be accurate and reliable. 305 Reply, pages 10, 15. 21 CFR 312.1(a)(6) refers only to "findings" which are significant or alarming. Accuracy is not used as a standard precisely because such findings at this preliminary stage may, in many cases, be undermined. By contrast, the requirement to submit progress reports within a year does state they be "acurate", reflecting the Agency expectation that by then any discrepancies will have been resolved.

Searle argues that the applicable statute and regulations do not require reports of all animal studies conducted during the course of clinical investigations but only reports of testing on humans and of those animal tests conducted before human testing is initiated. In addition, Searle contends that the IND regulations are unreasonably ambiguous. These arguments are without merit.

In the interest of protecting patients taking experimental drugs, the statute authorizes regulations requiring the reporting of animal tests before tests on humans are allowed. However, the regulations also permit so-called Phase I and Phase II clinical (human) trials to proceed before all the preclincial (animal) work is concluded. Accordingly, it is not uncommon that long-term animal studies, such as the 78-week Aldactone study, are undertaken concurrently with initial human testing. Item 10a of the form for the "Notice of Claimed Investigational Exemption for New Drugs" notes that these first two phases "may overlap and, when indicated, may require additional animal data before these phases may be completed or Phase III may be undertaken". 21 CFR 312.1(a)(2). The regulations therefore contemplate additional animal studies during testing in humans.

Searle also seems to rely on the phrase "such investigational use" in subsection 3 of the IND statutory provision, arguing that this refers to human test results only. This is incorrect. The results referred to in subsection 3 are those, as the statute goes on to state, "as the Secretary [by delegation, the Commissioner] finds will enable him to evaluate the safety and effectiveness of such drug in the event of the filing of [a new drug application]". Thus, reports must be submitted to the Commissioner to permit him to determine whether the subsequent new drug application will be approved or denied. 21 U.S.C. 355(b) provides that NDAs must contain full reports of "investigations" which have been made to show whether or not a drug is safe for use. There is no distinction between clinical and preclinical investigation; the statutory phrase included both. Indeed, a new drug application may not be approved unless "substantial evidence" is submitted in support of the safety and effectiveness of the drug substantial evidence is defined in the Act, 21 U.S.C. 355(d), as evidence consisting of "adequate and well controlled investigations, including clinical investigations". Obviously, the Act presupposes that reports will be submitted of preclinical investigations, otherwise the specific reference to "clinical investigations" would be meaningless.

Searle argues that the use of the term "investigators" in the regulations necessarily means investigators involved in clinical investigation. This is not true and the regulations do not use that phraseology. If anything, the regulations make clear that where clinical investigations are meant to be specified, that phrase is used.

Searle further argues that the MBR report cannot be considered a "finding" under the regulations identified by the charge. There can be no question that the readings of a pathologist of tissue slides are "findings" in preclinical tests; the results of an entire study are usually stated in terms of the tissue slide pathology. If anything, the use of the word "findings" in the regulations suggests that information must be submitted to the Agency whether or not it can be considered, of itself, a completed or final "report".

3. Searle notes that the 78-week rat study in question used much higher dose levels than would be the usual human daily dose and thus the tumor findings were neither alarming nor even significant in terms of safety. 305 Reply, page 1. Most investigational toxicity studies in animals involve massive doses of the drug being tested.

The reason for the use of large doses of a drug in test animals is that such tests are designed to identify toxic reactions in those portions of the user population who are most susceptible to the drug. Accordingly, to accentuate the effects and maximize the probability that adverse reactions will become manifest, the relatively small number of test animals are given large doses. In fact, because the purpose of a preclinical toxicity study is to determine a toxicological profile of a drug, the human dose is an almost meaningless comparative measure. In animal studies, the question is what reactions will be manifested, not how much can the animal tolerate.

Even if the comparison were valid, the level of the animal dose as compared to the human dose is misleadingly referenced by Searle. The animal study in question was designed specifically to establish human use for the treatment of severe congestive heart failure at dosage levels four to six times larger than the human dose for which the drug is marketed. Moreover, while comparing the animal test dose to the dosage for human use, Searle fails to acknowledge that at the time of this animal study, it was testing Aldactone in humans at six times the dosage of the drug then approved. In its written reply to the 305 Notice, Searle also emphasizes the lack of significant findings from the study done at Hazelton which was completed on Aldactone at approximately the same time as Searle's own study. The Hazelton study, however, does not balance the Searle study since, among other reasons, the amount of Aldactone received by the highest dosed animals in the Hazelton study was an amount between the low and mid-doses for the Searle test animals.

4. Searle contends that the MBR report was incomplete. However, the report, as received by Searle and ultimately submitted to the Agency, is in precisely the same form as other pathology reports by Dr. Mauro that Searle unhesitatingly submitted to the FDA. In fact, Searle itself was capable of "completing" the study by adding to Dr. Mauro's pathology examination the statistical analysis it had performed in August 1973 and the gross observations from the necropsy. Searle chose not to do so.

5. Searle also insists that Dr. Willigan's diagnosis were more unfavorable to the drug and thus Searle cannot be accused of hiding "damaging" information 305 Reply, page 8. This assertion is very misleading. Dr. Willigan's diagnosis were unfavorable in the same respect (thyroid and testes) as Dr. Mauro's reports were unfavorable; his diagnosis simply made bad news worse. The real significance of Dr. Willigan's diagnosis is that he did not find a statistical significant incidence of liver tumors, which was Searle's greatest concern with the MBR report and was the reason why Dr. Stejskal was asked in August 1973 to initially review the liver slides, not all slides. It should also be noted that until May 1974, when Dr. Stejskal reviewed not only liver slides but numbers of the thyroid and testes slides, the only basis upon which Searle could conclude that the entire MBR report was unreliable was Dr. Stejskal's review of some of the liver slides from the high dose and control groups. Dr. Mauro, on the other hand, looked at approximately 5,000 slides, including 277 liver slides. But even the refutation of Searle's argument tends to obscure the point: The IND regulations are designed to funnel data to the FDA before it is reevaluated, whether the result be to confirm or undermine the initial conclusions.

In a similar vein, Searle also discounts the admittedly unfavorable thyroid and testes diagnosis on the ground that these are endocrine glands and were the "expected" site of drug-related reactions since Aldactone is felt to be an endocrine-active drug. This "target-organ" argument is unsupportable.

Even assuming that a drug acts where it is "expected" to act, the nature of the reaction is not predictable. That is why animal toxicity studies are conducted; to determine the range and severity of reactions. There were many abnormalities in the "target organs" of the rats on this study. A tumor is one of many reactions; but it is one of the most serious kinds of toxic reactions that are seen. Moreover, animal toxicity studies are regularly submitted to the FDA which reveal little or no significant toxic reactions, even in those organs theorized or "expected" as being the "target organs". Because every agent known to cause tumors in men also cause tumors in animals, tumors in animals constitute alarming implications for human toxic reactions.

FDA has required Searle and other manufacturers of oral contraceptives, which are endocrine-active compounds, to conduct long-term animal toxicity tests. When tumors of the mammary gland, one of the endocrine glands, are discovered, the FDA has forced the removal of the particular drug from the market and prevented testing in humans. With the oral contraceptives, all of which have basically the same therapeutic action, some have caused tumors in test animals, others have not. Obviously, therefore, "target-organ" tumors are not predictive.

6. Searle justifies its failure to submit the MBR report based in part on Dr. Mauro's use of terminology in evaluating the thyroid slides, arguing that her choice of words bespeaks Dr. Mauro's unreliability as a pathologist. Dr. Stejskal has also stated that her terminology indicated that her report could not be relied upon.

What Dr. Mauro classified as an "adenomatous goiter", a non-tumorous hyperplasia of the thyroid, was classified by Dr. Williган and Dr. Stejskal as an "adenoma", that is, a benign tumor. Searle never notified Dr. Mauro or MBR of any questions about Dr. Mauro's report, including its terminology. On June 1, 1973, ——— wrote to MBR stating that Searle had received the MBR report and that it "looks just fine". Searle now argues that this reference applies not to the liver or other readings themselves but rather to the form of the report.

Whether form includes terminology we can only speculate. The fact is that the term "adenomatous goiter" is recognized as a very precise reference to a non-tumorous condition of the thyroid probably resulting from a metabolic imbalance. Thus, while Dr. Stejskal suggests Dr. Mauro's analyses were overly general and thus unreliable, her slide readings appear to have pin-pointed a significant distinction in thyroid proliferative lesions.

VI—SEARLE REPLY TO ALLEGATION OF MISBRANDING

Searle's reply to the allegations of causing Aldactone to be misbranded is essentially to accuse the FDA of not moving promptly in its role to review labeling. 305 Reply, pages 22-28. In fact, the Williган report was submitted to FDA in March 1975; the Agency reviewed it and convened the Cardio-Renal Advisory Committee in June, which issued its conclusion in September. Also in September, Searle submitted proposed new labeling and thereafter a proposed "Dear Doctor" letter, both of which were inadequate. By comparison, Searle's first proposed amended labeling for Aldactone came not immediately upon their receipt of the Williган preliminary report in December 1974, nor upon the submission to the Agency of the final report in March 1975 but rather after submission in July 1975 of the MBR report and, notably, after creation of FDA's investigatory Task Force.

The burden to provide adequate labeling is placed by the law squarely on the shoulders of the manufacturer-proponent of a product. Moreover, in order to promptly advise physicians, FDA drug regulations provide that warnings and hazards may be added to drug labeling without prior approval by the Agency. 21 CFR 314.8(d)(1). Searle did nothing to react to the MBR report even after May 1974, when the thyroid tumor problem documented in that report was confirmed by Dr. Stejskal.

FDA, of course, did not have an opportunity to take action on Aldactone labeling on the basis of the MBR report until that report was submitted in mid-July 1975. Searle questions whether the labeling would have been changed on the basis of the MBR diagnosis alone, suggesting that it would not. To the contrary, with respect to thyroid and testes, the findings of the MBR and Williган reports were consistent; the Williган report identifying even more tumors than the suppressed report. If Searle had used the MBR report as received in March 1973, the labeling for Aldactone would have contained a statement—as it does today—about possible dose-related thyroid, testicular and liver consequences. Contrary to the assertion in the 305 Reply, page 26, the FDA does not acknowledge that the MBR report is not the basis of the labeling change. The MBR report supports the labeling reference to liver lesions and, together with the Williган report, substantiate the label warnings with respect to testicular and thyroid tumors.

VII—SUMMARY

In sum, Searle received in March 1973 a pathology report which contained damaging information about its largest selling drug; information that was confirmed two months later by its own Mathematics-Statistics Department. A few of the slides which concerned Searle most, those concerning the liver, were received by an in-house pathologist who took exception with some of the consultant pathologist's diagnoses. On that basis, the entire report, later confirmed by another pathologist to be substantially correct in its results, if not in its slide-by-slide analyses, was withheld from the FDA by Searle for over two years.

The legal as well as the practical answer to Searle's after-the-fact justifications for not submitting the MBR report is contained in Searle's own 305 reply. "The quality of the decision made must be judged by information available at the time, not by subsequent development". Nowhere in its submissions to the FDA does Searle explain why it initially reviewed only the MBR liver diagnoses. Unquestionably, it was the report by its Mathematics-Statistics Department that, just as Dr. Mauro had suggested, there was a drug-related increase in liver tumors. This was the motivation for the withholding of the MBR report, the use of a second outside pathologist and the prompt submission of his findings even though they confirmed drug-related tumors in two other organs.

VIII—CONCEALING MATERIAL FACTS AND MAKING FALSE STATEMENTS IN STUDIES SUBMITTED IN SUPPORT OF SEARLE'S FOOD ADDITIVE PETITION FOR ASPARTAME

A. The Product. Aspartame is the trade name of a sweetening ingredient for food manufactured by Searle. Because Aspartame is a food additive, it may be marketed only upon FDA approval of a petition establishing its safety, which approval is codified as a regulation published in the Federal Register.

Aspartame is a synthetic product based upon two amino acids, 1-aspartic acid and 1-phenylalanine. It is intensely sweet, about 180 times as sweet as sugar, but is metabolized in the human body as a protein unlike sugar which is metabolized as a carbohydrate. Because of its great sweetness, Aspartame used in place of sugar would provide only approximately 1/180th of the calories of a quantity of sugar yielding equivalent sweetness. The potential commercial value of Aspartame is enormous. Searle has built a manufacturing plant solely for the purpose of producing Aspartame.

B. Status of Aspartame. In the Federal Register of March 5, 1973 (38 F.R. 5921), FDA gave notice that a petition had been filed by Searle proposing the issuance of a regulation to provide for the safe use of Aspartame in foods as a nutritive substance with sweetness and flavor enhancing properties. In the Federal Register of July 16, 1974 (39 F.R. 27137) the Commissioner concluded that the evaluation of the data in the petition, which included approximately 150 studies and other relevant material, justified amending the food additive regulations to provide for the same use of Aspartame under specified conditions.

In response to this publication, FDA received objections to the regulation from members of the public and two requests for a hearing, provided under § 409 of the act, 21 U.S.C. 348. Issues concerning the safety of Aspartame were identified by the objectors in the first part of 1975, and it was agreed that there would be an administrative hearing, called a Board of Inquiry. Based upon the Commissioner's conclusion in July 1975 that the integrity of certain animal studies conducted by Searle was questionable, and in conjunction with the establishment of the investigatory Task Force, including auditing of certain animal studies relating to Aspartame, the FDA stayed the effectiveness of the food additive regulation in a notice published in the federal Register of December 5, 1973 (40 F.R. 56907).

After the issuance of the Task Force report in March 1976, FDA began to consider methods by which certain of the studies submitted by Searle would be authenticated at Searle's expense, by a non-government panel of experts. This process, to be performed under a contract approved by the FDA and paid for by Searle, is soon to begin.

The 52-week toxicity study in the infant monkey

A. Initiation and Basic Description of the Study. In November 1969, Searle officials decided it was "essential" to obtain the opinion of Dr. Harry A. Waisman about the differences and similarities in the side effects of Aspartame as compared with those of phenylalanine. Dr. Waisman was a leading researcher associated with the University of Wisconsin Regional Primate Center and had published extensively on the toxicity of phenylalanine. Dr. Waisman's published works establish that phenylalanine is capable of producing brain damage in Rhesus monkeys. The Aspartame study was initiated on January 15, 1970 and terminated on or about April 25, 1971. Searle submitted its report to the FDA on October 10, 1972. A copy of the report of the study, excluding appendix tables, is enclosed. Unfortunately, during the course of this study, in March 1971, Dr. Waisman died.

In this study, seven new-born Rhesus monkeys were placed on a diet which included Aspartame. The first infant monkeys became part of the study in January 1970; the last were added, at birth, in October 1970. The daily feeding of the monkeys, and monitoring and recording their actions, was the responsibility of Mr. Gunther Sheffler, a laboratory technician with a bachelors' degree who was selected by Dr. Waisman. The tables of the laboratory test results, feeding schedules and the like which constitute the summary of raw data of the Searle report were prepared primarily by Mr. Sheffler. Presumably, Mr. Sheffler selected the new-borns for inclusion in the study; his selection was consistent with criteria which may have been set by Dr. Waisman. Although Dr. Waisman had access to and was undoubtedly familiar with the monkey colony at the Primate Center, in all likelihood he rarely if ever directly participated in the conduct of the study. However, he and Searle were responsible for the study design.

The Aspartame monkey study did not have "untreated concurrent controls", that there was no parallel group of new-born monkeys identified and monitored for comparative purposes which were not fed Aspartame. According to a Searle protest drafted several months after initiation of the study, the monkeys were to be kept on a diet with Aspartame for one year, then returned to a basal diet, subjected to behavioral and learning tests; and finally sacrificed and necropsied (autopsied) for the preparation of tissue slides to be reviewed microscopically for alteration (post-mortem work-up). Of the seven test monkeys, one died after 300 days; four were kept on Aspartame for approximately 365 days as planned; and administration of Aspartame for two others was ceased on March 31, 1971, after approximately 200 days. No behavioral or learning tests were performed. Only the one monkey who had died during the test was necropsied and subject to post-mortem work-up.

B. Conflict Between the Study and Searle's Report of the Study. Before commenting briefly on the specific falsifications listed in the 305 Notice and to clarify why this study came to the attention of the Agency, you should note the very great literary license Searle officials took in drafting its report. Searle has repeatedly contended that Dr. Waisman was working on his own, that Searle had little or no control over his activities, that the Searle protocol for this study was drafted after the inception of the study in order to attempt to bring some retrospective structure to the work done by Dr. Waisman and that because of Dr. Waisman's death, the documents reflecting the daily conduct of the study were in chaos.

In essence, Searle now insists that the Waisman study was uncontrolled, and refers to it conspicuously as a "pilot" experiment; its shortcomings are itemized, all but enthusiastically.

Yet, while containing a few carefully couched disclaimers, the report of this toxicity study was submitted to the Agency just like any other of the 150 studies; it bears the authorship of the persons responsible for the study, namely —— and Waisman, in that order; it bears a Searle Pathology-Toxicology project number; it is in standard format setting forth methodology, observations, and the like, including a study design and conclusions.

Searle wanted data comparing Aspartame with phenylalanine. Dr. Waisman was the expert in the field and his name would carry great weight. The report to FDA is drafted in a manner which covers up the admitted inadequacy of the design, control and documentation of the study. However, when Searle is accused or representing this study for far more than it was, it denies almost all knowledge of or involvement with its initiation, design or performance; Searle cannot have it both ways.

Searle's conclusion that it had "no control over conduct of the study, and Dr. Waisman did not have to, nor did he, follow any suggestions by Searle or its employees" is difficult to understand. Searle documents in the possession of the FDA establish that in November 1969, Searle sought to involve Dr. Waisman in a study of Aspartame in order to compare its toxicity, particularly seizures and learning defects due to brain damage, with that of phenylalanine. In January 1970, such a study was initiated. It is also noteworthy that in a memorandum of a September 4, 1970, conversation with Dr. Waisman, —— reports that he suggested to Dr. Waisman that two animals be placed on the study at lower dosage levels within the next few days. This is exactly what happened. Searle asserts that the behavioral testing was never anticipated on this "pilot" study but rather on a subsequent study which was being planned by an associate of Dr. Waisman. 305 Reply, page 36. However, various Searle documents obtained by the Task Force investigators, written both during the subsequent to the monkey study, establish beyond any question that behavioral testing, as well as the necessary post-mortem work-up, was originally planned for this study.

C. Specific False Statements or Concealed Facts. The 305 Notice delineates four false statements and entries in Searle's report of this study. (1) The report failed to reveal that the infant monkeys were not suitable for the study. (2) The report states that acceptable historical and contemporary data on untreated control monkeys were available, thus diminishing the necessity for concurrent control groups of monkeys. (3) The report falsely states that animals were not available for purchase and sacrifice (necropsy) at the termination of the administration of the test compound, as originally planned, because of personnel shortages. This statement also gives the misleading impression that the animals were incapable of being purchased when in fact they were available for purchase, although not immediately, after the test compound had ceased to be administered. (4) The report falsely states that necropsy data on one non-surviving monkey was lost to Searle due to "similar" reasons, namely, confusion and personnel shortages after Dr. Waisman's death. In fact, the data were available and were obtained at the Regional Primate Center by FDA investigators during the Task Force investigation. Moreover, the monkey died approximately five months before Dr. Waisman's death.

1. The first specific violation listed in the 305 Notice is based, in part, upon a January 19, 1972, memorandum written by —— reflecting the reservations of Mr. Scheffler about the suitability and documentation of monkeys for the study. —— notes of a conversation with Mr. Scheffler state: "no extensive records on individual monkeys." In addition, on June 23, 1971 —— was made aware of the fact that one of the seven monkeys on the study "never should have been included in your experiment since he had an obvious birth defect."

Searle asserts that neither nutritional nor reproductive histories of the mothers of the infant test monkeys were in any way significant to the study. Nevertheless, the report states that only "infant Rhesus monkeys (Macaca mulatta) from full term, normal pregnancies" were used. In fact, the mothers were laboratory monkeys and had been on other tests. The impact of the mother's health, nutrition, reproductive history, etc., would be significant were the mother to pass to her off-spring some deficiency, some altered type or rate of metabolism due to another chemical she had been exposed to previously, any or all of which might affect the infant monkey and its reaction to Aspartame. Further, these effects may be completely unnoticed by laboratory technicians.

2. The second specific allegation in the 305 Notice was that the report falsely states that a concurrent comparison control group (monkeys in the study that were monitored but not exposed to Aspartame) was unnecessary because acceptable historical and contemporary data on untreated monkeys were available. Searle admits that there were no existing post-mortem data from other monkeys in the colony but notes that there was such ante-mortem (pre-sacrifice) data for other monkeys. This seems to be correct. And in view of the fact that the study did not include behavioral and post-mortem aspects as originally planned, the non-existence of post-mortem data for untreated monkeys was rendered essentially irrelevant. Accordingly, this alleged falsehood now appears to have been adequately explained.

3. The third charge of falsification in the 305 Notice alleges that the reasons given by Searle for the failure to sacrifice and necropsy the monkeys "at the termination of administration of the test compound", namely, shortage of personnel and lack of supervision following Dr. Waisman's death, are untrue.

Searle's reply to these allegations focuses upon the fact that the monkeys were taken off Aspartame feeding allegedly without notice to Searle, and were thus "unavailable" for sacrifice "at the point of termination". The documents available to the FDA do not now establish that Searle had knowledge of the termination dates of administration of Aspartame (March 31, April 4 and April 25, 1971) until mid-June 1971. But the fact that the availability of these monkeys for purchase and sacrifice did not immediately coincide with the termination of the Aspartame feedings is not relevant; the protocol for this study originally provided for cessation of administration of Aspartame prior to sacrifice and necropsy. Thus, Searle's lack of immediate awareness of the termination of administration of Aspartame does not negate the fact that Searle later had the opportunity to buy the monkeys. Searle could not truthfully assert in its report to FDA that the monkeys were "unavailable"; so Searle stated that they were "unavailable at the time" when they were taken off Aspartame feeding.

Searle's failure to necropsy the animals, including examining brain tissue for those monkeys which had manifested seizures, is more likely based on the fact that Dr. Waisman had no post-mortem comparative data. If Searle had found adverse effects, it would have had no way to show that the consequences were not attributable to Aspartame. Searle did not want to take this chance. But Searle also did not want to admit the real reason for its indifference. The same apprehension of a "can of worms" is reflected in Searle memoranda discussing the potential consequences of Dr. Waisman's feeding of Aspartame to pregnant monkeys.

Reliance upon alleged personnel shortages and lack of supervision do not explain why Searle did not closely monitor this study. FDA investigation did not reveal that things were plunged into chaos by Dr. Waisman's death as Searle has repeatedly suggested. 305 Reply, page 55. Treatment was continued for two to five weeks after Waisman's death on monkeys M-79 and M-14, completing their one year treatment as scheduled. During interviews in February of this year by FDA Task Force members, Mr. Schaffler stated that there were plenty of personnel on hand when Dr. Waisman dies and that when the new laboratory director took over, he dismissed a number of employees because they were not needed.

Searle asserts that it makes no difference what reason is given for certain events as long as the events are true. We disagree. None of the real reasons for Searle's decision not to purchase the monkeys for post-mortem work-up was included in the submission to FDA; the monkeys were available for purchase and post-mortem work-up, but —— advised ——, and Saunders that the monkeys should not be purchased; they concurred. Nevertheless, it may be literally true that the monkeys were not known by Searle to be available "at the termination of administration of the test compound".

4. Finally, the report submitted to FDA states that necropsy data on the one non-surviving monkey, which received high doses of Aspartame and died after 300 days, were lost to Searle due to Dr. Waisman's death.

In fact, the data were available from the Primate Center and were obtained by the FDA Task Force investigators. The monkey died approximately five months before Dr. Waisman's death. Searle does not reply to this charge directly, but rather states that its use of the term "necropsy data" meant tissue slides, not the autopsy report dated October 22, 1970, which Searle claims it never received. It is undisputed that on October 21, 1970, Dr. —— was made aware of the death of the monkey and that sacrifice was planned. Apparently, Searle failed to follow up on this information to determine that a report had been generated.

Searle now admits that it does not know what happened to the "necropsy data"; nevertheless, the report gives an answer as if the facts were known, namely, that the data were lost in the confusion after Dr. Waisman's death. This is an excuse based on no information, rather than the truth.

The 46-week toxicity study in the hamster

A. The study. On April 20, 1970, Searle initiated what was to have been a 104-week toxicity study on Aspartame in the hamster. The study was terminated prematurely, after 46 weeks of treatment, due to an unexpectedly high mortality in both control and treated animals ascribed to a disease known as "wet tail" (severe diarrhea). Searle submitted its report to the Agency on December 8, 1972.

B. The Violation of Title 18. The alleged violation of Title 18, Section 1001, set forth in the FDA Notice of Hearing, is based on the following set of facts: Blood from certain animals in the study was collected for hematology testing and for blood chemistry at the scheduled 26-week interval. Samples were drawn and six different kinds of tests were conducted. Searle technicians appear to have experienced methodology problems with one of these, the test for serum glucose (blood sugar). Searle did not correct the problem with the glucose testing until approximately twelve weeks later. By that time, however, approximately 30 percent of the previously tested hamsters had died. Accordingly, at the 38th week of the study, other hamsters were taken as substitutes from the same feeding groups and blood was collected from them. The glucose values of these new animals were reported by Searle as being those of tests run at 26 weeks on blood samples from the original animals, which had since died. Thus, the glucose values represented for one set of animals at a different time.

C. Searle's Inadequate Explanation. Searle admits the fact that its report contains this false information, but argues that this did not result from willful conduct or any intentional act. Moreover, Searle argues that this falsehood is not material to the appraisal of the safety of Aspartame.

Most Courts of Appeal have held that a violation under §1001 can be sustained only upon a showing of the materiality of a falsehood. However, the courts generally define a "material" statement as one which has the tendency to influence or is capable of influencing. Actual reliance upon false information need not be shown. Nor must the Government prove that the person knew that a statement was false; rather, a reckless disregard for the truth or evidence of a conscious purpose to avoid learning the truth will establish the requisite culpability. Here, documents in the possession of FDA establish at least that —— knew of the need for a second glucose test and knew that hamsters were dying and substitutes were needed.

Searle suggests that these data were gathered and prepared by technicians reporting to Mr. Martinez, and that neither —— nor —— was aware of the existence of the problem concerning these data until they received FDA's Notice of Hearing. However, —— admits in his 305 reply that he was involved in resolving the serum glucose problems, although he claims that he did not review this matter when drafting the report. —— The substitute animals were identified as substitutes on the raw data sheets which, we believe, —— as the authors of this study, were obliged to review and may in fact have reviewed in order to attest to the integrity and accuracy of the report. Further evidence of disregard for the truth will have to be developed by the Grand Jury.

Searle argues that there was no motive for any intentional misrepresentation or concealing of the fact that glucose values for one animal were substituted for those of another. While the question of glucose levels seems to have been non-controversial in this study, the failure of the Searle report to simply note the substitution of test results could be attributed to the fact that at the time of the substitution the animals were contracting a disease and the study was accordingly threatened. Also, the reason for the wide variation in glucose values was, at first, not known. Until —— confirmed that it was a laboratory problem, the unexpected test results might have been thought to indicate severe liver or pancreas reactions in the test animals.

It is true that these entries may not have been material to a determination of the ultimate safety of Aspartame. However, as Searle points out, numerous studies have been conducted and submitted to the Agency in support of the safety of this sweetening agent and thus, arguably, even a wholly fabricated study might not qualify as material in the sense of being a "but for" or independently sufficient basis for a decision.

We believe that the law permits prosecution for a falsehood that has the potentiality for influencing the Government in its evaluation of the immediate report in which the falsehood is contained whether or not the sum of the safety data is altered by the falsehood at issue. Moreover, in this case, the hamster study was selected by the FDA Task Force as one of a few Aspartame studies for review upon the consultation with toxicologists in the FDA Bureau of Foods. Both this study and the monkey study met the criteria for selection of studies established by the Task Force.

Searle argues that the original records relating to the glucose substitutions are in existence and only their destruction or modification would be consistent with an intentional falsification in the final report. This, of course, is not a necessary prerequisite to a finding of intent; if it were, every defendant in every prosecution involving a crime of intent would argue, perversely, that his failure to destroy evidence of his culpability established his lack of intent.

One final note on both Aspartame studies. In considering the extent to which the reports were written to convey impressions more favorable than the underlying data would support, reference should be made to the memorandum of December 28, 1970, from Mr. Helling of Searle to, among others, Drs. ——, entitled "Food and Drug Sweetener Strategy." In that memorandum, Searle commits itself to obtaining favorable review by FDA personnel by seeking to develop in them a "subconscious spirit of participation" in the Searle studies. What FDA needs instead, and must have to evaluate products, are adequate and controlled studies, supported by the raw data, and reported accurately and in a timely fashion. The assumption that these reports can be relied on is at the heart of FDA's mission; the agency cannot possibly look over the shoulder of each laboratory technician or draftsman involved in each of the thousands of animal and human drug studies conducted each year. The FDA must receive the truth, not psychological warfare. To emphasize the importance of safety data on Aspartame, we note that if ultimately approved for marketing, this sweetening agent can reasonably be expected to be part of the daily diet of every American.

IX—INDIVIDUALS WHO APPEAR TO BE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE VIOLATIONS CHARGED IN FDA'S NOTICE OF HEARING

A principal purpose for convening an investigatory Grand Jury would be to identify those persons responsible for any violations of the law investigated by the Agency. The persons named in the FDA 305 Notice were identified on the basis of information known to or obtained by the Agency, but without the benefit of compaulsory process. All Searle officers, employees, and former employees, were interviewed by Task Force investigators in the presence of Searle counsel or monitors.

A. Overall Corporate Organization. The organization charts and similar information-available to the FDA reveal the following major outlines of responsibility within the Searle Company.

In 1971, T.B. Carney, Sr., was the Vice-President of Searle Laboratories for Research, Development and Control. —— was then the Vice-President for research and Development, under Mr. Carney. The research and development group consisted of six branches; Dr. —— was the Director of Biology and was superior to —— head of the pathology/toxicology section. In February 1972, —— replaced Mr. Carney as the head of the RD&C and —— became the Director for R&D. Dr. Francis J. Saunders replaced —— as the head of Biology. The Director of Chemistry, a branch on equal level with Biology was Dr. Paul D. Klimstra. In April 1972, —— became President of Searle Laboratores, a division of G.D. Searle and Company —— was designated as Vice-President for Research and Development.

In July 1973, at about the time that Searle was beginning to deal with the MBR report, the research and development group was reorganized and Dr. Klimstra was made the Director, Pre-Clinical Research and Development, operating directly under —— was made the Director of Pathology/Toxicology and reported directly to Dr. Klimstra. Dr. Saunders was given the title of Director, Research Liaison at the same level as Dr. Klimstra, but outside the reporting chain of —— Klimstra —— In May 1974, —— was given the title of Vice-President for Scientific Affairs although he continued to report —— and remained the immediate superior of Dr. Klimstra who in thru remained the immediate superior of ——. No other structural changs were made, and these designations remained the same through 1975.

B. Responsibility for Failure to Submit the MBR Report. When the MBR report was received at Searle in March 1973 it would have been within the immediate domain of —— Director of the Pathology/Toxicology Department and his superior Dr. Saunders. From about the time that Searle began its Mathematics/Statistical evaluation of the report (August 1973) until its submission, it would have remained within the jurisdiction of ——, who was then reporting to Dr. Klimstra. Dr. Stejskal, who originally reviewed the MBR tissue slide evaluations, was ultimately responsible to —— through his immediate superior in the Pathology Laboratory. —— functioned as head of the Toxicology Laboratory also reporting to ——.

1. Evidence of Responsibility Developed by the Task Force. The Agency has evidence that it was —— who originally requested Dr. Stejskal to review the MBR liver slide analyses in July or early August 1973, and it was either —— who requested further review of liver, thyroid, and testes slides in February 1974, which Dr. Stejskal performed in April or May of that year. —— were fully aware of Dr. Mauro's slide readings by September 1974. According to Dr. Dutt, the then head of Searle's Mathematics-Statistics Department, it was —— who requested him to perform a statistical analysis on the MBR report in August 1973.

The FDA has no direct knowledge of the extent, if any, of personal knowledge or participation of Drs. Saunders, Klimstra, —— in the decision to withhold the MBR report from the FDA. In view of the damaging effect of the liver findings, as well as the testes and thyroid tumors, and given the commercial importance of Aldactone in Searle's marketing line, it is difficult to believe that —— did not advise his superiors Drs. Saunders (and thereafter Klimstra) —— of the MBR report. Restrictive labeling for Aldactone, as in fact eventually resulted, would certainly have rendered these individuals accountable to their corporate superiors for any decline in sales of the drug. The evidence in our investigatory files leads us to the conclusion that —— were in a position to know of the report and certainly had authority to decide not to submit it; we have however no direct evidence of their actual knowledge or participation in that decision.

2. The 305 Replies. In the Searle 305 reply, we are told that —— —— promptly advised Dr. Klimstra of the findings of Dr. Williган. This does not necessarily mean that Dr. Klimstra was advised of the earlier Mauro findings, but it does raise the provocative question of whether Dr. Klimstra, Dr. Saunders and —— were similarly advised when the MBR report was received in March 1973, particularly in view of the fact that Searle had no basis for discounting the MBR report until Dr. Stejskal's August review.

In —— 305 reply, he states that he first learned of the existence of the MBR report on June 17, 1975, as assertion that is certainly appropriate for Grand Jury inquiry. —— however, insists upon defending the institutional action of G.D. Searle and Company by arguing, at page 2 of his reply, that the MBR document was "preliminary and incomplete" since it "did not contain antemortem data, text or results of statistical analyses that are necessary for a final, complete and full report of the study".

This characterization of Dr. Mauro's pathology findings is nonsense. A pathologist's role in a study is to report examination of post-mortem lesions only; the contract pathologist never generates antemortem data or statistical analyses; the MBR report did not contain these and neither did the report from Dr. Williган which waw submitted to FDA. When a firm, such as Searle, receives a report from an outside pathologist, the firm itself provides the antemortem data and conducts statistical analysis. —— further asserts that the MBR report lacks materiality. This is not true. The document was capable of and has influenced the Agency in its decision with respect to the labeling of Aldactone and in limiting human investigational studies.

—— also claims ignorance of the MBR report until June 1975. He admits that he was aware that Dr. Williган had diagnosed the slides from the 78-week study, but insists that he was unaware of any prior involvement in the study by Dr. Mauro —— asserts that —— would not be expected to advise him of the results of pathology analysis on a rountine basis. With certain minor exceptions, the response of —— parallels that of ——. Apparently, neither —— was required to authorize the re-evaluation of the slides for this study by Dr. Williган.

—— strongly asserts the corporate theory that the findings of Dr. Mauro were "so in error and so unreliable that the entire report was deemed untrustworthy"; that it was not a relevant part of the Searle Aldactone study, and in substance that it never was required to be submitted to the FDA. —— assumes full responsibility for concluding that the MBR report was "fundamentally incapable of serving as a valid, defensible representation of the tumor data from the rat study involved". —— claims he did not discuss the document with his superiors. Nevertheless, at page 11 of his reply, —— states in the third person that "internal Searle records show that —— regularly and candidly informed his superiors at G.D. Searle and Company of the toxicologics status of company products, including recommendations relating to procedures and testing programs". While he claims he discounted in toto the MBR findings, —— also states, at page 6 of his reply, that after Dr. Williган's findings were reported he became concerned about human test subjects.

Accordingly, he discussed with Dr. Bernard M. Wagner, Professor of Pathology at Columbia University in New York the "question of tumors in thyroid, testes and liver."

C. Responsibility for False Statements in Reports of Studies on Aspartame. The 305 Notice with respect to Aspartame named. They were the authors of the reports that the FDA believes contain false information and/or omitted material facts. In our view, they are responsible for failing to report the substituted glucose values in the hamster study and are responsible for any false statements or concealed facts resulting from having drafted Dr. Waisman's "pilot" monkey study so that it would appear to be a valid, thorough scientific study.

X—GRAND JURY INVESTIGATION INTO OTHER POSSIBLE OFFENSES

The FDA Task Force investigated 25 studies involving seven products. Its report lists numerous incidences of poor laboratory practices, resulting in discrepancies and inadequacies in data in one or more of the investigational studies in support of each product. Some of these poor laboratory practices were characterized by the Task Force as "deliberate decisions" seemingly calculated by Searle to minimize discovery of toxicity and/or to allay FDA concern. The Task Force report also discusses examples of poor laboratory practices in animal studies submitted in support of the drug Flagyl, which were the subject of special attention at the Congressional hearings.

The Task Force report and each report of investigation for the 25 target studies have been reviewed by my office. Because the law does not make poor animal laboratory practices a punishable offense, much of the questionable conduct by Searle may not fairly be subject to a characterization, under the Act or Title 18, that will with reasonable probability establish a violation before a Judge or jury. For this reason, the scope of the Agency's 305 Notice was far more limited than the findings of the Task Force, whose investigation was designed primarily to review laboratory practices. Our selection of apparent violations for inclusion in the 305 Notice does not, of course, limit the inquiry of your office or by the Grand Jury.

One of the recommendations of the Task Force was that the FDA recommend to the Department of Justice that Grand Jury proceedings be instituted in the Northern District of Illinois using compulsory process in order to identify more particularly the nature of the violations and to identify all those responsible for such violations. Indeed, there are areas in which the Task Force investigation has raised serious questions that we believe your office should consider for presentation before the Grand Jury, but which were now included in the 305 Notice primarily on the ground that the notice is designed to give persons an opportunity to respond to apparent violations of law which the Agency, on the basis of available evidence, intends to recommend for prosecution. The extent to which evidence was available to the Task Force reflects the fact that inspections began three months after the Task Force was created; Searle knew it was going to be audited.

Four decisions or courses of conduct by Searle were specifically considered by our office for Grand Jury review. These are set forth in the memoranda from Arthur Levine to me dated August 6 and 30, 1976, copies of which have previously been provided to the Consumer Affairs Section and to Mr. Branding. Two of these appeal to us to be reasonably fruitful areas for Grand Jury investigation.

1. The Williган report submitted to the Agency in March 1975 contained a computer print-out summary table of tumor findings which did not include four malignant mammary tumors in treated females which had in fact been diagnosed by Dr. Williган and reported in his raw data. Searle explained the omission as the inadvertent error of a programmer in the Mathematics-Statistics Department who listed the mammary tumors as benign, although the raw data sheets she was using as a reference stated that they were malignant. These errors were not detected, or at least not corrected, by the supervisory statistician in that department or by Dr. Stejskal, the pathologist responsible for the study in Pathology/Toxicology Department. Thus the Searle report, based on the pathology examination of Dr. Williган contains, in part, false data.

All of the individuals involved in this episode have been interviewed by the FDA, and state, in essence, that they simply made an error. The FDA investigatory file does not now contain information which would establish a willfully false submission under Title 18. However, the drug industry generally and Searle particularly was concerned about evidence of malignant mammary tumors in test animals (Ex. 22). In order to accept the Searle explanation is to believe that the unfavorable mammary malignancy data were innocently omitted from the summary table four separate times by three different individuals.

2. With respect to the discrepancies between the submission to FDA and the underlying raw data for the 80-week rat study on Flagyl, I concur in Mr. Levine's suspicions that ——— was asked to prepare for submission to the Agency an animal study which was poorly controlled and documented, and that he may well have known that the study contained inaccuracies or at least that the data was incomplete and could not be confirmed, but did not reveal these facts in the report of the study submitted to the FDA.

Two other actions by Searle, discussed in paragraphs 3 and 5 of the August 6 memorandum and which are the subject of the August 30 amended memorandum, do not now appear to be fruitful matters for further investigation within the context of the Aldactone 78-week rat study. However, the general inadequacy of Searle statistical and sampling methods was admitted by Dr. Dutt, former head of the Mathematics-Statistics Department. See Ex. 21. The Grand Jury may wish to investigate consequences of these practices which, unlike the case with Aldactone, were not subsequently remedied. Moreover, Searle's theoretically conceivable but in fact inapplicable arguments over the specific facts pertaining to Aldactone demonstrate a willingness to rationalize in order to avoid admitting any error, even an error which turns out to benefit their product or further corroborates their procedures. See August 30 memo., para. 2.

XI—PROCEDURE

The issues discussed in this transmittal letter as well as those raised by the Task Force report are based upon reports and supportive documents which amount to almost 20,000 pages. The Task Force report, Mr. Levine's memoranda of August 1976, and the Notice of Hearing focus these data into areas of potential criminal liability. It may not be necessary that each document be reviewed by your office in order to develop these matters for further investigation by the Grand Jury. However, Mr. Levine of our office (8-443-4360) and Mr. Carlton Sharp, a compliance officer in the Bureau of Drugs and Chairman of the Searle Task Force (8-443-1940), both of whom are intimately familiar with the facts of this case, would be pleased to provide any assistance in identifying particular documents in support of each charge in the Task Force report, the August memoranda, and the Notice of Hearing.

If you desire to review the exhibits and other significant data, such initial review might most efficiently be conducted in Rockville, Maryland, where the pertinent documents, together with Messrs. Levine, Sharp, and the other members of the Searle Task Force, are located. We would also be pleased to bring to Rockville, or to Chicago, at your request, the lead inspector for the Task Force, Mr. Philip Brodsky, and any or all others of the investigatory team. As issues are delineated and screened, Messrs. Levine and Sharp would be anxious to come to Chicago for whatever time necessary to continue discussions and preparation for the Grand Jury investigation.

In view of the breadth of the FDA investigation, the scientific matters raised, and the large volume of documents already assembled, his assistance would be extremely valuable. Moreover, such a procedure would eliminate any question, whether or not meritorious, that documents obtained by the Grand Jury may be shared only within the Department of Justice and not with the Food and Drug Administration.

As I mentioned previously, Mr. Fred Branding of your office has been kept fully advised of all pertinent developments in this case. Many of the attorneys in our office have had the privilege of working with him in cases recommended by our office. In his conversations with Mr. Levine over the last months, he has expressed a strong interest in this case and we would warmly support his designation as the attorney in your office responsible for reviewing the matter and handling the presentation to the Grand Jury.

As you know, this office cooperates closely with the Consumer Affairs Section in the prosecution of cases under the Act. A copy of this transmittal letter has been sent to Mr. Robert McConachie, Acting Chief. We anticipate that we will be apprised of your review of this transmittal and we and the Consumer Affairs Section will appreciate being kept advised of any developments. Mr. Sharp has already identified many potential witnesses to support the pathology and toxicology principles that underlie the charges in the 305 Notice and the Task Force report.

We look forward to hearing from you following your initial review of these materials, and discussing with you a schedule for future action on this important and precedent-setting case.

Very truly yours,

RICHARD A. MERRILL,
CHIEF COUNSEL,
Food and Drug Administration.

STATEMENT FROM ADRIAN GROSS, FORMER FDA INVESTIGATOR AND SCIENTIST

In the pages to follow here I am presenting a number of comments which you may find informative in any future efforts to curtail exposure to aspartame; those comments are centered around three main topics:

(a) The studies carried out by G.D. Searle & Co. to establish the safety of aspartame are to a large extent unreliable; this is a conclusion that would follow the FDA's own extensive investigations into the acceptability of experimental studies conducted by and for Searle; see top of page 2 here.

(b) Their serious shortcomings notwithstanding, at least one of those studies has established beyond any reasonable doubt that aspartame is capable of inducing brain tumors in experimental animals and that this predisposition of it is of extremely high significance; see bottom of page 16 here.

(c) I would view the Acceptable Daily Intake (ADI) set by the FDA for aspartame (50 mgm/kgm body weight/day) as totally unwarranted and extremely high in that it can be associated with completely unacceptable risks as far as the induction of such tumors is concerned; see top of page 19 here.

(a) The reliability of studies with experimental animals carried out by and for G.D. Searle & Co.

Beginning at the top of the next page there are given a number of quotes from the Final Report of the FDA's Task Force dated March the 24th, 1976, which had investigated the G.D. Searle & Co.:

It is important to realize that this particular document, although signed by the members of a special Task Force appointed by FDA Commissioner Alexander M. Schmidt, in fact represents an FDA institutional view. At the Joint Hearings held by the Subcommittee on Health of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and the Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate (both Subcommittees then chaired by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts) on April 8 and 9 and July 10, 1976, Commissioner Schmidt said (page 3 of the record of that hearing): "today I would like to report to you the final results of the Food and Drug Administration's (FDA) detailed investigation of animal studies performed by Searle. . . ." (emphasis added).

(Page 4 of the record of that hearing):

"Senator KENNEDY. Let me ask you this. These are the conclusions of the (Task Force appointed to that) study. Do you agree with those conclusions?"

"Dr. SCHMIDT. Yes, I do."

"Senator KENNEDY. Yes, you do. Is this the first time, to your knowledge, that such a problem has been uncovered of this magnitude by the Food and Drug Administration?"

"Dr. SCHMIDT. It is certainly the first time that such an extensive and detailed examination of this kind has taken place. We have never before conducted such an examination as we did at Searle."

"From time to time, we have been aware of isolated problems, but we were not aware of the extent of the problem in one pharmaceutical house . . ."

I have reproduced here that particular exchange verbatim since in recent years and apparently at the urging of G.D. Searle & Co., Dr. Schmidt has found it expedient to distance himself from the conclusions in that particular report which he had accepted and represented as his own and as those of the agency he headed at the time (see the copy of the affidavit that he swore to on February the 4th, 1983, and the one sworn to by me subsequent to that date, both of which I had given to you).

To quote then from that particular report of the Task Force identified at the top of this page, much of which was also quoted by Commissioner Schmidt himself at the Senate subcommittee hearings mentioned above here:

(Pages 1 and 2 there):

"At the heart of FDA's regulatory process is its ability to rely upon the integrity of the basic safety data submitted by sponsors of regulated products. Our investigation clearly demonstrates that, in the (case of the) GD Searle Company, we have no basis for such reliance now."

"Reliance on a sponsor is justified when FDA has reasonable assurance that the sponsor will: (1) inform the agency of all material results, observations, and conclusions of an experiment, (2) report fully and completely all of the conditions and circumstances under which an experiment was conducted, and (3) submit its reports to the FDA in a timely fashion so that measures to protect the public health and safety can be taken promptly when warranted. Through our efforts, we have uncovered serious deficiencies in Searle's operations and practices which undermine the basis for reliance on Searle's integrity in conducting high quality animal research to accurately determine or characterize the toxic potential of its products."

"Searle has not met the above criteria on a number of occasions and in a number of ways. We have noted that Searle has not submitted all the facts of experiments to FDA, retaining unto itself the unpermitted option of filtering, interpreting, and not submitting information which we would consider material to the safety evaluation of the product. Some of our findings suggest an attitude of disregard for FDA's mission of protection of the public health by selectively reporting the results of studies in a manner which allays the concerns of questions of an FDA reviewer. Finally, we have found instances of irrelevant or unproductive animal research where experiments have been poorly conceived, carelessly executed, or inaccurately analyzed or reported."

"While a single discrepancy, error, or inconsistency in any given study may not be significant in and of itself, the cumulative findings of problems within and across the studies we investigated reveal a pattern of conduct which compromises the scientific integrity of the studies. We have attempted to analyze and characterize the problems and to determine why they are so pervasive in the studies we investigated."

"Unreliability in Searle's animal research does not imply, however, that its animal studies have provided no useful information on the safety of its products. Poorly controlled experiments containing random errors blur the differences between treated and control animals and increase the difficulty of discriminating between the two populations to detect a product induced effect. A positive finding of toxicity in the test animals in a poorly controlled study provides a reasonable lower bound on the true toxicity of the substance. The agency must be free to conclude that the results from such a study, while admittedly imprecise as to incidence or severity of the untoward effect, cannot be overlooked in arriving at a decision concerning the toxic potential of the product."

In addition to these general comments which are meant to apply to any study with experimental animals conducted by G.D. Searle & Co., that same Task Force Report contains additional references to problems encountered for individual studies carried out by G.D. Searle & Co. specifically for aspartame:

(Page 25, paragraph 3): "In the Aspartame (DKP) 115 week rat study, the submission (to the FDA) states that twelve lots of the test compound, diketopiperazine, a metabolite of Aspartame, were manufactured by a Searle chemist and used in the study. However, the investigators found that some of the batch numbers were merely different drum numbers and actually only seven batches were made. Searle personnel informed the investigators that records of manufacture and assay of two batches could not be located."

(Page 26, last paragraph): "Significant deviations from the protocols of several studies were noted which may have compromised the value of these studies, including the excision of tissue masses (which are likely to represent mammary tumors) from live animals during the course of a study. There is no indication that these deviations were reviewed or approved by the Protocol Design Committee; hence they may represent serious unauthorized changes in the experiments. . . . In at least one study, the Aspartame 52 weeks monkey study, the protocol was written after the study had been initiated."

(Page 32, last paragraph): ". . . there was little continuity of technicians that performed antemortem observations on animals from one observation period to another. In addition to a lack of continuity, there was a lack of adequate supervision and training of the technicians in all phases of the studies, which is documented in the . . . Aspartame (DKP) 115 week rat, and Aspartame 42 week hamster investigation reports. . . ."

(Page 33, paragraph 3): "Protocols normally specified age and sex requirements of animals. In general, these criteria were followed. However, exceptions were found in the 106 week dog study of Aspartame, where the protocol called for dogs to be 150 to 160 days of age and yet three dogs were used in this study that were approximately 70 days older than the protocol specified.

(Page 34, paragraph 2): "At Hazleton Laboratories rats and mice were said to be held for a two week period before they are entered into a study. In the 104 week rat studies of Aldactone and Aspartame there were deviations from this holding period when rats were introduced into the studies after only five or six days respectively."

(Page 36, paragraph 3): "One of the most elementary considerations in a toxicological study is to assure that the test animals receive the active ingredient under test. When the substance to be tested is incorporated into the feed, its homogeneity and concentration in the diet mix should be determined prior to the start of the study. Random samples from freshly mixed batches should be analyzed periodically during the course of the study to ensure that the proper mixing and formulating procedures are being used. In studies conducted by both Searle and Hazleton, little concern was evidenced for the need of proper quality control of homogeneity, concentration, or stability of the active ingredient-diet mixture."

"When Dr. Frederick Reno of Hazleton Labs was asked why Hazleton did not conduct tests on the purity of the test substance, he replied that Hazleton's policy is that the purity of the test material is assumed to be 100% unless notified to the contrary by the client. Tests for (chemical) stability, (biologic) potency and homogeneity of the treatment feed mixture are performed only at the client's specific request; Searle never made such a request of Hazleton in its protocols. Further, Dr. Reno stated that Seale never requested that the basal feed be assayed for residual drugs, pesticides and other contaminants. Hazleton did not conduct such tests for Searle nor were any reserve samples of the treatment mixtures maintained for studies performed for Searle."

"It was noted in the investigation of the Aspartame (DKP) 115 week rat study that drums of the product for each dosage level were identified with color coded labels to match the color of the identification card on the animal cages. When the animal rooms at Searle were inspected on October 17, 1975, it was noted that each drum contained several labels pasted over one another and that the labels underneath the current labels were of various colors. If the current label were to come off, the technician could easily be misled by the label underneath (thus) resulting in a feed mix-up. This is the only study where we found evidence of a test of stability of the test substance in the diet mixture, but the value of this test was negated when, during the course of the study, there was a change in the supplier of the diet and new stability tests were not performed on the new diet-test substance mixture."

"In preparing mixtures of active substance with food both Hazleton and Searle used blenders that were not electrically grounded. This is of concern because of the potential for the electrostatic properties of the test substance to cause it to adhere to the metal walls of the mixer and/or to distribute unevenly through the food, thereby preventing a homogeneous food-test substance mixture."

"In view of the problems noted with all stages from the receipt of the test substance, preparation of the feed-test substance mixture, the failure of both Searle and Hazleton to analyze for concentration, homogeneity, and stability of the test substance in the diets, and the practices of feed replenishment, there is no way in which it can be assured that animals received the intended dosage."

"An exterminator company is employed by Searle for general pest control in the animal rooms. This company has a blanket order to spray the animal rooms twice a month and additional instructions may be given for specific animal rooms as required."

"The investigators were informed that animals are not removed from the animal rooms during the time that they are being fogged with insecticides. Evidence indicates that this practice has been in effect at least since 1970. A memorandum dated September 25, 1970, from Dr. McConnell to Dr. Victor Drill, which appears as a General Exhibit to the Aspartame inspection report, indicates that Dr. McConnell was concerned about this practice; at the time, however, there was no evidence that this practice was ever discontinued."

"The investigators inquired whether basal diets or treatment mixtures were subjected to analysis for pesticides. No records were found to indicate that any treatment mixtures used in the studies were ever tested or assayed for pesticide content."

"Currently a mixer with a capacity of 10 to 12 kg. is used for blending treatment mixtures. The investigators were informed that the mixture is cleaned with water, alcohol, ether, or is dry cleaned, depending on the material blended. When the mixer was examined on October 17, 1975, however, it was encrusted with material from previous use."

"Records are not maintained of weighing and blending of treatment mixtures. After mixing, the mixtures are placed in plastic, teflon lined containers and are identified with color coded stickers. . . . When the investigators examined the containers on October 17, 1975, they noted that the identification stickers of different colors were present underneath the current stickers and that the edges of some of the top stickers were raised."

"Running inventory records for either treatment mixtures or the test compounds used in treatment mixtures are not maintained. Dr. K.S. Rao, Senior Research Investigator (Toxicology), indicated that it is not necessary to maintain such records as fresh treatment mixtures are prepared weeky, biweekly, or every four weeks. Clearly, the lack of inventory records, the lack of batch records, and the lack of homogeneity and stability assays, results in poor control over the treatment mixtures."

"The practices enumerated above are such that any or all of them could compromise the integrity of a study."

(Page 42, paragraph 1): "Technicians participated in many studies simultaneously. The technicians weighing, withdrawing blood, feeding and observing the animals for tissue masses, etc., were not assigned to a particular study, but performed those functions for various studies in progress (at one time). . . ."

"Technician Bartolome Tangonen stated that the appearance of his initials at the top of a page (on the sheets entitled 'Observation for Drug Effects' where the heading provides a space for the name of the technician, but which was not invariably filled in) did not necessarily mean that he actually made the observations described in the sheets or that he filled out the sheets which bear his initials. His initials could indicate that he was supervising the work of other technicians or that he was making the observations."

"Numerous errors and inconsistencies were noted in all the antemortem phases of these experiments. . . . Because many of the observations required are of a subjective nature, continuity of the persons assigned to make these observations is critical, yet the names of the observers entered on the same animal groups are often different for subsequent observations."

"Inconsistencies were noted in observations of findings during the course of the Aldactone 78 week study with animals being reported as alive when they were actually dead, and in the reporting of the presence and location of certian tissue masses. These include approximtely 20 instances of animals reported as dead and then reported as having vital signs normal again at subsequent observation periods. (See Attachment 10)."

"Similar inconsistencies are contained in the Flagyl 80 week rat study, the Cu-7 rat study, the Aspartame (DKP) 155 week rat study, and in the Aspartame 46 week hamster study."

(Page 47 penultimate paragraph); "In the supplementary Statement of Mr. Daniel C. Searle dated February 13, 1976, which was appended to the record of the Joint Hearing before Senator Kennedy held on January 20, 1976, Mr. Searle, referring to the errors on Observations for Drug Effects sheets, stated 'In the truest sense, the errors identified by the FDA (in these records) were completely irrelevant to the scientific conclusions of the study. . .' ".

His comment on the irrelevancy of the mistakes on these records relates to his testimony that other records with information as to the date of death and tissue masses were kept by Searle and these other records contained the 'correct' information."

"We do not agree with Mr. Searle that the information on the Observations for Drug Effects sheets is irrelevant."

"The title printed on these 'Observations for Drug Effects' forms is 'Statistical Work Sheet'; it is therefore reasonable to expect that these 'careless' entries must have formed the basis for input for statistical operations which are crucial to the 'scientific conclusions of the study.' . . . If the alive/dead status of each animal was 'carelessly' entered on these 'statistical Work Sheets', as conceded by Mr. Searle, and if its status as a tumor-bearer at any time was largely in doubt, as demonstrated here, the statistical computations based on this kind of raw input data are of qustionable value, if any, and would clearly affect what Mr. Searle denominates as the 'scientific conclusions of the study'."

(Page 52, paragraph 1): "The removal of tissue masses from rats in a chronic toxicity study is an unacceptable practice, since it may seriously prejudice the findings of the experiment. For example, if the removed mass, when excised, is found to be benign, . . . its excision may have prevented it from becoming malignant, a change which is not unusual, and which is normally a function of time. The purpose of a safety study in animals is to find out as completely as possible all the likely risks associated with the test products. Interference with the natural development of tumors will prejudice the findings of the experiment. . ."

(Page 52, last paragraph): "Animals found dead during the course of a study should be necropsied (examined post-mortem) promptly; when prompt necropsy is not possible, the animal remains should be refrigerated until the next working day, when the post-mortem examination must be performed. Delay or improper handling of dead animals results in the loss of valuable information through autolysis (post-mortem degeneration or spoilage) of tissues. Proper practice following necropsy is to fix (embalm) the tissue in freshly prepared neutral buffered formalin (solution) after slicing the organs and opening the respiratory and digestive tracts to permit penetration of the fixative to prevent autolysis."

"In a number of studies which we investigated at both Searle and Hazleton, loss of information through autolysis of tissues was substantial. While Searle's (written) submissions to FDA stated that animals were necropsied promptly after death, FDA investigators found that this was not always true; frequently animals were fixed in-toto (i.e., without opening up the various organ systems tracts and dissecting and slicing of organs) after opening only the thoracic and abdominal cavities and holding them for periods sometimes longer than a year before they were necropsied. Fixation in-toto is an unacceptable practice and its use by Searle had to contribute to tissue loss. At Hazleton, there was no evidence of fixation in-toto. However the unacceptably high incidence of autolysis, 14 percent in one study, indicates improper handling of the tissues."

"In the Aspartame (DKP) 115 week rat study at Searle 98 of the 196 (50 percent) animals that died during the study were fixed in-toto for periods ranging from 1 day to 1 year before they were necropsied. Of these, 20 animals had to be excluded from postmortem examinations because of excessive autolysis. Dr. K.S. Rao (of G.D. Searle & Co.) realized that Searle's procedures with regards to delays in necropsies were not proper. In a memorandum to Dr. McConnell dated July 13, 1973, Rao stated: "I realize animals which die during the study are the most critical ones to evaluate the (test) compound effects. Hence, our people are now ready to perform a complete autopsy of the dead animals. If there are any special instructions in handling the brain and spinal cord, please advise." (Exhibit R-64 to the Aspartame 115 week rat study). However, Dr. Rao did not write this memorandum until 78 weeks into this study (i.e., not until more than half of the time devoted to it has elapsed). Of the 20 animals in this study which had to be discarded because of excessive autolysis, 13 died prior to Dr. Rao's memorandum; the remaining 7 died subsequent to that memorandum, indicating that his recommendation for prompt necropsy was not followed. In fact, Searle's records show that only 3 of the 20 animals were necropsied on the day they were found dead. Similarly, in the . . . Aspartame 46 week hamster studies, a number of animals that died were fixed in-toto and necropsied at a later date."

withhold from the attention of the FDA possibly real lesions in those experimental animals in which Aspartame was tested for safety.) . . . Had a professional (pathologist) been available to confirm Spaet's findings directly or to provide him with a practical on-the-job training during necropsies, then it would not have been necessary for Dr. Stejskal to have to change (perhaps improperly) or 'second-guess' Spaet's observations. Moreover, Mr. David Kie, a more experienced prosector, was also available during these necropsies and did some of the prosecting himself. Review of the gross pathology records disclosed that, in at least one instance, Dr. Stejskal omitted a statement made on the gross observation sheet by Mr. Kie."

(Page 57, paragraph 2): "Histopathology (the lesions manifest in any tissue by examination under the microscope) is an extremely important morphological indicator of the effects of an insult upon a tissue or cell. Careful preparation, cutting, slicing, mounting, staining, and interpretation of histologic slides from animal tissues to determine the changes occuring in test animals during the course of, and to some extent, as a result of the administration of a test substance to the animals, is crucial if the investigator is to glean valuable information from the experiment. Much valuable histopathologic information was lost in some of the studies which we investigated at Searle and Hazleton through preparation of poor quality slides which could not be interpreted by pathologists; inadequate numbers of acceptable quality slides of certain tissues upon which conclusions were based; and violations of protocol specifications which called for slides to be made of certain tissues for histopathological evaluation which was not done."

"In the Aspartame (DKP) 115 week rat study at Hazleton 3 tissues were noted on single animal sheets as having usual or unusual lesions and, yet, contrary to the protocol, slides were not prepared of this tissue for microscopic examinations. . . ."

(Page 60, paragraph 3): "Included in the report (by G.D. Searle & Co.) to FDA of the Aspartame hamster study is the report (of findings following examination of the) slides of several organs of one animal for which our investigators determined that slides were never prepared. . . . In the Aspartame 104 week rat study conducted at Hazleton, 5 animals were described as having tumors in the histopathological incidence table. A check of the slides and blocks (of tissue from which such slides must have been prepared) reveals that neither were present for the tissues in which the observations were made. Also at Hazleton, positive findings were reported by pathologists on 15 slides of this study but no record could be found that slides were ever made of these tissues. Since the investigation, Hazleton has attempted to determine the source of these errors relating to the tumor slides. The Task Force has received no report of Hazleton's findings."

"Part of the difficulty in attempting to identify precisely what tissues have been examined and what tissues have been reported to the FDA and to make a reasonable assessment of what happened in the conduct of the study, results from the lack of "original" postmortem work sheets or documents. Such instances include the Aspartame 115 week and 104 week rate studies; . . ."

"An example of one occurence which demonstrates the inadequacy of control between gross pathology and histopathology at Searle is available in a description of animal K23CF (an unexposed female animal) in the 115 Aspartame (DKP) rat study. This animal, a control female, was reported on gross necropsy as having a tissue mass of approximately 10x8x3 cm in the left inguinal region. A notation, in a different handwriting, made at the bottom of this gross observation records states, 'no (tissue) mass found in bottle (of fixative into which specimens of such tissue masses are to be placed so as to enable one to collect a sample of such masses for microscopic examination and characterization as to the nature of the mass)'. In the microscopic findings of this study the mammary gland is reported as having a 'necrotizing cystadenocarcinoma (a malignant tumor of the mammary gland); well differentiated.' Dr. Stejskal (the pathologist at G.D. Searle responsible for the pathology operations on this particular study) was asked how it would be possible for this mass to have been read microscopically when the technician responsible for preparing the slides indicated that the mass was not contained in the specimen bottle. (Note that by pretending that a control or unexposed animal manifested a malignant mammary tumor when in fact that animal did not have such tumor or even if it did, that tumor could not be found and therefore could not be confirmed to be a mammary gland cystadenocarcinoma, the significance of the incidence of such tumors amongst animals exposed to Aspartame has been improperly reduced). The pathologists's (Dr. Stejskal's) response, as reported by the investigators, was that, at the time the animals were sacrificed (i.e., killed so that their tissues could be dissected and examined) 'you should have seen things when this study was run—there were five studies being run at one time—things were a mess'."

"The person responsible for most of the reproduction studies reviewed was apparently inexperienced in conducting studies of this nature and yet was given full responsibility at Searle with a title of Senior Research Assistant in teratology. His prior experience was one year's employment with the Illinios Wildlife Service where his work involved population dynamics of the cotton tail rabbit. When asked by the investigators during an interview what qualifications or training he had for conducting reproduction and teratology studies, he replied that shortly after his employment (began at Searle) he went to a meeting (lasting at most for a few days) of the Teratology Society and Searle provided him with any books on the subject he wanted. This individual was also responsible for the training and supervision of a research assistant and two technicians."

"'In view of the information that I have received, I feel the majority of the animals used for this study were sexually immature. Pseudopregnancy of some of the 27 rabbits may have also contributed to the lower conception rate. Some of these points were discussed at the beginning of this study, however we decided to go ahead as scheduled. Perhaps this information can be utilized in future teratology studies so that this type of problem will be eliminated.'

"A July 15, 1975, letter to Searle from one of its consultants on reproduction and teratology (Dr. Geoffrey Palmer from Great Britain) commented on the quality of the studies as follows: '. . . even following the track you did, it seems to me you have only confounded the issue by a series of studies most of which have severe design deficiencies or obvious lack of expertise in animal management. Because of the(se) twin factors, all the careful and detailed examination of fetuses, all the writing, summarization and resummarization is of little avail because of the shaky foundation.' "

(Page 66, paragraph 1): ". . . We conclude that Searle rarely monitored the performance of work done for it under contract (by other laboratories or institutions)."

(Page 66, paragraph 3): "Searle characterized the 52 week monkey study (with aspartame) by Dr. Waisman at the University of Wisconsin as a first priority with the Searle Company. Yet, to the investigators, Searle disclaimed any direct control in the study, despite the facts that the protocol (detailed specifications on precisely how the study is to be carried out) for the study was written by Dr. McConnell (of G.D. Searle & Co.) after Dr. Waisman initiated the study in January 1970; that frequent high-level communication took place between Searle executives and Dr. Waisman prior to and during the study; that Dr. Waisman was paid $15,000 by Searle for consultation on Aspartame; and that Searle provided Dr. Waisman with 200 grams of Aspartame to conduct the studies."

"While high-level communication between Searle management and Dr. Waisman, and knowledge of his activities (Waisman gave a seminar at Searle on his work in October 1970), is evident, there was virtually no effective monitoring of this work."

"From what can be inferred from an interview with Dr. McConnell on October 14, 1975, he had serious reservations about the quality of the study, but he then went on to indicate that, in the absence of hard data to substantiate his reservations, there was no way to set them down in written form in a submission to FDA (i.e., he gave no indication whatsoever to the FDA on such reservations as he said he had)."

(Page 80 at the top): "In the Aspartame 46 weeks hamster study, blood samples reported in the submission to FDA as 26 week values (for certain specified animals) were found by our investigators as being, in fact, values for different animals which were bled at the 38th week. Many of the animals for which these values were reported (to the FDA) were dead at the 38th week."

"In attempting to understand the entries in Table 8 of the Aspartame Food Additive Petition (submitted to the FDA by G.D. Searle & Co.) which described clinical chemistry values (Exhibit H-14 to the inspection report of the 46 week hamster study), the investigators interviewed Dr. K.S. Rao (of the G.D. Searle & Co.) on November 11, 1975, and asked him to clarify certain BUN (Blood Urea Nitrogen) values found in that table. After reviewing the table from the submission (to the FDA) and the original data (in G.D. Searle's own records of observations from which allegedly what was reported to the FDA originated), Dr. Rao replied in writing stating:

" 'It is apparent from the report, that the Appendix portion contains all the individual (animal) values of clinical lab data available from the raw data file. A selected portion of these values appears to have been used in computing group means (which were reported to the FDA). It is not clear what criteria may have been used for selecting a portion of the data or for deleting the others in computing the means (reported to the FDA).'

" 'For the above reasons, I cannot compute the means for the BUN values indicated (in the report submitted by G.D. Searle & Co. to the FDA) from the data available in the Appendix portion of the report.' "

"In the Aspartame 115 week rat study, the investigators point out data appearing on two tables, one in the raw data (in Searle's own files) and the other in the submission (by G.D. Searle & Co.) to the FDA. It is impossible to determine how some of the values in the submission were arrived at, although in two instances the submitted values appear to be an average of the two values shown in the raw data, and in other cases, it appears that a single value was selected from the two values which appear in raw data. These findings appear on pages 10 and 11 of the inspection report of this study and in Exhibits R34 and R35."

Following these quotations from the Final Report of the Searle Task Force, it may be useful to relate here what happened in the Fall of 1975 following that investigation at G.D. Searle & Co., particularly in reference to the aspartame studies:

Inasmuch as only a very small fraction of the fairly large number of studies on aspartame carried out either by or for G.D. Searle & Co. could be audited by the investigators at that time, the decision was made by the FDA to have the original records maintained by G.D. Searle & Co. for the balance of those studies sealed in place at G.D. Searle & Co. so as to preserve their authenticity for a future date when they might also be audited.

In fact, however, the only additional audit as far as aspartame studies are concerned that was carried out by the FDA did not take place until April to August 1977, i.e., almost two years subsequent to the original audit. Even then, only three additional studies were audited: two of these were relatively minor ones on the embryotoxic and teratogenic potential for aspartame (one in the rat and one in the mouse) while the third one was the same long-term study in rats of 115 weeks with DKP that had already been investigated during the original audit in 1975. Aside from this, as far as I know, no additional efforts at auditing any other study on aspartame was made by the FDA despite the fact, as mentioned earlier, that a relatively very large number of studies with experimental animals have been conducted by or for G.D. Searle & Co. for this particular food additive.

This apparent refusal by the FDA to do what would have been the "right" thing to do in this case is even more difficult to comprehend if one considers additionally that.

In December 1975 i.e., as a consequence of the initial findings by the FDA on the reliability of the aspartame studies conducted by and/or for G.D. Searle & Co., the FDA decided to prevent aspartame from entering the market;

The findings during the 1977 audits not only confirmed those made in 1975 with respect to the lack of reliability of the studies of aspartame, but actually extended them in a substantial fashion;

Despite all this, the FDA refused to allow its findings on the reliability of the aspartame studies to be put before the Scientific Board of Inquiry concerning aspartame which had been convened following the request of Dr. John W. Olney of the Washington University School of Medicine in St. Louis, Mo. and Mr. James Turner, a Washington, DC attorney. This refusal took place even though the two gentlemen insisted that such concerns on the reliability of the two studies were directly related to the evidence (or lack of it) for the safety of aspartame;

Although largely as a result of the findings arising from the 1975 investigation at G.D. Searle & Co., the U.S. Congress appropriated an additional $16,000,000 or so to the FDA for the express purpose to do a better job at monitoring the quality of studies carried out by the regulated industry and although the FDA took this money and recruited a large number of investigators allegedly to devote to this program, other than the limited audits carried out in 1977 by the FDA with respect to aspartame, apparently nothing more in the way of such audits were carried out for this particular product. Therefore, most of the raw data that had originally been sealed by the FDA at G.D. Searle & Co. in 1975 were eventually unsealed and returned to the custody of G.D. Searle & Co., without any further attempts at validating the reliability of such reports as that firm had elected to submit to the FDA on the safety of aspartame.

This kind of track record on the part of the FDA does not seem to me to inspire much confidence that the health of the people of this country is in fact adequately protected by its regulatory activities.

As to what was uncovered as a result of the 1977 audit, you may recall that I had given you a copy of that particular EIR (Establishment Inspection Report); that 76-page document came to be known as the "Bressler Report" after the name of the leader of the team of investigators and scientists that participated in that particular audit, Mr. Jerome Bressler, an FDA investigator located in the Chicago District. A perusal of its contents reveals that the original (1975) findings with respect to the 115-week rat study with DKP, or diketopiperazine, a breakdown product of aspartame, were confirmed with respect to:

Discrepancies between what was found in G.D. Searle's own internal records on the circumstances of the conduct of this study and on the observational findings actually made and what was actually reported by that firm to the FDA with respect to:

—The presence of tissue masses likely to be tumors (e.g., animal No. F6HF; —Grossly detected pathological changes in general for the experimental animals;

—Records of ophthalmoscopic examinations for those animals;

—The alive/dead status of each animal at any given time;

—The presence of certain microscopically evident lesions when the G.D. Searle & Co. records indicate that such findings could not possibly have been made since no such examinations were made;

—Problems with clinical laboratory determinations;

The multifaceted evidence for this study being flawed due to:

—Substitution of some of the animals in the study;

—The presence of intercurrent disease and the administration of drugs to combat this, neither of which were completely reported to the FDA;

—Incomplete examination of tissues from the experimental rats;

—Excision of tissue masses likely to be tumors from live animals in this study;

—Absence of batch records and records for the mixing of the test substance into the diet of the experimental animals;

—Incomplete stability studies for the agent on test;

—Absence of homogeneity studies for the agent on test;

—Deficiencies in the methods of chemical assay for the actual DKP that was mixed into the diet of the experimental rats;

—Problems with the dosage of DKP given to the experimental rats;

—Problems with the fixation in-toto and autolysis;

—Failure to report to the FDA of all tissue masses (likely to be tumors) which were found in the experimental rats;

—Failure to report to the FDA of all internal tumors present in the experimental rats, e.g., polyps in the uterus (Animal K9MF, ovarian neoplasms (Animals H10CF, H19CF, and H7HF) as well as other lesions (Animal D29CF);

—Inconsistencies between different parts of the report on this study submnitted by G.D. Searle & Co. to the FDA on the percise nature of the lesions manifested by the test rats;

—Numerous transcription errors in that report.

Interestingly, the Bressler group found not only that no homogeneity tests were conducted by G.D. Searle & Co. on the mixture of the test agent with the diet of the experimental rats, but they obtaned direct evidence that in fact the distrbution of the test agent in that diet was clearly not homogeneous due to failure to have the test agent ground in a sufficiently fine manner. A Polaroid photograph of a sample of that diet obtained by the investigative team actually shows the test agent in the form of coarse particles within the diet. It follows that the experimental rats could eat that diet without actually touching the DKP and, consequently, no-one could state with any assurance just how much DKP (if any) those rats were actually exposed to in the course of that study.

In sum, problems such as this leave rather gaping holes in the reliability of such tests of safety as were conducted by G.D. Searle & Co. not only in general with respect to any of their products, but more specifically with respect to aspartame itself. And yet, it seems as if none of this had inhibited in any way or restrained the FDA from approving this product for marketing in an extremely widespread fashion.

(b) The problem with the brain tumors noted in the experimental animals:

You may recall that amongst the material that I had given you there was a rather extensive prepared statement by Dr. Olney before the Scientific Board of Inquiry. I shall not comment here on the bulk of Dr. Olney's concerns on the safety of aspartame; rather I shall limit myself here to only one aspect discussed by him there—the matter of the tumors of the central nervous system of the exposed rats. This can be found in Part III of that prepared address of Dr. Olney's.

Table 1 of Part III in that presentation by Dr. Olney presents the pertinent data on this:—no animals with any brain tumors were noted amongst the 120 control or unexposed rats, 5 were found with brain tumors amongst the 160 rats exposed at the low level of aspartame (1-2 grams/kg. body weight) and 7 were found with brain tumors amongst the 160 animals exposed to the high rate of 4-8 grams/kg. body weight. These three rates represent incidences of respectively 0.00%, 3.13% and 4.38%.

The question that arises as soon as a distribution such as this is observed is quite simple:—did the agent on test, aspartame in this case, cause the brain tumors noted amongst the animals exposed to it, or rather can one view the occurence of such tumors only in the two groups of rats exposed to aspartame as merely a "chance" event, an occurence unrelated to their exposure status?

The usual way the FDA (and any other recognized scientific institution) answers this kind of question is to compute the probability that a distribution such as the one observed here can arise due to sheer chance; if it turns out that such probability is rather small (0.05 or 5%) the policy in scientific circles is to state that the result observed has achieved "high statistical significance". What this implies is that the probability of the incidences observed arising by chance alone (i.e., that they are unrelated to the agent on test) is so small (5% or less) that one would not be justified in concluding that the test agent was not a factor causing such incidences.

In other words whenever the results of an appropriate statistical test for significance yields a p (for probability) value equal to or less than 0.5 or 5%, the policy in the FDA and in any other scientific or regulatory circles is to regard the agent on test as being a cause of the increase in incidence of whatever kind of lesion is being evaluated amongst the exposed animals by comparison with the control incidence. I am saying, therefore, that whether the agent on test had in fact caused that particular increase in incidence is not a matter that is usually decided according the "opinion" of any scientist or group of scientists; it is not a matter that is put to some kind of "vote", or on which there must be some form of "consensus"; rather, the decision is made by the results of the test for statistical significance—the "p" value is either larger than 0.05 and one then views the results as not having achieved statistical significance, or it is 0.05 or less in which case one must conclude that the results are statistically significant i.e., that they are extremely unlikely to be due to chance alone.

The data on brain tumors amongst the rats exposed to aspartame that were presented by Dr. Olney in his Part III, Table 1, have been analyzed statistically by me and the following are the results of my computations:

Slope of dose-response function	0.005,891
Standard error of this slope	0.003,046
Chi square for significance of this slope	3.724
"p" or probability of this chi square	0.027

The entry in the last row above, $p = 0.027$, indicates that the results on the incidence of brain tumors that were tabulated by Dr. Olney, had in fact achieved rather high statistical significance since $p = 0.027$ is barely more than half $p = 0.05$.

In fact, the statistical significance that applies here is considerably larger yet if one considers that brain tumors amongst rats are ordinarily very rare. In his Table 2 of Part III, Dr. Olney presents the results of what he had gleaned from the world literature on this subject—the "historical control rate" for such tumors amongst large populations of rats indicates that no more than 49 animals afflicted with them have been found amongst nearly 60,000 rats, an incidence rate of less than one tenth of 1 percent.

Interestingly, the FDA seems to have a policy that whenever faced with decisions of this sort, it never fails to consider this aspect of the "historical control" incidence; a recent example of this can be given in their decision concerning the carcinogenicity or cancer-induction propensities of a number of color additives, a matter that arose as recently as last year. One cannot help wondering just why they failed to consider this particular aspect in reference to the cancer-induction of aspartame. Had they in fact addressed the "historical incidence" of brain tumors amongst rats as presented by Dr. Olney, they could not have failed to conclude what I have concluded:—that the significance that attaches to those tumors amongst the rats exposed to aspartame increases many-fold over the already high significance mentioned above when what was observed merely in this particular study is considered.

In view of all these indications that the cancer-causing potential of aspartame is a matter that had been established way beyond any reasonable doubt, one can ask:—What is the reason for the apparent refusal by the FDA to invoke for this food additive the so-called Delaney Amendment to the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act? Is it not clear beyond any shadow of a doubt that aspartame had caused brain tumors or brain cancer in animals, and is this not sufficient to satisfy the provisions of that particular section of the law?

Given that this is so (and I cannot see any kind of tenable argument opposing the view that aspartame causes cancer) how would the FDA justify its position that it views a certain amount of aspartame (50 mgm/kgm body-weight) as consituting an ADI (Allowable Daily Intake) or "safe" level of it? Is that position in effect not equivalent to setting a "tolerance" for this food additive and thus a violation of that law? And if the FDA itself elects to violate the law, who is left to protect the health of the public?

(c) Precisely how safe is the FDA's estimate of the Allowable Daily Intake (ADI) of 50 mgm/kgm body-weight for aspartame?

Even though the FDA seemingly declined to apply the provisions of the Delaney Amendment in this case, they could have still elected to subject the data on brain tumors to a formal Risk Assessment or Risk Analysis; this is a procedure on which they have a regulation and FDA policy is to carry out such formal Risk Assessment in the case of suspected carcinogenic agents which find their way into human food through exposure to them by food-producing animals. In other words, this is not some kind of technique that would be new or unfamiliar to that regulatory agency. And yet, it appears that either that specific procedure was not attempted at all in the FDA as far as aspartame is concerned, or, if attempted, its results were set aside or ignored.

In this section I shall present the results of my own computations involving the risks of brain tumors; the specific set of data analyzed has been given in the previous section here—the incidences of such tumors as tabulated by Dr. Olney in his presentation before the Scientific Board of Inquiry with respect to aspartame.

The first item to be considered is that if one wishes to extend safety data from small laboratory rodents such as rats to much larger mammals such as humans, the exposure rates expressed in grams per body-weight must be modified or corrected by a certain adjustment.

The reason for this is that relatively small animals have, per unit body-weight or mass, a much larger body-surface. It is well known that most metabolic functions are better related to body-surface than they are to body-weight. For example, if one were to provide general anesthesia, say, for an elephant, and one were to select the same dose in mgm/kgm body-weight of a general anesthetic which is used in humans, chances are excellent that the animal will promptly die due to a drug-overdose; the reason for this is the same—for a given unit of body-weight, the elephant has a much smaller total surface area than the human and, therefore, a much lower tolerance for any drug given on a basis of body-weight.

The usual adjustment aimed at correcting this problem is to find what dose in humans is equivalent to a certain dose given to rats (expressed in grams per kgm body-weight). In the particular study of Searle where the brain tumors were found, the average adult weight of male rats was 506 gms. and that for female rats was 331 gms, for an average weight for the two sexes of 418.5 gms. A 60 kgm adult human is "worth" on a weight or mass basis $60{,}000/418.5 = 143.37$ such rats. On a body-surface basis, however, that same 60 kgm. human would be "worth" only the two-thirds power of 143.37 i.e., only 27.39 rats of an identical average weight. Thus, in order to have equivalence between humans and rats, doses expressed in grams/kgm body-weight for the rate must be divided by the one-third power of 143.37 i.e., by 5.23. It is clear that 5.23×27.39 is 143.37, the ratio of the body-weights for the two species.

The formal risk assessment was carried out by utilizing two separate techniques: one was the Mantel-Bryan approach (also known as the log-probit method) while the other was the so-called One-Hit procedure. The latter is defined as $P(d) = 1 - \exp(-\lambda d)$ where P stands for probability, d for dosage, $\exp(i)$ indicates e, the wellknown mathematical constant, 2.718, raised to the power of $-\lambda$, and λ stands for a constant to be estimated from the observed experimental results.

The Mantel-Bryan procedure, published nearly a quarter century ago in 1961 in the Journal of the National Cancer Institute (Vol. 27, page 455, under the title "Safety Testing of Carcinogenic Agents") represents the first rational and formal approach at risk analysis; in the time elapsed since its publication it has gained extremely widespread recognition and acceptance. Such regulatory agencies as the FDA and the EPA use it routinely in their risk assessment procedures inasmuch as it is being generally regarded as a "classic" method.

I have used here both of these extrapolating techniques with a confidence interval of 90 percent, and in either case the Abbott Correction was utilized.

The table that follows presents the "virtually" safe levels of aspartame expressed in mgm/kgm body-weight corresponding to a variety of upper limits on the risk with the data derived, as explained, from the observations on brain tumors in rats as tabulated by Dr. Olney. The results for each of the two methods of extrapolation (the log-probit and the one-hit procedures) are presented for either rats or humans; as explained on the previous page here, the estimates for the human are 5.23 times smaller than those for the rat due to the necessary correction for the relative body-surface of the two species.

RESULTS OF THE FORMAL RISK ASSESSMENT

[Based on data for brain tumors in rats]

Extrapolating procedure: Upper limit on brain tumor risk	"Virtually safe" levels of aspartame expressed in mgm/kgm body-weight
	Mantel-Bryan or log-probit method		One-hit method
	For rats	For humans	For rats	For humans
1/100,000,000	0.380	0.072,6	0.000,731	0.000,140
5/100,000,000	0.733	0.140	0.003,66	0.000,699
1/10,000,000	0.983	0.188	0.007,31	0.001,40
5/10,000,000	2.00	0.382	0.036,6	0.006,99
1/1,000,000	2.74	0.524	0.073,1	0.014,0
5/1,000,000	5.95	1.14	0.366	0.069,9
1/100,000	8.45	1.61	0.731	0.140
5/100,000	20.0	3.82	3.66	0.699
1/10,000	29.7	5.67	7.31	1.40
5/10,000	79.6	15.2	36.6	6.99
1/1,000	126	24.1	73.1	14.0
1/100	733	140	735	140

Examination of the entries in the table just above reveals that for very small upper limits on the risk, the one-hit procedure yields estimates much smaller than those generated by the log-probit method: For an upper limit on the risk as small as 1/100,000,000, the one-hit estimates are some 520 times smaller than the corresponding ones resulting from the log-probit approach. However, for larger upper limits on the risk, this difference between the two kinds of estimates gradually disappears—thus, for an upper limit on the risk as high as 1/100 the estimates generated by each of these two separate methods of extrapolation appear to be virtually identical.

If we now wish to enquire on the upper limit for the brain tumor risk associable with 50 mgms/kg body-weight for aspartame (the level that the FDA views as constituting an Allowable Daily Intake or ADI), we may consult the table on the previous page here; 50 mgms/kg body-weight for humans would fall between the entries in the third-last and the second-last row in that table; the upper limit on the risk would, therefore, be between 1 and 5 per thousand population for each of the two extrapolating procedures. More exact interpolation would yield for 50 mgm/kg body-weight for humans (equivalent to 261.69 mgm/kg body-weight for rats) an upper limit on the risk of 2.27/1,000 population under the log-probit kind of extrapolation and 3.57/1,000 population for the one-hit kind.

It is clear that risks of this magnitude for what the FDA regards as a "safe" level of exposure to aspartame represent an outright calamity or disaster. In fact, were the Allowable Daily Intake of aspartame be only one-tenth as large as decreed by the FDA, i.e., in the neighborhood of merely 5 mgm/kgm body-weight, the table on the previous page reveals the upper limit on the brain tumor risk would still be as large as approximately 1/10,000 population for the log-probit method and almost 5/10,000 population for the one-hit procedure, both of which would seem to me to be clearly and totally unacceptable. Even if the FDA's ADI were one-hundred times smaller (i.e., no more than 0.5 mgm/kgm body-weight) the upper limit on the brain tumor risk can be seen in the table on the previous page here to be approximately between 1 and 5/1,000,000; considering the widespread consumption of soft-drinks containing this food additive in this country alone, I should think that even this would represent a rather high risk.

This concludes my remarks that were briefly summarized near the bottom of the first page of this communication.

I should add here that the views given above are strictly my own and that they do not represent in any way those held by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency where I am currently employed; that agency has no regulatory jurisdiction or interest in food-additives such as aspartame.

Wishing you and Senator Metzenbaum the very best and continued success in all your legislative efforts, and particularly those that involve aspartame, I remain, Mr. Wagoner,

Sincerely yours,

M. ADRIAN GROSS,

Office of Pesticide Programs.

STATEMENTS FROM COMMUNITY NUTRITION INSTITUTE

A national organization, Aspartame Victims and Their Friends, Inc. was launched today at a Washington, D.C. press conference in which one of the organization's founding members announced that a lawsuit would be filed against G. D. Searle and Company, makers of aspartame under the trade name NutraSweet.

The organization, which is affiliated with the Aspartame Resource Center of the Community Nutrition Institute, a Washington-based consumer group, will be located in Ocala, Florida, and will operate a national telephone hot line.

A founding member of the organization, Mrs. Shannon Roth, Ocala, who recently lost vision permanently in one eye, said the onset of her blindness began with the use of NutraSweet and her vision deteriorated over a period of several months during which she consumed large amounts of the sweetener. Her loss of vision is linked to aspartame by her physician and other medical authorities.

Roth said she is filing a personal injury lawsuit against Searle in Florida, and that she is joining with several other members of "Victims" to file a personal injury claim against the Food and Drug Administration (FDA). James Turner, an attorney and consumer activist, said that an administrative petition is being filed with the Justice Department as the preliminary step toward the eventual personal injury lawsuit against FDA.

CNI's Executive Director, Rod Leonard, said the new organization would provide a link between aspartame users who have experienced adverse reactions and have suffered injury and economic loss. He described the symptoms which include grand mal seizures, severe suicidal depression, temporary and permanent blindness, menstrual problems and other severe disorders.

Leonard said that he and Turner also are filing a request with FDA to create a national surveillance program on aspartame complaints. He said FDA Commissioner Frank Young had told Senators John Heinz and Howard Metzenbaum that the agency is considering the establishment of a Clinical Adverse Reaction Review Committee on aspartame, including the orderly collection and transmission of reports from FDA field offices.

"The orderly collection and transmission of reports will be a charade," Leonard said, "unless the FDA also sends a memorandum to physicians, health clinics, psychologists, allergists and other specialists informing them of the plan by FDA to collect information on adverse reports." He and Turner said a national monitoring program must include notification of physicians.

Turner is also representing CNI and others in a legal action to require FDA to hold a public hearing to review the decision to approve aspartame for use in fluid products. The lawsuit, which is currently pending in the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, also asks the court to direct the FDA to suspend the authorization for aspartame as a food additive pending the outcome of the hearing.

COMMUNITY NUTRITION INSTITUTE,
Washington, DC, September 13, 1984.

Dr. FRANK E. YOUNG,
Commissioner, Food and Drug Administration, Rockville, MD.

DEAR MR. COMMISSIONER: This letter is a request for the Food and Drug Administration to establish and maintain a surveillance program to monitor the complaints of all consumers regarding aspartame, a sweetener product that is marketed as NutraSweet by Searle and Company. When FDA approved in July 1983 the use of aspartame in liquids, the agency was aware of health concerns expressed both by scientists (particularly the instability of the substance in liquids) and consumers and said it would monitor complaints.

However, no monitoring program was established until February, some eight months later, after we specifically requested that some action be taken by FDA to fulfill its July pledge. We proposed that the Centers for Disease Control be asked to make an epidemiological evaluation of the complaints, and we were subsequently informed that a monitoring program had been initiated—including a CDC evaluation.

We now have learned enough information to question whether an aspartame monitoring program ever has been, in fact, carried out by FDA. The evidence suggests that FDA has sought to avoid the collection and analysis of complaints, and has instructed regional offices to withhold data from its Washington headquarters.

For example, FDA has informed us and others that it has received some 680 complaints that were forwarded to CDC, with the implied conclusion that this is the total number of complaints. However, in discussions with the staff in the Freedom of Information Office (FIO) at FDA, we now learn that those complaints were all received prior to February or March of this year, and do not include any complaints received subsequently.

In addition, the FIO office said that regional FDA offices had been told that only "serious" complaints should be forwarded to FDA headquarters; and, for the guidance of regional office staff, a "serious" complaint is one in which the illness is severe enough to require the attention of a physician.

Thus, no effort has been made since April to determine the actual extent of consumer reactions to NutraSweet, or to analyze and categorize the complaints. In at least one regional office—located in Philadelphia—we understand that NutraSweet complaints filed since June have not even been examined.

We also had requested FDA early this year to notify physicians the agency was monitoring complaints of adverse reactions to aspartame, or NutraSweet. We were told that FDA had no intention of inviting physicians to send in reports of complaints. This attitude now seems self-serving on the part of an agency that instructs its field offices to forward only those complaints which have been filed by individuals who sought the counsel of their physician because of the severity of their reaction.

This also is a self-fulfilling argument for the basic FDA position that complaints about aspartame, or NutraSweet, have no pattern, and that all of them can be explained by the placebo effect—i.e., whenever any new product is introduced, it will be seized upon by the public as the source of their ailment. FDA has made no efforts to alert physicians to its need for information, but instead waits on consumers who seek medical advice about their complaints to make a special effort to alert FDA to the problem. Thus, FDA has consistently limited its knowledge as to whether a problem may or may not exist.

On the surface, FDA has made a gesture towards monitoring that the agency hopes will satisfy the public. In fact, the agency appears to want no information and is making no effort to acquire data on adverse reactions.

The material sent to CDC is meaningless, and no substantive conclusions can be drawn from an epidemiological assessment of data that has made its way through the indifference of public officials. The reports available to CDC are not reflective of the complaints that have been directed to FDA, nor do they represent a random selection of information from physicians.

This episode illuminates a darker problem within FDA and the procedures now employed in the regulation of food additives. Had aspartame been introduced as a drug, physicians would be routinely monitoring the reaction of their patients when prescribing the substance for use in weight control or for other special dietary purposes. The effects of aspartame, specifically the amino acid components, have been characterized by a number of scientists as the same as those of a drug. In approving the substance as a food additive, however, FDA has told physicians, in effect, that no adverse reactions should be expected; i.e., symptoms of aspartame use cannot be ascribed to the substance, according to the federal government.

The health consequences of aspartame have been a controversy of long standing within FDA. Over the 14 years prior to its approval, the agency had repeatedly examined the data on its health implications and could not make a declarative scientific finding that the substance is safe for use in the American food supply. Subsequent studies and further analysis of the data have served only to raise additional questions that preclude a finding that the product is safe. Only last week, for example, D. Jeffrey Bada of Scripps Institution in La Jolla, CA, found that potentially harmful chemical changes occur when NutraSweet is heated in liquid form. Your agency said it is reviewing the study "purely out of scientific interest," which is an odd reaction considering that the test performed by Dr. Bada should have been conducted by FDA before approving NutraSweet. In the face of this pattern of scientific controversy, which is further buttressed by the nature of the complaints of those consuming the substance, the least FDA should be doing is carefully monitoring the effects of aspartame on its consumers.

Thus far, FDA has spurned its responsibilities, and has no monitoring strategy. As the newly appointed Commissioner, you have the opportunity to take a more responsible stance than did your predecessor, and I urge you to develop and make public an effective and intensive surveillance program to monitor the health consequences of the consumption of aspartame. We stand ready to assist you in any way that we can.

Sincerely,

RODNEY E. LEONARD.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD J. WURTMAN, M.D., MASSACHUSETTS INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY, TO SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND HUMAN RESOURCES

Thank you for inviting me to comment on issues raised concerning the safety of aspartame when used as an artificial sweetener.

I am a physician, a research scientist, and a professor of neuroendocrinology and neuropharmacology at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. For the past 15 years, much of my research has dealt with the effects of food constituents on the chemical composition of the brain, and on various brain functions and types of behavior. I have studied these effects in experimental animals, normal people, and people with brain disorders. My interest in aspartame derives from the fact that it contains two amino acids, phenylalanine and aspartic acid. Aspartame's consumption raises the levels of these amino acids in the blood stream, and one of them—phenylalanine—thereupon produces chemical changes in the brain. In 1980 I was invited to testify before the Board of Inquiry on aspartame, convened by the Food and Drug Administration, concerning the possibility that the aspartic acid in aspartame might do damage to the brain. I concluded then and continue to believe that there is no significant risk of toxicity from the aspartic acid in aspartame. Subsequently, however, I became concerned about risks that might result from the phenylalanine in aspartame, especially if—as seemed likely—the introduction of aspartame into soft drinks would increase the quantities that some people consumed beyond the FDA's consumption estimates (for example, on a hot day). My laboratory initiated pilot studies on this question about two years ago, and in July of 1984 we received a grant from the National Institute of Neurological and Communicative Diseases and Stroke to extend these studies.

I believe that the information now available about aspartame warrants the following conclusions about its possible effects on the brain:

1. When aspartame is consumed by laboratory rats in doses consonant with those sometimes ingested by people, it changes the chemical composition of the brain: It alters the brain's levels of some amino acids, and thereby affects the production and release of some of the neurotransmitters that the brain uses to carry signals from one nerve cell to another. These changes are enhanced when the aspartame is consumed along with a food that is rich in carbohydrate (as happens, for example, when someone eats a jelly sandwich or cookies or pasta along with diet soda). The changes in neurotransmitter release are likely to affect numerous brain functions (like the control of blood pressure, or the appetite) and aspects of behavior.

2. When normal human volunteers consume aspartame in doses that are high—but within the FDA's estimates of 90th percentile intakes—blood amino acid levels change in ways that almost certainly produce corresponding alterations in the chemical composition of their brains (especially if the aspartame has been ingested along with carbohydrate-rich foods). However the particular changes that occur in the human's brain are likely to be different from those occurring in the rat's. (This is because the rat's liver destroys the phenylalanine in aspartame very quickly, while the human's liver destroys the phenylalanine much more slowly. The predominant effect of aspartame on the human's brain is likely to be an increase in its phenylalanine levels; the predominant effect on the rat's brain has been shown to be an increase in its levels of tyrosine, another amino acid that is formed when the liver metabolizes phenylalanine.) Hence, while it seems likely that aspartame, in doses of sufficient size, will affect brain functions and behavior in people, the precise nature of its effects cannot necessarily be predicted using data from experiments on rats. It is necessary also to do functional and behavioral studies on people—normal people; people with metabolic disorders that impair their ability to metabolize phenylalanine; and people with brain disorders that might sensitize them to whatever changes in brain chemistry the aspartame might produce.

3. Such studies are essential before we can state categorically that aspartame does not affect the brain. However—in the absence of positive evidence that aspartame produces deleterious effects, their performance would not seem to be a prerequisite to the continued general use of aspartame. Of greater concern are the numerous anecdotal reports, written by consumers (and, in some cases, physicians), suggesting a relationship between their consumption of aspartame-sweetened foods and the subsequent appearance of various neurological and behavioral sequellae. A recent report prepared by the Center for Disease Control for the Food and Drug Administration summarized the contents of several hundred such letters; it concluded that the question of whether the sweetener can cause the signs and symptoms that have been ascribed to it can be resolved only by "controlled clinical studies" carried out in medical research centers. (In such studies, patients would alternately receive aspartame and a placebo, double-blind, while their physical condition was being carefully monitored.) I agree with the CDC and the FDA that it is imperative that such studies now be done. I also agree that, even though the evidence for a causal relationship (between aspartame consumption and subsequent behavioral or neurological symptoms, as described by some patients) is, in some cases, highly suggestive, such uncontrolled, anecodotal case reports provide an insufficient basis for limiting aspartame's use.

4. If aspartame does produce side-effects involving the brain, and if these side-effects result from the sweetener's phenylalanine content, then their production almost certainly requires that large amounts of aspartame—probably several grams—be consumed. The problem at present is that it is difficult if not impossible for the patient or his physician to know how much aspartame he has eaten or drunk. A can of diet soda is required to indicate that it contains aspartame, but nowhere on the can need it be stated how much aspartame it contains. I doubt that one consumer (or physician) in a thousand now realizes, for example, that a can of TAB provides less than one-fourth as much aspartame as a can of DIET-PEPSI or DIET-COKE. The unavailability of this information causes countless people to worry about aspartame who should not (because they consume only tiny amounts of it). Moreover it deprives consumers (or their physicians) of the ability to calculate how much aspartame they have drunk on days when they think the sweetener might have caused side-effects; and it deprives them of the opportunity to set reasonable limits on their aspartame intake. I believe it is essential that companies which include aspartame in their products be required to indicate on the labels (in readable print) how much of the sweetener is present in each can or serving. This simple change in labeling practice would, I believe, sharply reduce the number of consumers who believe without probable foundation that they have suffered aspartame related side-effects. Perhaps more importantly, it would also enable physicians to identify those patients who might really have had such responses, so that such people might then undergo controlled clinical testing.

Thank you again for giving me this opportunity to express these views.

STATEMENT OF DR. LOUIS J. ELSAS II

Thank you for your inquiry regarding the Phenylalanine containing sweeteners Nutrasweet, Aspartame, and Equal. All are dipeptides composed of two amino acids, aspartate and L-Phenylalanine. The following are responses to several inquiries like your own.

First let me allay your anxieties by saying that there have been no documented side effects from L-Phenylalanine-containing sweeteners.

1. I have no insight into alleged "victims" of aspartame, but suggest that after eating or drinking aspartame-containing food stuffs and while symptomatic, the blood concentrations of L-Phenylalanine be quantiated. Inquire where and how from your local physician or University medical center. Human biochemical geneticists usually can provide this service. A comparative repeat sample should be quantitated when symptoms are no longer present.

2. From my own and others studies, high blood concentrations of L-Phenylalanine are harmful to human brains in at least three situations:

a. In older than 6 months old children and adults with mature brains high blood concentrations will prolong performance time, slow brain wave cycles (EEG) and reduce neurotransmitter production in a reversible manner.

b. In newborns to 6 months old with rapidly growing brains elevated blood phenylalanine produces irreversible brain damage by slowing migration of oligodendroglia (brain cells) and altering myelin (nerves' insulation) formation.

c. In pregnancy, if the mother's blood phenylalanine is raised to high concentrations, her child's brain development can be irreversibly damaged.

No one has determined "how high" the blood phenylalanine must be elevated to produce any of these bad effects under any of these conditions or age groups. It has not been proven that "all people can take as much aspartame without fear of ill effects as they desire." In fact there are many genetically susceptible people: affected patients with phenylketonuria (about 20,000) and their asymptomatic parents (about 4,800,000 based on a U.S. Population of 240,000,000) who should not take unlimited amounts of aspartame until this information is available.

Several clinical investigators and organizations such as the Centers for Disease Control and the American Academy of Pediatrics are deciding on how to address these issues. In the interim I would suggest moderation particularly if you are pregnant, breast feeding or have had symptoms directly related to ingesting phenylalanine-containing sweeteners.

BIOCHEMICAL AND NEUROPSYCHOLOGICAL EFFECTS OF ELEVATED PLASMA PHENYLALANINE IN PATIENTS WITH TREATED PHENYLKETONURIA

(A Model for the Study of Phenylalanine and Brain Function in Man)

ABSTRACT

Phenyletonuria provides a human model for the study of the effect of phenylalanine on brain function. Although irreversible mental retardation is preventable through newborn diagnosis and dietary phenylalanine restriction, controversy exists regarding the effects of increased concentrations of phenylalanine in older patients. We have studied ten older, treated, phenylketonuric patients using a triple-blind, multiple trials, crossover design. Each patient was tested at the end of each of three 1-wk periods of high or low phenylalanine intakes. Tests included a repeatable battery of neuropsychological tests, analysis of plasma amino acids, and measurement of urine amino acids, phenyl organic acids, dopamine, and serotonin. In all 10 patients, plasma phenylalanine rose (900—4,000 μM). In 9 of 10 patients there was an inverse relationship between plasma phenylalanine and urine dopamine excretion. When blood phenylalanine was elevated, these patients had prolonged performance times on neuropsychological tests of higher but not lower integrative function. Urinary serotonin fell during phenylalanine loading in six patients. The concentration of phenylacids in the urine was not proportional to the plasma phenylalanine at concentrations below 1.5 mM. In one patient, neither performance time nor dopamine excretion varied as blood phenylalanine rose or fell. We interpret these data as follows: blood phenylalanine above 1.3 mM impairs performance on neuropsychological tests of higher integrative function, this effect is reversible, and one mechanism may involve impaired biogenic amine synthesis.

INTRODUCTION

Nearly a half-century ago Folling (1) attributed a syndrome of mental retardation and aberrant behavior to an inherited metabolic error. Since then, phenylketonuria (PKU) [1] has been the prototype for investigations of the effect of phenylalanine on central nervous system function in man. It is clear that if plasma phenylalanine is normalized before age 3 wk through dietary restriction of phenylalanine irreversible mental retardation is prevented (2). The mechanisms of producing this permanent structural damage remain unclear, but several hypotheses have developed. Decreased or abnormal myelin formation and/or impaired oligodendroglial migration during the first 6 mo of postpartum brain development are the most probable mechanisms.

Controversy persists regarding possible effects of elevated phenylalanine on brain function when development is nearly complete in older, treated patients with PKU. Whether or not elevated concentrations of phenylalanine disturb central nervous system function in these patients is unknown. Since ~1 in 16,000 Caucasian newborns (Georgia statistics) is affected with PKU, and effective newborn screening has prevented permanent brain damage since 1970 in the newborn screenee, an answer to the question of whether high plasma phenylalanine affects mental function becomes more urgent for this accumulating population.

Silverman and Guthrie (unpublished observations) approached the question by administering one loading dose of phenylalanine to control subjects, heterozygotes, and homozygous affected patients with PKU and compared errors in response time among the three groups. Their results suggested a difference among the three groups which related directly to the concentrations of plasma phenylalanine achieved.

In 1980, Waisbren et al. reviewed the available literature on psychological assessment of children after termination of phenylalanine/restricted diets. Results were mixed, some showing a drop in IQ and other achievement test scores and others showing no change. Numbers of patients, study design, and assessment tools varied greatly among the reports. The PKU Collaborative Study began a prospective study in 1967. Results of achievement tests (Stanford Binet. Wechsler Intelligence Scale (WISC), Wide Range Achievement Tests [WRAT]) on 81 children, 38 of whom had continued the diet beyond 6 yr of age and 43 of whom had discontinued at 6 yr of age, were reported in 1982. Results at 8 yr of age showed slightly lower achievement in reading and spelling in the discontinuers. No significant difference in IQ between the groups was observed after this 2-yr interval. Brunner et al. in a recent study (1983) reported a negative correlation between performance on neuropsychological tests and serum phenylalanine concentration on the day of testing in a group of early treated patients age 6–13 yr. Neither of these studies used the patient as his/her own control Interindividual variation, differences in phenylalanine concentrations achieved and in techniques used by collaborating centers have hindered interpretation of results.

In in vitro systems, phenylalanine influences the synthesis of two biogenic amines, dopamine and serotonin, which are critical compounds in neurotransmission. Both tyrosine-3-hydroxylase (E.C.C.1.14.16.2) and tryptophan-5-hydroxylase (E.C.C.1.14.16.4) are rate-limiting enzymes in the synthesis of dopamine and serotonin, respectively, and are competitively inhibited by phenylalanine at millimolar concentrations. Another potential inhibitory effect of phenylalanine on biogenic amine synthesis is through impaired uptake of tyrosine and tryptophan across the blood-brain barrier. Phenylalanine, tyrosine, and tryptophan share the same transport system and compete for a common transport function at physiologic concentrations. Since transport of amino acids across the blood-brain barrier is the rate limiting step in the movement of amino acids from plasma to brain, and since their plasma concentration is near saturation of their transporter proteins, increased concentrations of plasma phenylalanine could limit the transport of tyrosine and tryptophan and thus their availability to the brain cell membrane for neuropeptide synthesis or conversion to biogenic amines.

The current study compares specific neuropsychological tests with changes in plasma phenylalanine and biogenic amine production in young adults and older children with PKU. Although the dopamine excreted in the urine is a reflection of multiple sources of dopamine synthesis, we chose to measure urine dopamine, since it reflects 24-h production of the amine, not an acute level, and becuse urine collection is a noninvasive method of obtaining biologic fluids. Assessment is made of competitive inhibition by phenylalanine of tyrosine and tryptophan transport by kidney tubule. We use a triple/blinded, crossover, clinical protocol to circumvent the influence of individual variations in this disorder.

METHODS

Study design. 10 patients with PKU, aged 6–24 yr, were admitted on a 21-d protocol to the Emory Univeristy Clinical Research Facility. Informed consent was obtained from adult patients or from the parents of patients <21 yr of age. Each patient served as his or her own control. Each patient was admitted on one of two double crossover protocols and five were studied in each protocol group. Either the patient entered on a low dietary phenylalanine which was increased the second week and decreased the third week (low-high-low) or in the reverse pattern (high-low-high). Patients equilibrated for 7 d after each change I dietary phenylalanine. Past plasma concentrations of phenylalanine on known intake and genotyping of parents were used to determine the amount of phenylalanine added to patient formulation for restriction and loading (23,24). Patients whose entering concentration of plasma phenylalanine was high either because of poor control or because of diet discontinuation for several years were on the high-low-high protocol. Five other patients who had been in consistently good dietary control entered the study on the low-high-low protocol.

The study diet was based on Phenylfree or Lofenalac as a phenylalanine-free amino acid source. A specified amount of tasteless I-phenyulalanine was added to the formula during the loading phases. The study was triple-blinded: neither the patients nor their parents could taste the difference in formula and were unaware of their experimental condition: the psychologist administering the neuropsychologic tests was uninformed of the patients' blood phenlyalanine concentration; and the laboratory personnel performing amino acid, organic acid, and amine analyses did not know the condition under which sample were obtained.

Biochemical tests. Blood and urine samples were obtained on all patients at the beginning of the first week as a baseline and at the new equilibria achieved at the end of each 7-d interval.

Plasma and urine amino acids were analyzed by ion exchange chromatography on the Beckman model 119 CL using lithium buffers (Beckman Instruments Inc., Palo Alto, CA). Because tryptophan is somewhat labile in extraction from blood, recovery of "spiked" standards from whole blood and urine was quantitated to determine losses. In the physiological ranges measured from 50 to 200 μM, recovery was 82–90% efficient. Data are presentred normalized to an internal standard without correction for these specific losses which are in the range for the internal standard, S-2-aminoethyl-L-cysteine.

Dopamine assays were performed using the single isotope radioenzymatic assay developed by Peuler and Johnson. This method used catechol-o-methyl transferase from rat liver to transfer a radioactive methyl group from S-adenosyl methionine to catecholamine, forming methyl catecholamine derivatives which were then characterized by radiochromatographic analysis. The assay was sensitive in urine to 120 pg/ml for dopamine.

Serotonin was determined by a radioimmunoassay developed by Peskar and Spector (26) using rabbit antibody prepared by coupling serotonin to bovine serum albumin. The antibody bound 50 percent of ^{3}H-serotonin in the absence of free serotonin. Less than 1 ng of free serotonin was detected by standard displacement methods.

Urine organic acids were analyzed by gas chromatography on a HP 5992 gas chromatograph/mass spectroscope and quantitated on a HP 5790 gas chromatograph. Organic acids were extracted with ethyl acetate and ether and derivatized with trimethylsilane and bis-(trimethysilyl)trifluoracetamide (27). The level of sensitivity for phenylacids in urine was ~5 μg. Specific recovery of phenylacetic, phenyllactic, and phenylpyruvic acids were 68, 91, and 58 percent, respectively. All calculations are corrected for these losses by parallel external and internal standards used during extraction, derivatization, and quantitation.

Renal clearances were calculated for phenylalanine, tyrosine, and tryptophan, from timed 24-h urine collections and midpoint plasma collections. Both specimens were quantitated for concentrations of amino acids and creatinine. The glomerular filtration rate (GFR) was calculated from the creatinine clearance, as were the rates of a specific amino acid filtration, excretion, and reabsorption using the following formulation: $F_{AA} = GFR \times P_{AA}$, $E_{AA} = U_{AA} \times V$, $T_{AA} = F_{AA} - E_{AA}$, where U was urinary amino acid concentration in mg-ml, V (urine volume) in ml/min, and P_{AA} the plasma amino acid concentration in mg/ml. The F_{AA} (filtered aminoacid), E_{AA} (excreted aminoacid), and T_{AA} (reabsorbed aminoacid) were expressed in mg/min. Percent reabsorption was calculated as $T_{AA}/E_{AA} \times 100$.

Neuropsychological tests. Measurements of general intelligence and achievement were based on the Wechsler Intelligence Scales. (The Wechsler Adult Intelligence Scale for adults and the WISC for children) and the WRAT. To determine the influence of phenylalanine concentrations on neuropsychological performance, a repeatable battery of tests was developed and administered as a baseline on admission to the study and at the end of each 1-wk treatment period. A confounding variable inherent in tests given multiple times is subject learning. Two procedures were incorporated in the study design to reduce the artifacts due to learning. For one group of test (type 1. Table I), the subject was allowed to practice the task until the asymptote of the learning curve was reached. Any changes in performance after becoming maximally competent with the task then reflected experimental manipulation of the patient. This procedure would not eliminate learning artifacts from a second group of tests (type 2, Table I). Because of this limitation, equivalent forms of this latter group tests were developed to be given at the end of each of the experimental conditions. Table I lists the test names and the neuropsychological variables they measured.

Interpretation of data. Data are arrayed for all subjects in tabular form (Tables II, III, IV, and V) to emphasize intraindividual differences because of the wide interindividual variability in age, sex, intellectual competence, and phenylalanine requirements. From these tables, individual differences and choice reaction time and the direction of change between the two dietary conditions are calculated and plotted against changes in plasma phenylalanine during the same intervals in Figs. 2 and 3.

Patient profiles and study design. Age, sex, IQ, and achievement scores for all patients are listed in Fig. 1. Each patient was given a symbol which was used in subequent graphs. IQ scores below 85 in A.S. and K.K. were explained by their late diagnoses and treatment at 5 and 18 mo of age, respectively. K.K. is the older brother of T.K. Both D.A. and W.J. were diagnosed and treated before 3 wk of age and both had IQ scores which were consistent with parental scores (D.A.'s parents' scores were 103 and 83; W.J.'s were 88 and 70).

Biochemical results. Plasma and urine amino acid and urine organic acid concentrations are presented for all patients in Table II during each of the three experimental conditions. The level of dietary phenylalanine was calculated from actual intake in the Clinical Research Facility. Emory University. The time interval of 7 d required for stablilizating the plasma phenylalanine concentration on a constant diet was determined by sampling one subject daily. A new plateau of blood phenylalanine concentration was achieved on the sixth to seventh day after each diet change. The plasma phenylalanine reflected the diet changes, and the relationship between intake and plasma concentration demonstrated interindividual variation between ingested phenylalanine ranging from 36 to 130 mg-kg per d and plasma phenylalanine concentration ranging from 800 to 4,400 μM.

Urinary phenyl acids are not detected in the urine of normal subjects. Four of the five patients who were on the High-low-high protocol and had not recently been on restricted phenylalanine intake were exreting large amounts of phenylpyruvate and phenyllocate at the end of the first week of high phenylalanine intake. Excretion of both fell dramatically after 1 wk of restricted phenylalanine intake. However, excretion reached the original high levels at the end of the third week (high dietary phenylalanine). In the low-high-low group who had been on continuous dietary control before entry into this study, excretion of organic acids never reached the high levels of the other group despite comparable plasma phenylalanine levels. In general, <50 mg of phenylacids per gram creatinine were excreted until the plasma phenylalanine rose above 1,500 μM. Those with the highest plasma phenylalanine did not consistently excrete the greatest amount of derived organic acids.

The results of dopamine and serotonin excretion are arrayed in Table III. Results were normalized to creatinine excretion. Interindividual variation in dopamine excretion was great. In general, the patients who were on the low-high-low protocol and had been on consistent dietary management before the study achieved higher levels of dopamine excretion than did those patients in the high-low-high group who were not well controlled immediately before the study. This kind of separation was not seen for serotonin excretion. Changes in dopamine excretion varied inversely with changes in plasma phenylalanine in 9 of 10 patients. The inverse relationship of changes in plasma phenylalanine concentrations and urinary dopamine excretion are graphed in Fig. 2. Solid symbols represent patients on the high-low-high protocol. Open symbols represent patients on low-high-low protocols. Results from all patients cluster in quadrants I and III regardless of the protocol (high-low-high or low-high-low) where quadrants I and III circumscribe an inverse relationship between plasma phenylalanine and urinary dopamine concentrations. Symbols in quadrant I show an increase in urine dopamine with decrease in plasma phenylalanine, those in quadrant III show a decrease in urine dopamine with an increase in plasma phenylalanine. Serotonin excretion did not vary directly with changes in phenylalanine.

Studies of membrane transport. To explore the possibility that increased concentration of phenylalanine might competitively inhibit tyrosine or tryptophan uptake by the only plasma membrane transport function available for study in children, we quantitated their renal tubular transport. Renal tubular reabsorption data were obtained on eight patients under these conditions of phenylalanine loading and are presented in Table IV. Phenylalanine did not inhibit tyrosine reabsorption by renal tubular epithelium at the levels of filtered phenylalanine reached in these patients. At the highest rate of filtered phenylalanine (45 mg/min/M2 in patient A.S.), we observed no less than 99% reabsorption of tyrosine. Maximum renal uptake of tryptophan was also seen at these filtered loads of phenylalanine. These findings differ from earlier results reported by Lines and Waisman, who reported a generalized aminoaciduria in PKU patients and suggested the possibility of competitive inhibition of reabsorption by high filtered loads of phenylalanine. However, their data were not adjusted for surface area. Our data for renal tubular transport provide negative evidence for a significant effect of phenylalanine on tyrosine uptake in the proximal renal tubule at the same time that dopamine excretion is reduced. Whether or not the lack of effect of increased phenylalanine reabsorption of amino acids in the proximal renal tubule is an appropriate reflection of transport across the blood-brain barrier is not known. Evaluation of blood-brain barrier transport using invasive techniques is not ethical in healthy children. Nuclear imaging techniques may be useful in the future.

Neuropsychological tests. Part of the purpose of this study was to determine the kinds of tests most suitable for determining possible changes in performance in treated PKU children challenged with phenylalanine. We found that many of the standard tests were too difficult to be applicable across the age group we were assessing and data could not be obtained on all 10 subjects. More complete analysis of these issues will be presented in a separate paper. Results are presented here for those tests on which data were obtained for all subjects. Data were obtained from all 10 subjects on the Choice Reaction Time when figures were used for matching. They were also complete on the Pegboard Test, the Tapping Test, and on Trails "A". Table V summarizes the results of the Choice Reaction Time and the Grooved Pegboard Test. The latter is a test of visual-spatial-tactile coordination and motor speed, whereas the Computerized Choice Reaction Time is a test of visual-perceptual discrimination, and by comparison is a test of higher integrative function. The Grooved Pegboard Test results are typical of results of the tests of lower integrative function, i.e., no significant differences were seen between conditions. In three other tests of lower integrative function of which the Grooved Pegboard is representative, <3 of 10 showed changes consistent with changes in plasma phenylalanine. Those results are not reported here. In the Choice Reaction Time Test, 7 out of 10 subjects showed changes concomitant with changes in plasma phenylalanine, i.e., reaction time was prolonged with increased plasma phenylalanine. M.F., who did not demonstrate typical changes in his Choice Reaction Time, also did not have a decrease in urinary dopamine when plasma phenylalanine concentrations were elevated (compare Table V with Table III, week 1 to week 2). Differences in Choice Reaction Time were not as consistent in K.K. and A.S. as in the other subjects. It is pertinent to note that K.K. and A.S. were not treated effectively early in life, and were less competent by achievement testing than many of the other patients (see Fig. 1). A graphic display of changes in phenylalanine and changes in Choice Reaction Time among those 10 patients is shown in Fig. 3. A direct relationship was seen between changes in plasma phenylalanine concentration and reaction time. When plasma phenylalanine increased, the choice reaction time increased, that is, performance worsened. Conversely, when phenylalanin concentrations fell, choice reaction times were shorter, which indicated improved performance. Solid symbols again represent patients on high-low-high dietary protocol and open symbols those on low-high-low dietary protocol. Symbols in quadrant II represent changes of increased choice reaction time with changes reflecting increased plasma phenylalanine concentrations. Symbols in quadrant IV indicate decreased choice reaction time with decreased plasma phenylalanine (Fig. 3).

DISCUSSION

Although mechanisms are unclear, the negative effect of increased blood phenylalanine on the developing human brain during infancy and early childhood is clear. Early dietary restriction of phenylalanine prevents irreversible brain damage in children detected and treated for phenylalanine hydroxylase deficiency. The studies reported here investigate whether elevated blood phenylalanine in the older child and young adults is associated with altered mental function, and if so, by what mechanism.

Early studies by Weil-Malherbe, Nadler and Hsia, and McKean demonstrated decreased levels of catecholamines in blood, urine, and autopsied brains of untreated patients with phenylketonuria. McKean also demonstrated improvements in visual evoked response in three severely retarded untreated patients when dietary phenylalanine was restricted or when catecholamine precursors were administered without restricting phenylalanine in the diet. He postulated that although concentrations of tyrosine (1.2×10^{-4} M/g of brain) in brain of hyperphenylalaninemic patients were well above the K_m reported for tyrosine hydroxylase in mammalian brain tissue (5×10^{-5} M), phenylalanine itself might inhibit tyrosine hydroxylase activity directly. This hypothesis was supported by in vitro observations of Undenfriend who found that phenylalanine was a competitive inhibitor of rat brain tyrosine hydroxylase with a $K_i = 1.7 \times 10^{-5}$ M. Since the concentrations of phenylalanine found by McKean in his autopsy material averaged 8.4×10^{-4} M, such a mechanism of competitive inhibition was possible.

Phenylalanine may impair production of two psychoactive amines, namely dopamine and serotonin. Curtius et al. described both decreased serotonin and dopamine synthesis in patients with high plasma phenylalanine concentrations caused, by both phenylalanine hydroxylase deficiency and disorders in the tetrahydrobiopterin pathway. He also postulated competitive inhibition of both tyrosine and tryptophan hydroxylase by high phenylalanine at 1,500 and 600 μM concentrations, respectively Katz et al. demonstrated the direct conversion of 20 μM phenylalanine to dihydroxphenylalanine without the release of free tyrosine in rat brain striatal synaptosomal preparations. Phenylalanine was only 1/10 as good a substrate for this enzyme as tyrosine. However, he suggested that phenylalanine could be a substrate for tyrosine hydroxylase in the presence of saturating concentrations of tetrahydrobiopterin, and could be a competitive inhibitor as well.

Note.—The space between patients A.S. and D.A. separates the patients on the high-low-high protocol above from those on the low-high-low protocol below. The choice reaction time represents a mean of 20 trials. The pegboard results represent a mean of four trials.

Our results in vivo in treated PKU patients conform to the hypothesis that high phenylalanine inhibits dopamine synthesis, since 24-h urine dopamine excretion fell when plasma phenylalanine concentrations were maintained at an elevated concentration for days by dietary manipulation. A consistent relationship was not found between plasma phenylalanine and serotonin excretion in our study. Serotonin is stored in many tissues, and this inconsistency may be related to the high "background noise" of excretion of stored serotonin during a 24-h period.

The results from our experiments do support the hypothesis that brain function is altered by phenylalanine at the equilibrium concentrations achieved in the study. The battery of neuropyschological tests showed differences in a performance test which required higher integrative function rather than fine motor coordination. This was consistent over the whole group, regardless of the age or competence of the patients. Although many test batteries have been used in other surveys, the computerized reaction time has not been reported. We are currently attempting to determine whether patient competency, age, attention, or other factors influence the neuropyschological response to increased plasma phenylalanine, and deriving tests to maximize changes in accordance with patient competency.

Our data support a mechanism for prolonged performance through an inhibition by phenylalanine of biogenic amine synthesis. In our study when dopamine excretion fell, blood phenylalanine rose and performance times were prolonged. Data from two patients deserve special attention: the patient with the lowest IQ (K.K.) who was not diagnosed until 18 mo of age demonstrated expected biochemical changes in uninary dopamine excretion when phenylalanine concentrations were increased, but test scores on the Computerized Choice Reaction Time were unchanged. It is not surprising, in view of his overall low performance and achievement, that reaction time improved over the 3-wk period independent of the plasma phenylalanine, which suggested a gradual learning effect rather than relationship to biocheminal status. It is also likely that intellectual competency of a patient will control the amount of change produced by altered phenylalanine. The lower the individual's competency, the less change might be expected. The one major outlier (M.F.) did not show consistent trends in neuropsychological tests or in catecholamine excretion. despite attaining a concentration of 1,402 μM plasma phenylalanine, he excreted barely measurable amounts of derived organic acids. We can speculate that he has other "protective" functions. Possible mechanisms include impaired transport of phenylalanine across the blood brain barrier or an increased rate of phenylalanine incorporation into new protein synthesis. He could also have some "protective" variation in tyrosine hydroxylase which prevents inhibition by phenylalanine. He emphasizes the indivduality of patients with phenylketonuria and the "sensitivity" of brain function to phenylalanine loading.

The impairment in choice reaction time and decrease in dopamine excretion seen with increased plasma phenylalanine were reversible within the week periods studied. We are currently investing a variety of repeatable neuropsychological and electrophysiological tests with which to assess performance in patients with varying competency, age, and achievement scores.

These data support the hypothesis that high concentrations of phenylalanine reversibly affect neuropsychological performance, probably through reduction in L-dihydroxyphenylalanine and dopamine production. The mechanisms may be through increased intracellular phenylalanine and competitive inhibition of brain tyrosine-3-hydroxylase. Whether intracellular concentrations of brain tyrosine are diminished is unknown. Although the concentrations of blood phenylalanine attained in our studies did not inhibit renal tubular reabsorption of tyrosine, it should be noted that the transport K_m of phenylalanine, tyrosine, and tryptophan in brain and kidney differ. Additionally, the blood-brain barrier is saturated at normal plasma concentrations, whereas the renal tubular epithelium is not (16–19). Since nearly 80% of all brain dopamine is found in th corpus striatum, decreases in dopamine synthesis could affect neuropsychological functions that involve both nigrostriatal and corticostriatal pathways. This could explain the deterioration in response of our patients to a timed test, the Computerized Choice Reaction Time Test, which required integration of stimuli and a motor response. We have recently observed a change in the mean power frequency of electrical impulses detected by EEG in a different group of patients with phenylketonuria who were studied under similar clinical research protocols. This type of electrophysiological approach could assist in anatomical localization of changes in brain function.

[Report From Annals of Internal Medicine, February 1985]

ASPARTAME-INDUCED GRANULOMATOUS PANNICULITIS

(Nelson Lee Novick, M.D.)

The low-calorie artificial sweetener, aspartame (NutraSweet; G. D. Searle & Co., Skokie, Illinois), a synthetic combination of aspartic acid and the methyl ester of phenyl-alanine, is currently used in many diet sodas, cereals, and chewing gums and as a substitute for granulated sugar. Although the Food and Drug Administration has approved aspartame for routine use (except in patients with phenylkentonuria), its potential for toxicity remains controversial. This report describes the first confirmed case of aspartame-induced granulomatous panniculitis.

A 22-year-old otherwise healthy woman had numerous, bilateral, nontender, nodular lesions on both legs for 2 months. The patient denied having used any oral, systemic, or topical medications during the preceding 6 months. She also denied any history of recent infections or trauma, and she had no accompanying constitutional symptoms. For the previous 6 years, the patient had habitually consumed between 1080 to 1320 mL (36 to 44 fl oz) daily of a popular saccharin-containing diet soft drink. Approximately 10 weeks before presenting for evaluation, she had switched to the same manufacturer's new aspartame-sweetened diet soda. She made no other changes in her diet. Two weeks later, the patient first noted the onset of several nontender, deep nodules on her left thigh. New lesions subsequently appeared elsewhere on her legs while the previous lesions slowly enlarged: none disappeared.

On examination, numerous deep nodules ranging from approximately 0.5 to 5 cm in diameter were palpated bilaterally on the thighs and calves. The overlying skin appeared normal. The nodules were firm and in some areas coalesced to form large deep plaques that were freely movable over the underlying fascial tissues. No adenopathy or other cutaneous or mucous membrane lesions were present; the rest of the general physical findings were normal.

Complete blood and differential count, erythrocyte sedimentation rate, serum electrolyte and amylase levels, and urinalysis findings were normal; liver function test, serum protein electrophoresis, direct and indirect immunofluorescence studies, tuberculin tine test, and tests for antinuclear antibody and anti-streptolysin-O were negative. The patient refused a chest roentgenogram. Histologically, a septal panniculitis with lymphocytes and histiocytes predominated within the thickened fibrotic septae. Many multinucleated histiocytic giant cells and a lymphohistiocytic infiltrate extended into the adjacent fatty lobules, consistent with erythema nodosum.

The patient was advised to stop using the recently introduced aspartame-sweetened beverage. During the next 4 weeks, no new lesions appeared and all previous lesions spontaneously resolved without residua. She was then advised to resume daily consumption of the suspected aspartame-sweetened diet drink; 10 days later, she again developed the nodular lesions on both legs, this time in greater number than before. Withdrawal of the beverage once again resulted in gradual and complete resolution of all lesions.

The patient was next challenged with pure aspartame, 50 mg four times daily, in capsule form (supplied by G.D. Searle & Co.). Ten days later, nodules reappeared on her legs. Withdrawal of aspartame resulted in spontaneous clearing of all lesions.

Widely used, aspartame is 180 times sweeter than sucrose and is metabolized primarily to aspartic acid, phenylalanine, and methanol. No previous reports could be found in the literature conclusively linking aspartame to any cutaneous eruptions. Several unconfirmed reports of "dermal eruptions" and urticaria have been received by the manufacturer according to Robert L. Alberti, M.D., Director of Medical Communications, G.D. Searle & Co. In addition, the Adverse Drug Reaction Report System of the American Academy of Dermatology has received one unconfirmed report of a macular, erythematous, confluent pruritic eruption in a man who had consumed large amounts of an aspartame-sweetened diet cola (Report No. 1170031284, reported 12 March 1984 and transferred to the FDA 10 April 1984).

The precise classification and pathogenetic mechanism of the panniculitis in my patient are unclear. Absence of tenderness in lesions, overlying skin changes, constitutional symptoms, and residual pigmentary changes upon resolution is inconsistent with erythema nodosum, whereas the histopathologic finding of septal panniculitis strongly favors that diagnosis.

The formation of toxic metabolites of aspartame, either during the drug's shelflife or as metabolic byproducts, offers one possible explanation for the reaction seen in this patient. Boehm and Bada have recently reported that the heating of aspartame results in conversion of some of its amino acids to their racemates. Although they note that the possible toxicity of consuming large amounts of these racemates remains to be determined, they speculate that some food or beverage components may catalyze the racemization of aspartic acid and phenylalanine in aspartame at room temperature. Furthermore, despite extensive prior testing, no such reaction has yet been reported, suggesting that this phenomenon may be idiosyncratic rather than dose-related. Fortunately, in the present patient, mere discontinuation of the aspartame-containing beverage resulted in complete and relatively rapid resolution of the condition without residua.

By Mr. LAXALT (for himself and Mr. HECHT):

S. 1558. A bill to settle certain claims affecting the Pyramid Lake Paiute Indian Tribe of Nevada, and for other purposes; by unanimous consent jointly referred, to the Committees on Indian Affairs, and Energy and Natural Resources, and Judiciary. Provided that if Indian Affairs Committee reports the measure, the Energy and Natural Resources Committee and Judiciary Committee have 15 calendar days in which to report the measure or be automatically discharged.

PYRAMID LAKE PAIUTE AND TRUCKEE RIVER SETTLEMENT ACT

● Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, I introduce with my distinguished colleague [Senator HECHT] a bill which settles a very longstanding water allocation dispute involving the waters of the Truckee and Carson Rivers. It settles the water rights for the Pyramid Lake Paiute Tribe, the cities of Reno and Sparks, NV, and the Newlands reclamation project. I am, I might say, extremely pleased to be able to bring this bill to the Senate after many years of litigation and negotiation.

Specifically, the bill allocates among the water users certain waters of Lake Tahoe, Stampede Dam, and the Truckee River. The measure also incorporates, as a separate title, a water compact agreed to by the States of Nevada and California, assigning water rights to both the Truckee and Carson Rivers. It establishes a fund from which the Pyramid Lake Tribe will provide for the propogation of the fishery at Pyramid Lake and other tribal enterprises. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to maintain and improve the fish habitat of the Truckee River for the cutthroat trout, a particularly impressive game fish, and for the endangered cui-ui fish, found nowhere else in the world. Finally, the bill provides for the dismissal of some six pending lawsuits.

Mr. President, I commend the parties who have negotiated this agreement for putting aside longstanding disputes, for working in a statesmanlike atmosphere, and for their willingness to compromise in behalf of a final agreement. Special thanks must go to Bob Broadbent, Assistant Secretary for Water and Science at the Department of the Interior, for all the time and effort he put into this effort.

Mr. President, as Governor of Nevada back in 1972, I called an emergency session of the Nevada Legislature in an effort to resolve the disputes surrounding this resource. Unfortunately, those early efforts were unsuccessful but they make the introduction of this bill today even more gratifying.

I believe the bill fully addresses all the issues involved and allocates to all the parties of interest a fair share of the limited water resource. To the extent that minor disagreements may remain in portions of the bill, I call upon the negotiating parties to continue in their good faith, openhanded way to reach agreement on those matters and let us proceed as a united Nevada family behind this settlement.

Mr. President, the Senate will be called on to approve this settlement and to provide part of the wherewithal to make it work. I assure my colleagues that this bill is far and away preferable to the course of the last 60 years of litigation and conflict. If the measure can be improved, I stand ready to work diligently to that end but hope that the same willingness of the Nevada negotiators will prevail in this body not to press narrow special interest but look rather to the total package and its overall benefits.●

● Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, today I am very pleased to be able to join my colleague, Senator LAXALT, in introducing a bill that will, at long last, settle some extremely nettlesome Indian water rights issues in northern Nevada. For more than half a century, the waters that flow in the Truckee and Carson River Basins have been a source of litigation and conflict, as well as a source of life and economic progress.

The longstanding disputes revolve around the Newlands project, the Nation's first reclamation project. The Pyramid Lake Paiute Indian Tribe, local farmers, and the growing cities of Reno and Sparks all rely on the water provided by the project.

After many years of difficult negotiations and legal battles, all the parties involved are now prepared to put the conflict behind them and work together for a better future. They have come to the Congress requesting legislation that will set in motion the mechanism they have agreed upon to manage the water in a fair and nonconfrontational manner.

It is important that Congress act swiftly and approve the necessary authorizing legislaton to put this agreement into place. I therefore look forward to working with my colleagues and urge their support as the Pyramid Lake Paiute and Truckee River Settlement Act moves through the legislative process.●

S. 1559. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to revise the method of payment to hospitals for capital related costs under the Medicare Program; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICARE CAPITAL PAYMENT REFORM ACT

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I am introducing S. 1559 to amend title 18 of the Social Security Act, to restructure payment to hospitals for capital costs under Medicare. I am happy to be joined in introducing this bill by my colleague from Indiana, Mr. QUAYLE, who is a leader in health system reform. I will also be joining him today in introducing a bill to redefine the Federal commitment to health planning—a bill consistent with the intent of S. 1559.

Mr. President, 2 years ago Congress set in place a new payment system for Medicare hospital services. This system, based on a payment for episode of illness for 468 diagnosis related groups, was designed to change the incentives for hospitals—to encourage them to manage resources more efficiently. This new payment has had a tremendously positive effect on the health care system. But not all of Medicare's expenses for hospital services were included in the new methodology.

Excluded from the fixed-price was a passthrough for hospital capital cost. We were reticent to commit Medicare to a capital policy because the data we had on hospital capital costs was clearly not as adequate as what we had on the operating expenses. But, an agenda for restructuring capital payments was set forth. This agenda included: First, a deadline of October 1, 1986, to restructure Medicare payment for capital costs. At that point, unless Congress acts otherwise, 1122 facility review for Medicare would become mandatory. Second, the Congress instructed the Secretary of Health and Human Services to complete a study and make recommendations to the Congress on Medicare capital policy reform by October 1, 1984.

It was the intent of Congress that the two capital deadlines—the threat of mandatory 1122 review and the completion of the Secretary's report on capital—would provide a catalyst for reform. The hospital industry and other interested parties have been given time to develop a consensus approach. They have not. And, the Department of Health and Human Services is now woefully late with its report.

The time has come to move forward on this issue. Hospital capital expenses may only total in the range of 7 percent of the average amount Medicare pays for a hospital stay. But, it has a significant affect on the other 93 percent on the operating side. A reasonable new policy is needed now.

Hospitals must go to the financial markets for capitalization. Eighty percent of the capital raised for the hospital industry is financed through debt. To receive loans and sell bonds, it is essential that there be more certainty concerning the future of Medicare payment for capital expenses.

Whether or not hospitals are in an expansive mode, these institutions still must maintain a physical plant and constantly update equipment to keep abreast of the times. Quality care is as dependent on a hospital's ability to raise capital as it is to have revenues sufficient to keep the doors open.

For these reasons, I decided it was necessary to put a proposal on the table to get things rolling. My proposal is a starter. It may require refinement to make appropriate law in this complex area. I look forward to having a hearing on this proposal and the Secretary's Medicare capital report in the Finance Committee's Health Subcommittee in September or October. It is my intention to make Medicare capital payment the high priority issue it needs to be.

As this proposal and others are considered by the Congress, it is critical that each keep to a set of principles upon which prospective pricing and Medicare reform in general are based:

PROSPECTIVELY SET AND NONHOSPITAL-SPECIFIC RATES

The traditional Medicare capital passthrough does not provide the right incentive to hospitals and is contradictory to the prospective payment system. A new methodology for capital payment should be complementary to the DRG rate system and not hospital-specific.

SIMPLE AND STRAIGHTFORWARD METHODOLOGY

Hospitals should know how they will be paid and should be able to make reasonable dec sions concerning the capital needs of their institutions within the parameters of the new methodology. An appeals process for hospitals with exceptional needs would be cumbersome and potentially regulating. But, the Congress should be open to considering some accomodation for special services.

REASONABLE TRANSITION

A prospective nonhospital-specific capital policy will be tough on mamy insititutions. A transition is essential to allow institutions to adjust and restructure capitalization to comply with the new methodology. A transition cannot be so long that it undermines the new payment methodology and it should be designed so that it cannot be "gamed."

FAIRNESS

A new capital payment structure should be neutral with respect to whether hospitals are nonprofit, forprofit or public. There is no reason to favor one ownership type over another.

MEDICARE CAPITAL—PAYMENT REFORM

Mr. President, S. 1559 has been carefully crafted to account for the principles I have laid out. There will, I am sure, be concerns expressed about the sensitivity of the approach to the many unique conditions hospitals may face in future capitalization. I will review some of these problems. It is not my intent through this measure to create disincentives to appropriate investment. I look forward to exploring with interested parties the implications of the proposal.

S. 1559 restructures Medicare payment for hospital capital costs providing an add-on percentage factor to the DRG rate in lieu of current capital cost passthroughs. The add-on factor would include a blend over a 6-year transition period of hospital-specific and national capital ratios. Return on equity for for-profit hospitals would be phased out over this period as part of the hospital-specific ratio. Over the transition, the weight applied to the national ratio in the add-on factor would increase year by year until the sixth year when the entire add-on factor would equal the national percentage.

The hospital-specific portion of the add-on for capital would be based on a ratio of Medicare payments for capital passthroughs to each hospital—including return on equity for those institutions which receive that payment now—to all other Medicare payments to that hospital. The national portion would be based on a comparable ratio of all Medicare payments for capital passthroughs to all other Medicare payments to PPS hospitals. Return on equity would not be included in the national ratio.

The hospital-specific and national ratios would be based on an average of 3 years: 1984, 1985, and 1986. The Secretary of Health and Human Services would be allowed to base these ratios on estimates. Since the final audited data from these years is unlikely to be available by October 1, 1986, the use of such data may be troublesome as it has been in the past. But, the calculation of the add-on using recent data is critical to make the payment levels relevant to the most current capital activity. It also reduces the need to have a roll-forward factor to account for differences between the base years and the start of the new methodology.

S. 1559 uses a 6-year phase-in for a number of reasons. Six years is longer than the depreciable life of or lease terms on almost all equipment and represents more than half the duration of almost all debt financing—for example on a 15-year, 12-percent bond with level annual payments of interest and principle, over 55 percent of the total interest will have already been paid in 6 years. Six years is clearly a sufficient period of time during which even the least aggressive of managers of hospitals would be able to restructure capital—the labor and capital intensity of his institution—refine lease and rental agreements, and make other changes to restructure the institution's capital requirements. It should also be pointed out that 6 years provide a reasonable, but finite, period after which the vagaries and inefficiencies of the current system can generally be put behind us.

Additionally, the approach would base its hospital-specific and national portions on the average of a 3-year base period. This 3-year average would minimize gaming during the phase-in. The fixed 6-year phase-in avoids equipment/nonequipment, old/new capital measurement, and complexity. It avoids continuation of a passthrough payment into the next century simply because some existing hospital buildings may be in service for 30 more years. At the end of the 6 years, nonprofit and for-profit institutions would be treated alike under Medicare.

In the longer term, the proposal provides all hospitals incentives to structure both assets and capitalizations in economically efficient ways, reflecting real use without the biases historically introduced through retrospective cost-based passthroughs. In addition, particularly in the short run, hospitals having a hospital-specific capital cost ratio greater than the national average cost would have greater incentive to restructure assets and capitalization in the direction of greater cost efficiency.

The approach used in this bill accepts the notion that transitions into prospective payment systems are essential. The hospital-specific payment portion of the add-on would equal 95 percent the first year, 85 percent the second year, 70 percent the third year, 50 percent the fourth year, 25 percent the fifth year, and finally the 100 percent national rate in 1991.

The bill also has a special rule for new hospitals which allows the Secretary to estimate their hospital-specific portion of the rate during the transition.

As I said, this plan appropriately moves Medicare away from a cost-based passthrough for capital to a prospective payment. It has, nevertheless, its drawbacks and raises broader issues which are worth review.

Hospitals having major capital expenses during the transition may have an arbitrarily low hospital-specific ratio. The transition does not recognize any portion of the actual capital costs of a major investment made less than 1 year prior to the implementation of the new payment model. This could be burdensome on hospitals which have unavoidable or nondiscretionary capital expenditures that may not be easy to restructure.

The other potential problem with the base period is the assumption made that the cost of capital will reflect in the future the base period data. Both the Reagan tax reform plan and the one proposed by Senator BRADLEY and Representative GEPHARDT would have us eliminate tax-exempt financing for private purposes. It has been estimated that this policy change would increase the cost of virtually all capital projects for nonprofit hospitals which depend on tax-exempt financing. Estimates vary, but it appears that the interest costs of projects could increase anywhere from 25 to 50 percent.

The nonprofit portion of the hospital industry is highly leveraged. Eighty percent of its capital costs are debt-financed, and the lion's share of this is from tax-exempt instruments. Tax reform is not the only factor. Currently, the nonprofits, for-profits, and public hospitals have a very uneven playing field in the area of capitalization. It is not always apparent which corporate grouping has the upper hand. The nonprofits do have tax-exempt financing, the for-profits have equity financing as well as debt available to them, and the public hospitals may have tax-exempt financing as well as public treasuries. I am not committed to having the industry move to one status under the law. However, I am convinced that investment in the industry is perverted by the differences I have outlined. As we make new tax policy over the next months, it is important that we evaluate the affects of these differences. This consideration is not related to a Medicare capital payment policy and is one of the keys to it. The Congress should not consider tax and health policy in isolation. If it does, the hospital industry will be the worse for it and access to quality and cost-effective health care for Americans will be threatened.

ELIMINATION OF 1122 REVIEW

The bill includes an additional provision which would delete section 1122 from title 18. I am proposing this change in policy because the facilities regulations sanctioned under section 1122 no longer has relevance to Medicare. This provision is not needed when Medicare adopts a payment system for capital which provides the right economic incentives for hospitals. I, also, believe that the regulation of facilities and equipment investment under section 1122 has not been a successful cost-containment mechanism and is an impediment to the development of a competitive marketplace in the health care system.

When Medicare and the other major payers in the health care marketplace paid on a cost or cost-plus basis, regulation of facilities investment may have been a rational policy. In a price-fixed market where Medicare will use its buying power to bring costs down through prospective pricing, the need for directing hospital management through regulation makes little sense.

HEALTH PLANNING

It has become a cliche in health circles that the Federal role in health planning cannot be reformed until the Medicare capital payment issue is settled. Therefore, I believe it is highly appropriate that S. 1559 which addresses the question of Medicare payment for capital and section 1122 review should be accompanied by legislation which addresses the issue of health planning. Health planning is more than simple regulation of hospital investment and it deserved Federal support.

I have developed the Health Planning Block Grant Act with Senator QUAYLE, a bill to redirect the national commitment to health planning.

Mr. President, 1122 review and its sister program, certificate of need, have had their day, and it is past. In the new environment of consumer choice, institutions are not going to be able to invest willy-nilly. This is not to say, however, that there are not other important roles for health planning. But, facilities regulation as an aspect of health planning is a bankrupt concept. My State, Minnesota, has recognized this fact and allowed certificate of need to sunset.

Our health planning bill would replace the current Public Health Service Act health planning provisions which have prescriptive language concerning certificate of need and other activities. Those provisions are not relevant to the reality of the health care marketplace or the objectives of health systems reform.

The bill provides funding to the states through a block grant for a range of health planning activities. These activities include development of health plans, data collection and research by State and local agencies. Agencies should assess access to health services as well as the cost and quality of care. I would hope the planning agencies would work closely with the Peer Review Organizations and the providers of health care.

As I have said, traditionally, health planning has been focused on regulating health care providers. The new direction mandated by the bill which I have developed with Senator QUAYLE sends clear signals that health planning should be made to complement the competitive, consumer-choice approach to health care reform.

Health planning should be aimed not at controlling providers, but at improving information available to consumers and payers so as to assist each in buying right in the marketplace. This includes keeping an eye on the marketing practices of providers.

Health planning can be a useful tool to maintain community attention to issues of access. Consumer choice of health plans and the markets it creates works. But, it may leave gaps in access. Those unsponsored by insurance, the frail elderly in need of long-term care services, and rural Americans may have needs the marketplace ignores. Planning agencies can help provide guidance to policymakers in these areas.

The health planning block grant bill gives States the freedom to design programs to meet their specific needs. There is a national purpose in subsidizing their effort. The Federal Government has a responsibility to assure access to care and promote a cost-effective, quality health care system for Americans. Health planning has a role to play in these goals though it is best carried out by the States and communities.

I look forward to working with Senator QUAYLE on the health planning block grant. It is critically important as the Congress considers health policy relative to Medicare and health care system issues like health planning that the relevant committees of jurisdiction work closely together to coordinate their efforts.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1559

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION. 1. This Act may be cited as the "Medicare Capital Payment Reform Act of 1985".

AMENDMENTS TO SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

SEC. 2. (a) Section 1886(a)(4) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "with respect to costs incurred in cost reporting periods beginning prior to October 1, 1986" and inserting in lieu thereof "with respect to hospitals which are not subsection (d) hospitals".

(b) Section 1886(d)(3) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(F) ADJUSTMENT FOR CAPITAL RELATED COSTS.—The Secretary shall adjust the national DRG prospective payment rate for each hospital (as computed under subparagraph (D) and adjusted under subparagraph (E)) for fiscal years beginning on or after October 1, 1986, to provide an add-on payment for capital related costs in accordance with subsection (g).".

(c) Section 1886(g) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(g) CAPITAL RELATED COSTS.—

"(1) ADD-ON-AMOUNT.—For each fiscal year beginning on or after October 1, 1986, the amount of the add-on payment for each DRG rate for capital related costs for a subsection (d) hospital shall be equal to the amount of such DRG rate multiplied by the add-on ratio.

"(2) ADD-ON-RATIO.—The add-on ratio shall be equal to (P)(RH)+(1-P)(RN), where P is the factor determined under paragraph (5), RH is the hospital-specific ratio, and RN is the national ratio.

"(3) HOSPITAL-SPECIFIC RATIO.—(A) The hospital-specific ratio for a hospital is the fraction—

"(i) the numerator of which is the amount paid under part A to such hospital for the hospital's base period (defined in subparagraph (B)) for capital related costs (as defined by the Secretary), including return on equity, and

"(ii) the denominator of which is the total amount paid under part A to such hospital for such base period for operating costs of inpatient hospital services (as defined in subsection (a)(4)).

"(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), a hospital's base period is the 3-year period consisting of fiscal years 1984, 1985, and 1986, or, if shorter, the period consisting of all of the complete fiscal years during which the hospital was in operation prior to October 1, 1986.

"(4) NATIONAL RATIO.—(A) The national ratio is the fraction—

"(i) the numerator of which is the amount paid under part A to all subsection (d) hospitals for the base period (defined in subparagraph (B)) for capital related costs (as defined by the Secretary), excluding return on equity, and

"(ii) the denominator of which is the total amount paid under part A to all such hospitals for such base period for operating costs of inpatient hospital services (as defined in subsection (a)(4)).

"(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), the base period is the 3-year period consisting of fiscal years 1984, 1985, and 1986.

"(5) VALUE OF P.—For purposes of determining the add-on ratio, P is equal to—

"(A) 0.95 for the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1986,

"(B) 0.85 for the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1987,

"(C) 0.70 for the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1988,

"(D) 0.50 for the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1989,

"(E) 0.25 for the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1990, and

"(6) SPECIAL RULE FOR NEW HOSPITALS.—In the case of a hospital which was not in operation for any complete fiscal year prior to October 1, 1986, the value of P for such hospital for all fiscal years beginning on or after October 1, 1986 shall be 0.00.

"(7) USE OF ESTIMATES.—In applying this subsection, the Secretary may, to the extent necessary, use estimates of costs and payments. Such estimates shall be readjusted as data becomes available, and payments to hospitals shall be readjusted accordingly.

"(8) REPORTS TO CONGRESS.—Whenever the Secretary adjusts classifications and weighting factors for DRG's pursuant to subsection (d)(4)(C), the Secretary shall also reexamine and report to Congress with respect to the appropriateness of the add-on amount for capital related costs established by this subsection.".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 3. The amendments made by section 2 shall apply to payments for operating costs of inpatient hospital services incurred on or after October 1, 1986.

REPEAL OF SECTION 1122

SEC. 4. Effective October 1, 1986, section 1122 of the Social Security Act is repealed.●

By Mr. QUAYLE (for himself and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S. 1560. A bill to provide for a block grant to States for health planning activities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

HEALTH PLANNING BLOCK GRANT ACT

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to establish a block grant to the States to support health planning activities designed to meet the needs of a competitive health care market structure. I am pleased that my distinguished colleague, Mr. DURENBERGER, the chairman of the Senate Finance Health Subcommittee, and a longtime advocate of reform of the health care marketplace, is joining me in this effort.

This proposal is designed to work in tandem with another bill I am cosponsoring with Mr. DURENBERGER today that proposes to integrate capital costs for part A reimbursement into Medicare's new prospective payment methodology. Together, these two proposals provide a comprehensive reform of our Federal policy of health facilities regulation.

In 1983, Congress enacted the prospective payment system for hospital inpatient services under the Medicare Program which reimburses hospitals on the basis of prospectively determined specific amounts on a case-by-case basis, according to individual patient diagnoses. However, Congress made the decision not to incorporate all of the expenses previously reimbursed by Medicare on a reasonable cost basis into the prospective payment system. Present law provides that the capital-related costs (including depreciation, interest expenses, leases, and rentals and, in the case of for-profit hospitals, a return on equity capital) paid by Medicare be excluded from the prospective payment system until October 1, 1986. That date was selected to allow sufficient time for the development of an alternative proposal to deal with capital costs. Until then, these costs will continue to be reimbursed on a reasonable cost basis. To date, little progress has been made by either the industry or the Department of Health and Human Services in developing a viable solution. Therefore, I believe that it is now time to move beyond mere discussion. It is time to take positive steps to resolve the capital issue and thereby strengthen the prospective payment system. This bill provides a valid starting point for moving this forward on the agendas of all parties involved—the hospitals, the administration, and the Congress. I do not believe this proposal is necessarily the final solution and I am eager to work with all interested parties to address their concerns. I look forward to working with Senator DURENBERGER on fine tuning this proposal and developing a consensus on this issue.

This proposal modifies the current reimbursement system for capital by adding on a percentage for capital costs to each DRG over a 6-year period with the majority of the transition in the last 2 years. Over the 6-year transition period, the add-on factor would reflect a blend of base-period hospital specific and national capital ratios with increasing weight applied to the national ratio each year, until the sixth year when the add-on factor would be equal to the national ratio. This transition period will be sufficient to avoid serious financial disruption to those hospitals that are highly leveraged in capital investments when the proposal is implemented.

This proposal would provide incentives for all hospitals to behave more efficiently with regard to their capital expenditures. For the first time, strong incentives would be in place for hospital managers to minimize the overall costs of new investments by selecting the right financial mix and by making capital investment decisions that are sensitive to marketplace conditions. It would also link payment for capital directly to a hospital's real volume and need, that is, number of cases instead of the institution's actual capacity.

It has been argued that a reevaluation of the Federal role in health planning would not be appropriate until the issue of reimbursement for capital expenditures was addressed because of the resulting effects of this change on the health care system. Thus, I believe that it is appropriate and timely to introduce these two bills which together will provide a consistent policy.

Historically, our health planning law has focused on the regulation of capital expenditures through mandatory Certificate of Need and its accompanying regulatory structure. S 1560 now obviates the need for this regulatory structure because it provides sufficient incentives for provider institutions to behave efficiently and not make unnecessary or uneconomic capital expenditures. Therefore, I believe the time has arrived to refocus our health planning law on current needs that reflect the realities of a competitive health care marketplace.

Health planning has been useful in many States in containing health costs and assuring equitable access to health services. However, since the enactment of health planning legislation in the early 1970's, dramatic changes have taken place in the delivery of health care services because of the competitive effects of the prospective payment system and, more significantly, because of initiatives the private sector has taken to contain costs; yet our health planning law has remained static.

Health planning should be reformed and updated to reflect these changes and this proposal would achieve that. Under the block grant approach proposed in this bill, all funds for health planning would flow to the States with each given the discretion to design its own health planning programs, establish the role of its statewide health planning agency, and choose whether or not to continue or designate agencies at the regional or local levels. This approach permits the States to use these funds for activities that fit their own individual and unique needs including data collection, research, and the development of health plans or together with such activities to regulate capital expenditures of institutional health care providers through certificate-of-need-type reviews. Additionally, it would give States the prerogative to use the funds to meet two pressing needs of the competitive health care system—to collect and disseminate purchaser information with respect to health care services and to assess access to health care services.

These two latter activities are particularly important in my view. As price competition has begun to dominate the financing of the health care delivery system, indirect subsidies that have existed within the system for years as a way of paying uncompensated costs have tended to be squeezed out of the system. Clearly this may be painful during the transition to a fully competitive system, but it provides an opportunity, in the long run, to deal with certain issues in a more explicit and, thus, a more effective way.

In this context, a major challenge confronting us is how to pay for health care for the poor. At the present, we are using a combination of Government funds—including in varying degrees in different communities local, State, and Federal funds—and the indirect subsidy provided by cost-shifting to pay for the hospital care for the poor. Competition is squeezing out the cost-shift subsidy, thus exposing the inadequacy of Government funding, not only Federal funding, but local and State funding also.

In addition, the problems of access to health care services, particularly tertiary care, in the rural areas is of deep concern as the competitive marketplace moves forward. Thus, I think it is important that the States utilize health planning funds to evaluate the magnitude of their access to care problems and to decide how to appropriately address them.

Adequate purchaser information about the cost and quality of health care services is necessary in a competitive marketplace. To foster competition in the health care marketplace, purchasers need access to easily understood and relevant cost and quality. Hopefully, forward-looking States will utilize the health planning dollars available to them to collect and disseminate such information to businesses and other consumers of health care services.

We have created in this country the most advanced health care system in the world but one which has proven to be extremely expensive. We are beginning to make progress in containing these costs and these two proposals will further this effort. I urge my colleagues to support them.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1560

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) this Act may be cited as the "Health Planning Block Grant Act of 1986".

(b) Title XV of the Public Health Service Act is repealed.

(c) Title XIX of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"PART D—HEALTH PLANNING BLOCK GRANT

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 1941. For the purpose of allotments to States to carry out this part, there are authorized to be appropriated $58,256,000 for each of the fiscal years, 1986, 1987, and 1988.

"ALLOTMENTS

"SEC. 1942. (a)(1) From amounts appropriated under section 1941 for any fiscal year, the Secretary shall allot to each State an amount which bears the same ratio to the total amount appropriated under such section for such fiscal year as the population of the State bears to the population of all States, except as provided in paragraph (2).

"(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), the allotment of any State in any fiscal year under this subsection shall not be less than $100,000. If, under paragraph (1), the allotment of any State in any fiscal year will be less than $100,000, the Secretary shall increase the allotment of such State to $100,000, and shall proportionately reduce the allotments of all other States whose allotment exceeds $100,000 in a manner that will insure that the allotment of each State in such fiscal year is at least $100,000.

"(3) For purposes of this part, the population of a State shall be determined on the basis of the 1980 decennial census.

"(b) To the extent that all funds appropriated under section 1941 for a fiscal year and available for allotment in such fiscal year are not otherwise allotted to States because—

"(1) one or more States have not submitted an application or description of activities in accordance with section 1945 for such fiscal year;

"(2) one or more States have notified the Secretary that they do not intend to use the full amount of their allotment; or

"(3) some State allotments are offset or repaid under section 1906(b)(3) (as such section applies to this part pursuant to section 1945(e)):

such excess shall be allotted among each of the remaining States in proporation to the amount otherwise allotted to such States for such fiscal year without regard to this subsection.

"PAYMENTS UNDER ALLOTMENTS TO STATES

"SEC. 1943. (a) For each fiscal year, the Secretary shall make payments, as provided by section 6503(a) of title 31, United States Code, to each State from its allotments under section 1942 from amounts appropriated for that fiscal year.

"(b) Any amount paid to a State for a fiscal year and remaining unobligated at the end of such year shall remain available for the next fiscal year to such State for the purposes for which it was made.

"USE OF ALLOTMENTS

"SEC. 1944. (a) Except as provided in subsection (c), amounts paid to a State under section 1943 from its allotment under section 1942 for any fiscal year may be used at the discretion of the States for any one or more of the following:

"(1) the compilation or conduct of studies and analyses, and the collection of data, by—

"(A) a State agency; or

"(B) local and regional public and private entities designated by the State, with respect to the financing and delivery of health care in the State;

"(2) the development by a State agency of a plan for the allocation of health services and resources in the State, including assessments of access to health care services;

"(3) the development by public or private entities designated by the State of local and regional plans for the allocation of health services and resources in the applicable locality or region;

"(4) activities carried out by a State agency to review and determine, to the extent deemed appropriate by the State, the need for—

"(A) capital expenditures by health care providers in the State;

"(B) the acquisition by health care providers of major medical equipment for use in the State; and

"(C) major expansions in the provision of institutional health care services in the State;

"(5) the participation of local and regional and public and private entities designated by the State in the reviews conducted, and the determinations made, by the State under paragraph (4); and

"(6) the collection and dissemination of purchaser information with respect to health care services.

"APPLICATION AND DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITIES; REQUIREMENTS

"SEC. 1945. (a) In order to receive an allotment for a fiscal year under section 1942, each State shall submit an application to the Secretary. Each such application shall be in such form and submitted by such date as the Secretary shall require. Each such application shall contain assurances that the legislature of the State has complied with the provisions of subsection (b) and that the State will meet the requirements of subsection (c).

"(b) After the expiration of the first fiscal year for which a State receives an allotment under section 1942, no funds shall be allotted to such State for any fiscal year under such section unless the legislature of the State conducts public hearings on the proposed use and distribution of funds to be provided under section 1943 for such fiscal year.

"(c) As part of the annual application required by subsection (a), the chief executive officer of each State shall—

"(1) certify that the State agrees to use the funds allotted to the State under section 1942 in accordance with the requirements of this part;

"(2) provide assurances that such chief executive officer will designate or establish a State agency to administer funds provided under this part;

"(3) agrees to cooperate with Federal investigations undertaken in accordance with section 1907 (as such section applies to this part pursuant to subsection (e) of this section); and

"(4) certify that the State agrees that Federal funds made available under section 1943 for any period will be so used as to supplement and increase the level of State, local, and other non-Federal funds that would in the absence of such Federal funds be made available for the programs and activities for which funds are provided under that section and will in no event supplant such State, local, and other non-Federal funds.

The Secretary may not prescribe for a State the manner of compliance with the requirements of this subsection.

"(d) The chief executive officer of a State shall, as part of the application required by subsection (a), also prepare and furnish the Secretary (in accordance with such form as the Secretary shall provide) with a description of the intended use of the payments the State will receive under section 1943 for the fiscal year for which the application is submitted, including information on the programs and activities to be supported. The description shall be made public within the State in such manner as to facilitate comment from any person (including any Federal or other public agency) during development of the description and after its transmittal. The description shall be revised (consistent with this section) throughout the year as may be necessary to reflect substantial changes in the programs and activities assisted by the State under this part, and any revision shall be subject to the requirements of the preceding sentence.

"(e) Except where inconsistent with the provisions of this part, the provisions of section 1903(b), section 1906(a), paragraphs (1) through (5) of section 1906(b), and sections 1907, 1908, and 1909 shall apply to this part in the same manner as such provisions apply to part A of this title.

"DEFINITION

"SEC. 1946. For purposes of this part, the term 'State' means each of the several States and the District of Columbia.".

(d) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall take effect on October 1, 1986.●

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 1561. A bill to amend the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 regarding contribution, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUPERFUND FAIR CONTRIBUTION ACT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which I believe represents an important advancement in the enforcement and fairness of our country's Superfund Program, officially known as the Comprehensive Environmental Response Compensation and Liability Act [CERCLA]. This legislation would codify a private party's right to contribution in a Superfund proceeding and ensure that such action is governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

I am introducing this proposed legislation at this time so that it may be considered by Members of the Senate in advance of our taking up the Superfund legislation in the fall. I have also agreed to cosponsor certain amendments proposed by Senator THURMOND which, in my opinion, require further analysis and modification; and I reserve my final judgment until further constituent comments are received and floor debate is evaluated.

Following Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works consideration of Superfund reauthorization, I requested that Senator THURMOND seek a referral and hold hearings before the Judicary Committee, which has the responsibility for legislation on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and other court-related matters, because of my concern that the Superfund Program operate fairly in accordance with due process while carrying out its mandate to clear up the environment. The Judiciary Committee held 2 days of hearings which I chaired in part. I believe these hearings set out many issues and provided members of the committee important viewpoints and information.

In order to fully explore the issues, the committee heard from representatives to the Environmental Protection Agency, Department of Justice, environmental groups, and industry. In particular, I had the opportunity to question EPA Director, Lee Thomas; Gene A. Lucero, EPA: Henry Habicht, DOJ; Randy M. Mott, National Association of Manufacturers; Edmund Frost, Chemical Manufacturers Association; T. Lawrence Jones, American Insurance Association; the Honorable Charles D. Renfrew, American Petroleum Institute; George Freeman, Hunton & Williams; and Ann Powers, Chesapeake Bay Foundation.

During our hearings on the Superfund reauthorization, many questions were raised by expert witnesses from EPA, industry, and environmental groups. Problems were identified relating to the application of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the scope, timing, and standard of judicial review. Questions also were raised about EPA efforts to identify and notify all possible responsible parties and the need to codify a good-faith defense to administrative orders. Environmental groups have concerns about administrative procedures and whether sufficient regulations have been promulgated.

I share these and other concerns. Due to the short term the Judiciary Committee had for referral, it was impossible to reach agreement on a committee amendment. With more time, an accord probably would have been reached.

Based upon our hearings and my experience in litigation in the Federal courts, it is my conclusion that defendants in Federal court litigation under Superfund should have a right of contribution to bring in additional defendants so that all parties may be before the court at the same time to determine issues of liability and damages with the appropriate determination as to contribution and/or indemnification.

This amendment would remove any doubts as to the right of contribution under Superfund. The Supreme Court in recent decisions has been hesitant to imply a right of contribution under other statutes unless expressly stated. These decisions create substantial doubts regarding the application of contribution to Superfund, despite several recent district court cases implying such a right.

I believe that any defendant in a Government enforcement action under Superfund should be able to file a claim for contribution against other defendants as third-party defendants as soon as the enforcement action has been brought. These private party actions would encourage additional parties to come foward and expedite settlement discussions with the Government. This bill would permit the timing and procedure for such contribution claims to be governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. In some instances, private party cleanup may occur more quickly if the courts first resolve issues of liability and remedy, leaving questions of apportionment until after the Government's action has been completed. In other cases, the reverse could be true. Consistent with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, these decisions should be left to the sound discretion of the court.

This bill also authorizes contribution protection for parties that settle with the United States or a State in good faith. Where a party has entered into a judicially approved good faith settlement with the United States or a State, no other responsible or potentially responsible party may seek contribution from the settling party. This protection should attach to all matters that the settling party has resolved with the United States or a State. Thus, in cases of partial settlements, the settling party may remain liable for any other cleanup action or costs not addressed by the settlement.

This bill also provides that where the United States or a State has secured a partial settlement with or judgment against a party, it can seek relief for any of the remaining response actions or costs for which the nonsettlors are liable and that the party may also maintain a contribution action against nonsettlors or other potentially responsible parties regarding the portion of the response action or costs for which the party is liable.

One other issue of special concern to me is judicial review. It is my sense that more work needs to be undertaken to arrive at a better solution than that currently provided by law or yet suggested by any interested party. In my judgment, it is vital that actions to clean up the environment proceed without undue delay. At the same time, it is vital that litigants' rights be protected in accordance with established principles under the laws of administrative procedure and review. It is a difficult balance to find; and, as I see it, we are not quite there but we are making progress.

Before Superfund reauthorization reaches the floor for Senate action, there will be an opportunity for all interested groups to have their views and inputs considered so that we may strive for the best possible balance to obtain the dual objectives of cleaning up the environment and protecting litigants' rights to due process of law.

Four years after its inception, the Superfund Program has accomplished much in cleaning up hazardous waste sites. Remedial action has been started at over 160 locations. Depite EPA's accomplishments, the Office of Technology Assessment recently reported that over 10,000 sites still need attention. In my home State of Pennsylvania, there are numerous sites which present a threat to the public health in abandoned warehouses, near schools and homes, and in municipal landfills. Plainly, there is still a very long way to go.

Congress is determined to act this year to extend and improve this vital environmental legislation. It is apparent that the scope of Superfund will be expanded substantially, and its tax base will be broadened to assure adequate financing.

I have joined with many other Senators urging Senator DOLE, the distinguished majority leader, to schedule Superfund for floor action at the earliest possible date. The cleanup of the numerous hazardous waste sites in Pennsylvania and over the entire Nation requires our immediate and urgent attention.

Mr. President, I ask for your support and that of my colleagues in enacting this important reform which will expedite environmental cleanup while protecting important due process rights.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD as if read.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1561

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 107 of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(l)(1) Any person may seek contribution from any other person who is liable or potentially liable under subsection (a), during or following any civil action under section 106 or under such subsection (a). Such claims shall be brought in accordance with section 113 and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and shall be governed by Federal law. Nothing in this subsection shall diminish the right of any person to bring an action for contribution or indemnification in the absence of a civil action under section 106 or this section.

"(2) When a person has resolved its liability to the United States or a State in a judicially approved good faith settlement or judgment against such person, such person shall not be liable for claims for contribution regarding matters addressed in the settlement or judgment. Such settlement does not discharge any of the other potentially liable persons unless its terms so provide, but it reduces the potential liability of the others to the extent of any amount stipulated by the settlement or judgment.

"(3) Where the United States or a State has obtained less than complete relief from a person who has resolved its liability to the United States or the State in a good faith settlement, the United States or the State may bring an action against any person who has not so resolved its liability. A person that has resolved its liability to the United States or a State in a good faith settlement may, where appropriate, maintain an action for contribution or indemnification against any person that was not a party to the settlement. In any action under this paragraph, the rights of any person that has resolved its liability to the United States or a State shall be subordinate to the rights of the United States or the State. Any contribution action brought under this paragraph shall be bought in accordance with section 113 and shall be governed by Federal law.".

S. 1562. A bill to amend the False Claims Act, and title 18, of the United States Code regarding penalties for false claims, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PENALTIES FOR FALSE CLAIMS

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, today I am introducing, along with my colleague from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], and my colleague from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN], the False Claims Reform Act of 1985.

This area of law is in desperate need of reform. We need only review the disturbing array of examples from the past several years of fraudulent use of taxpayer dollars to realize our Government is not able—and in too many cases not willing—to adequately protect the money entrusted it by its citizens.

Why the Government bureaucracy is, for whatever reason, unwilling to guard against or agressively punish fraud, is puzzling. But while we in Congress may not be able to legislate aggression on the part of investigators and prosecutors, we do have a very important responsibility to pursue a vigilant oversight of their activities.

What we can and should legislate is statutory assistance for those charged with protecting against fraud. This bill is intended to provide that assistance in three ways; by expanding enforcement tools, by strengthening deterrence, and by encouraging disclosure of fraud by private individuals.

For background purposes, I'd like to recount the history of the False Claims Act. In 1863, Abraham Lincoln recognized both the danger of government contractor profiteering and the need for private persons to become involved in its prevention when he signed into law the Federal False Claims Act. That act came in response to Civil War era horror stories that sound all too familiar, contractors selling boxes of sawdust in place of boxes of muskets, and reselling horses to the cavalry two and three times.

The False Claims Act allows an individual knowing of fraudulent practices to bring suit on behalf of the government and receive a portion of the recovery if the action is successful. Unfortunately, the teeth of President Lincoln's law were removed during World War II, and the provision has been little used since.

The main purpose behind the enactment of the False Claims Act of 1863—to encourage individuals to ferret out fraud against the government—is even more crucial today as the Government spends hundreds of billions of dollars on contracts with private corporations in areas such as defense, aerospace, and construction.

This False Claims Reform Act restores the incentive for individuals to come forward by establishing minimum award portions a prevailing whistleblower may receive, and by increasing that amount to 30 percent. Perhaps more important to persons who consider going public with their knowledge of fraud, is the added protective language assuring make whole relief for those suffering employer retaliation due to their disclosure.

Enforcement abilities will also be enhanced by this act with the establishment of a preponderance of evidence burden of proof in civil false claims cases as opposed to the more stringent clear and convincing burden. In addition, the act expands the scienter provision to include constructive as well as actual knowledge of a false claim.

In order to fully utilize all remedies available to the Government, the Reform Act will allow more information sharing among Justice Department attorneys, agencies, and Congress so that each branch is better able to assemble the information necessary to take appropriate action against violators of the False Claims Act.

The third major reform in this act increases deterrence by raising the civil forfeiture from $2,000 to $10,000 per claim. The original $2,000 amount has not been changed since 1863. In addition, damages payable to the Government would be increased from double to treble. In the criminal area, penalties would be raised to $1 million. The Senate passed these same increases earlier this year for false claims submitted by defense contractors.

Mr. President, the current fraud problems will not disappear by a wave of any magic fraud bill. But reform is desperately needed, and Congress must assume the responsibility.

Current law puts the Government at a critical disadvantage in fraud cases. Contractors have us over a barrel. Our choice is inexorably clear. If we like being over a barrel, I would suggest we leave the law the way it is and instead grin and bear continued rapes and pillages of the Treasury. The alternative is true reform that shifts the advantage back to the Government where it belongs, and deals with fraud as those who elect us would expect. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this bill as a very significant step toward repelling the current wave of fraud sweeping this country.

By Mr. HELMS (for himself, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. DENTON, Mr. EAST, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. LAXALT, and Mr. NICKLES):

S. 1563. A bill to amend the Federal Campaign Act of 1971 to prohibit the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

TO STOP THE USE OF COMPULSORY UNION DUES FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to halt a blatant violation of political freedom, the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes.

Federal laws give organized labor a special privilege enjoyed by no other private association—the right to take money from American workers as a condition of employment and to contribute that money to political causes and candidates the workers themselves may not necessarily support.

Federal labor laws grant union officials the power to require a person to pay dues as a condition of getting and keeping a job. Under this unique grant of special privilege, unions collect an estimated $3.5 billion a year from individuals who have to pay up or risk being fired.

The Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended in 1976, gives the appearance of restricting the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes. The law prohibits the use of compulsory dues for direct cash contributions to political candidates. It does not, however, prohibit the use of forced union dues for a number of other indirect means of supporting union-backed political candidates and causes.

In light of this dichotomy created by Federal legislation, union officials have divided their political expenditures into two categories. The first is commonly referred to as union hard money. It consists of money given directly to candidates in the form of cash or in-kind contributions taken from funds given voluntarily by union members. The second category is referred to as union soft money, spent by union officals on behalf of—but not contributed directly to—political candidates.

Soft money comes directly from compulsory union dues. It finances the operations of union PAC's and provides extensive in-kind political services. While it represents the overwhelming bulk of union political expenditures, it is neither documented nor reported to the FEC.

A relatively small portion of the millions of dollars in soft compulsory union dues money is used to operate the union PAC's. This portion pays the salaries of numerous full-time union political operatives across the Nation. It provides PAC supplies, finances mass mailings and travel expense accounts, and purchases sophisticated office machinery and computers.

Mr. President, even voluntary PAC contributions from union members originate with this compulsory dues soft money. Compulsory dues bankroll the administrative overhead costs of union partisan political fundraisers. Compulsory dues soft money used for financing union PAC's runs well into the millions every year. In July 1976, AFL-CIO public relations director, Bernard Albert, admitted that the annual budget of the national COPE alone ran to approximately $2 million.

In spite of the vast sums of compulsory union dues that finance the operating costs of union PAC's, the bulk of compulsory dues soft money goes for unreported, unlimited in-kind political expenditures.

The July 1979 issue of Steelabor, the official newspaper of the United Steelworkers of America, offered its readers a surprisingly candid and straightforward explanation of in-kind political spending. Union dues money, reported the union paper, > • • • can't go for direct political contributions—but it can do a lot; mailings supporting or opposing political candidates, phone banks, precinct visits, voter registration, and get-out-the-vote drives.

In spite of these admissions, Steelabor's account only tells half of the story. To fill out the picture, several key expenditures need to be added to the list: Weeks, thousands of union employees devoted almost solely to partisan politics; election day workers, paid overtime rates from compulsory dues; millions of political pamphlets and flyers; and paid election-day carpools and babysitters, to name a few.

Mr. President, once again, these indirect union in-kind political expenditures are not subject to any limitations under the FECA. They are paid for with dues money taken from workers as a condition of employment. And without question they represent the overwhelming bulk of union political expenditures.

Fortunately, the courts begun to address this problem. Most recently, Mr. President, the Supreme Court ruled in favor of workers in the case of Ellis/Fails versus Brotherhood of Railway, Airline and Steamship Clerks.

The Ellis/Fails case grew out of a collective bargaining agreement negotiated between Western Airlines and the Brotherhood of Railway, Airline and Steamship Clerks [BRAC] in 1971. Effective February 1971, all employees in BRAC's bargining union were required either to join the BRAC union or pay agency fees equal to full union dues.

BRAC officials forwarded portions of these dues to the State and national unions, used them for lobbying activities, made political contributions, administered members-only benefit plans, and took part in other activities unrelated to collective bargaining. Nonmember employees were opposed to several of the political and ideological activities supported by BRAC officials, yet were forced to finance them through the payment of agency fees. They filed a class action suit against BRAC employers.

The suit charged that BRAC officials had violated the Railway Labor Act [RLA] by charging agency fees above the amount needed to cover the nonmembers' share of collective bargaining costs. This practice violated the employees' rights as guaranteed under the first, fifth, and ninth amendments to the U.S. Constitution and under the RLA, and constituted a breach of the union's duty of fair representation for all members of the bargaining unit.

The suit also charged that BRAC's dues reduction procedure breached the union's duty of fair representation because of its arbitrary nature, because it offered only a small reduction of the total amount of nonbargaining spending, because it was not available to nonmembers, and because it was denied to members who had properly submitted objections.

Mr. President, the relief sought included a return by the union of all compulsory dues money improperly spent, injunctive relief imposing stringent requirements as to the purposes for which the union lawfully could spend future dues, and the recovery of attorneys' fees.

BRAC officials responded to the suit with two actions. They dropped the compulsory membership requirement, allowing employees to become agency fee-payors instead, and they amended their rebate scheme to provide a few more political expenditure rebates. The determination of the refund was entirely in the hands of BRAC officials, however, and was appealable only to a panel handpicked by BRAC.

In 1976, a U.S. district court ruled that protesting nonmember employees could not be forced to support financially the BRAC union's political and ideological activities, listed 12 other categories nonmembers could not be forced to support, such as lobbying, organizing, conventions, publications, and social activities.

In September 1982, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the rule that nonpolitical activities not essential to bargaining could not be charged to nonmembers, and affirmed the approval of BRAC's internal rebate scheme.

A petition to the Supreme Court of the United States was filed in January 1983 and the Court agreed in April to hear the case. Oral arguments were held in January 1984.

On April 15, 1984, the Supreme Court unanimously overturned the circuit court and struck down the controversial union rebate scheme. The Court held that employees' constitutional rights were violated when their forced union dues were used to finance activities and causes they opposed; and that a simple rebate of the involuntary loans, even with interest, was inadequate to protect workers' rights.

Under the Court's new ruling, union officials will initially have to reduce the fees charged to forced dues payers, or will have to deposit the fees in an interest-bearing escrow account while the correct chargeable amount of forced fees is determined.

Across the Nation, courts are responding to this hallmark Supreme Court decision. A compulsory unionism agreement requiring nonunion Chicago teachers to pay fees to the Chicago Teachers-Union [CTU] as a condition of employment was recently declared unconstitutional by the Seventh Circuit United States Court of Appeals in Hudson versus Chicago Board of Education.

Under this agreement, the Chicago Board of Education deducted a fee equal to 95 percent of full union dues from nonmember teachers' paychecks and turned the money over to the CTU. If the teachers protested the seizure and use of their money, they had recourse only to a rebate panel entirely controlled by CTU officials.

The Court ruled that before requiring nonunion employees to pay compulsory union fees, a public employer > * * * must establish a procedure that will make reasonably sure that the wages of nonunion employees will not be used to support those of the union's political and ideological activities that are not germane to collective bargaining * * *

The union-controlled rebate procedure failed to ensure that the nonunion members' money would not be used for political purposes.

In a continuing series of cases in Ohio, officials of the National Education Association have used the State courts to force nonunion teachers to pay compulsory union fees. In at least four of these cases that have gone to trial, the courts have ruled that NEA records are not adequate to determine how much money any teacher owed for collective-bargaining services.

In the past, Ohio courts had ruled against dissenting employees. Given the stringent guidelines set down by the Ellis/Fails case, however, the Ohio courts now have a firm precedent for protesting nonunion members from supporting political, nonbargaining expenses.

Mr. President, it is essential to rebut a false allegation circulated by opponents of my proposals to prohibit the expenditure of compulsory union dues for political, nonbargaining activities. Claiming that the use of compulsory union dues for politics is analogous to the use of corporate funds to establish political action committees with which stockholders may disagree; they say my legislation would unfairly tip the political balance of power in favor of business interests by restricting only union politics.

Those who have been confused by this smokescreen argument should read a recent decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals in Federal Election Commission versus International Association of Machinists which, in my opinion, shatters this bogus argument once and for all.

In that case, Mr. President, attorneys for the International Association of Machinists union charged that 11 corporations had violated the Federal Elections Campaign Act by soliciting contributions to their political action committees from administrative personnel under what they termed "inherently coercive" conditions. Although the district court ruled that no such violation had occurred, it did allow several constitutional issues raised by the plaintiffs to be heard by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Union attorneys asked the appeals court to decide, among other constitutional issues, whether the use of general corporate assets to establish and support corporate political action committees violates the first amendment rights of dissenting shareholders. Union attorneys cited the landmark Supreme Court decision in Abood versus Detroit Board of Education concerning the use of compulsory union dues by a union political action committee to promote the election of certain candidates.

In Abood, the Supreme Court held that the first amendment prohibits unions from forcing employees to support political causes against their will through the use of compulsory union dues. The union attorneys attempted to draw a parallel between Abood and FEC versus IAM. They argued that the use of treasury funds by corporations to establish and administer PAC's abridges the free speech rights of shareholders who object to such use of corporate assets. The Court of Appeals was not convinced.

Noting that ". . . in Abood the (Supreme) Court had held that the first amendment prohibited a public employee union from requiring any employee 'to contribute to the support of an ideological cause he may oppose as a condition of holding a job'", the appeals court ruled that there was no valid analogy between the union position in FEC versus IAM and Abood. The Court stated that a corporate shareholder is under no such compulsion to support a political cause against his will. Citing another Supreme Court decision in first National Bank of Boston versus Bellotti, the appeals court said "the shareholder invests in a corporation of his own volition and is free to withdraw his investment at any time and for any reason." A more appropriate analogy, according to the reasonsing of the court, would be the employee who voluntarily joins the union, and later finds himself in disagreement with its stand on a political issue.

Any meaningful campaign reform must deal with the abusive use of compulsory union dues by implementing court decisions to protect worker rights. The time has come to return to individual workers the right to choose for themselves which political candidates and causes their dollars will be used to support.

Because of the continuing menace of the use of involuntary union dues for political purposes, I am introducing legislation today to guarantee that all political expenditures will come from money voluntarily contributed.

Enactment of this important legislation will guarantee the voluntary nature of each person's participation in the political process by prohibiting the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes. This bill will insure that, in matters of political conscience, Federal election laws will be neutral while voluntary participation will continue to be protected. I respectfully urge my colleagues to give this legislation their fullest consideration.●

By Mr. DURENBERGER:

S. 1564. A bill to provide for a self-regulating system of lobby disclosure to supplement and make more effective current disclosure law in the least burdensome manner possible; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

INTEGRITY IN LOBBYING ACT

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, organized interest group influence in the policymaking process has long been a concern of this Congress. That's why nearly 40 years ago it passed the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, a law designed to disclose certain basic information about the significant activities of professional lobbyists.

Much, however, has changed since 1946. There was, of course, the Supreme Court's 1954 decision in U.S. versus Harriss, which substantially narrowed the applicability of the new law.

More important, though, was the extraordinary proliferation of Washington-based interest groups during the 1960's and 1970's. These groups were lured to the Nation's Capital by the expansionist mood of the Federal Government itself and encouraged to put down Washington roots in order to protect spending programs, tax measures, and regulatory policies beneficial to their interests.

Once here, they found the atmosphere quite congenial. The declining influence of political parties throughout this same period created a leadership vacuum that many groups were eager to fill and formed a political void that encouraged them to engage in more diverse forms of communication with Government officials. At the same time, decentralizing reforms in Congress, including the great growth in the numbers of subcommittees and staff members, opened many additional pathways to interest group influence. And changes in campaign finance laws profoundly altered the nature and scope of interest group involvement in Federal elections. Finally, increasingly sophisticated technologies have made it easier and less expensive for groups to influence constituents, potential constitutents, and lawmakers.

Yet, despite these enormous changes in the number of interest groups and the nature of lobbying, our basic policy governing disclosure remains unaltered. And the statutory basis of that policy, according to one of the Nation's leading authorities on interest groups, is "recognized by everyone familiar with it * * * (as) a toothless, ineffective law" which fails to cover some of the most significant new forms of lobbying activity.

While recognizing that changing times, tactics, and actors require a new and more effective means of disclosure, it is also well to recognize that groups, like individuals, have certain legal rights, not least among them the right to petition Congress. We must therefore strike a balance in lobbying reform—a balance that takes into account both the tremendous need for improved public disclosure of the nature and extent of lobbying activities and the constitutional need to preserve fundamental group rights.

Thus, I am introducing the "Integrity in Lobbying Act of 1985," a bill that will supplement and greatly enhance current lobbying regulations. Congressman LEE HAMILTON is introducing an identical bill in the House. The central purpose of this legislation is to improve the management of existing lobby disclosure law and to encourage lobbyists to provide more and better information though a self-regulating system of lobby disclosure. Underlying his approach is a basic faith in the professional integrity found among the vast majority of lobbyists and lobbying organizations, as well as a belief that interest group input is an important part of our democratic process. I want to stress that this legislation takes nothing away from the current complusory system or registration. It establishes an optional self-regulatory system that I believe will provide more and better information to the public and place fewer ineffective regulatory burdens on interest groups. If lobbyists choose not to comply with its provisions, however, they remain covered by the existing law.

This proposed legislation will provide for fuller information in three ways. First, in recognition of the profound changes that have occurred over the past two decades in the numbers, scope, and practices of interest groups seeking to influence Federal policy, it covers a wider array of lobbyists and lobbying activities under its disclosure provisions than existing law. Second, it increases the amount of information to be provided, including information on lobbying by volunteers. And third, it provides for an efficient and accessible means of identifying and analyzing lobbying activity through a computerized filing, coding, and cross-indexing system.

At the same time, in order to produce the least possible burden on first amendment rights and organizational capacity, the legislation is based on a unique system of self-regulation that relies on professional ethics and integrity. Moreover, the bill is designed to keep to a minimum the amount of paperwork and recordkeeping required on an organization complying with its provisions.

There are at least three major benefits to be gained from this broad but largely voluntary approach to disclosure. To begin with, timely information on lobbying activities can help Congress reconcile the conflicting goals of popular sovereignty—the principle that government is responsive to the people—and equal representation—the ideal that no single interest receives undue consideration over others because it is more effectively represented. Information on the extent of the imbalance in resources devoted to representing competing interests will alert Members of Congress to the need to listen more closely to the weaker voices and to consider more carefully the overall public interest. Second, information on who is lobbying on what issues can help alert and mobilize competing interests, enabling more voices to be heard. And finally, an open and accountable lobbying process based upon the good faith of lobbyists themselves can further develop the sense of ethics and professionalism among the diverse lobbying community, while at the same time enhancing public confidence in congressional decisions.

Mr. President, I ask that a copy of S. 1564 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1564

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Integrity in Lobbying Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) in recent years, changes in technology, campaigning, elections, and congressional procedures have combined to significantly enhance the influence of organized special interest groups in the legislative process;

(2) as Members of Congress are held increasingly accountable for their responses to such organized special interest groups, they have correspondingly less incentive to respond to the interests of unorganized segments of the public or to the political parties whose labels they bear;

(3) the timely disclosure of the nature and sources of activities undertaken by organized special interest groups for the purpose of influencing legislation can help dilute the bias in favor of such groups in the legislative process by—

(A) mobilizing previously unorganized segments of the public,

(B) creating countervailing pressures on Members of Congress to represent broad public interests in the face of organized special interest pressures, and

(C) enabling Members of Congress to more effectively assess the myriad pressures brought to bear upon them in the legislative process; (4) because the right to petition Congress for a redress of grievances is protected under the First Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, procedures for the implementation of lobbying disclosure policies must be designed to impose the least possible burden on this right; and

(5) although present lobbying disclosure regulations are inadequate, a system of disclosure that features voluntary compliance with professional standards can be an effective means of supplementing current law without infringing on First Amendment rights.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to establish a program that—

(1) provides for the self-regulatory disclosure to the Congress and to the public of the nature and sources of the activities of organized special interests which are undertaken for the purpose of influencing Federal legislation; and

(2) provides for the Congress to actively encourage such disclosure.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used in this Act—

(1) the term "affiliate" means an organization which is associated with another through a formal relationship based upon ownership or an agreement (including a charter, franchise agreement, or bylaws) under which—

(A) the governing instrument requires one such organization to be bound by decisions of the other organization on legislative issues, or

(B) the governing board of one such organization includes persons who—

(i) are designated representatives of another such organization or are members of the governing board, officers, or paid executive staff members of such other organization, and

(ii) by aggregating their votes, have sufficient voting power to cause or prevent action on legislation by the first such organization;

(2) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Senate;

(3) the term "Clerk" means the Clerk of the House of Representatives;

(4) the term "direct expenditure" means—

(A) a payment, distribution (other than normal dividends and interest), loan (if made on terms or conditions that are more favorable than those available to the general public), advance, deposit, or gift or other thing of value made—

(i) for mailing, printing, advertising, consulting fees or the like, which are associated with activities described in section 4; or

(ii) for the retention or employment of an individual or organization that makes lobbying communications on behalf of the retaining or employing organization; or

(B) a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforceable, to make, disburse, or furnish any item referred to in subparagraph (A);

(5) the term "identification" means—

(A) in the case of an individual, the name, occupation, and business address of the individual and the position held in such business; and

(B) in the case of an organization, the name and address of the organization, the principal place of business of the organization and a general description of its business or activities;

(6) the term "legislation" means the totality of all matter, both substantive and procedural, relating to the introduction, amendment, enactment, defeat or repeal of any bill, resolution, treaty, report, nomination, or other similar matter before the Congress;

(7) the term "lobbying communication"—

(A) means any oral or written communication (including a speech, address, article, advertisement, media appearance, press release, letter or personal appeal) directed to (i) a Member, officer or employee of Congress to influence the content or disposition of legislation, or (ii) any governmental official or employee to influence a decision by the President to sign or veto any legislation;

(B) means any oral or written communication (including a speech, address article, advertisement, media appearance, press release, letter or personal appeal) directed to any person designed to solicit such person to assist the soliciting organization's effort to influence legislation by (i) engaging in the activities described in this paragraph or paragraph (A), or (ii) participating in any demonstration, rally, or fund-raising drive intended to influence the content or disposition of legislation;

(C) does not include—

(i) a communication by an individual solely for a redress of personal grievances, or solely to express his personal opinion;

(ii) a communication by, or on behalf of, a candidate, as defined in section 301 (2) of the Federal Election Campaign Act (2 U.S.C. 431 (2)), or by, or on behalf of, an organization in its capacity as a political committee, as defined in section 301 (4) of such Act (2 U.S.C. 401 (4)); and

(iii) a communication which deals only with the existence, subject matter, or status of any issue,

(iv) a communication made through a speech or address, through a newspaper, book, periodical, magazine or newsletter published for distribution to the general public or published for purposes unrelated to engaging in activities described in section 3, (7) A, B, (a), except that this exemption shall not apply to a paid advertisement in a newspaper, book, periodical, or other publication distributed to the general public, or to a paid radio or television announcement, and

(D) in the case of an organization which is not registered under section 5 of this Act, shall not include a communication made to a Member, officer, or employee of the Congress in response to a request from that Member, officer, or employee, or submitted for inclusion in a report of a hearing or in the record or public file of a hearing;

(7) the term "Member, officer, or employee of the Congress" means—

(A) any Member of the Senate or the House of Representatives, or any Delegate or Resident Commissioner to the House of Representatives; and

(B) any officer or employee of the Senate or the House of Representatives or any employee of any Member, committee, or officer of the Congress;

(8) the term "organization" means any corporation, company, foundation, association, labor organization, firm, partnership, society, joint stock company, national organization of State or local appointed officials and any organizational unit thereof (excluding any organization of elected officials of general purpose State or local government whose employees operate solely on the authority of such public officials acting in their official capacities and whose employees receive their principal compensation and expenses for lobbying communications by such State and local governments), group of organizations, or group of individuals, which has one or more paid officers, directors, or employees;

(9) the term "paid officer, paid director, or paid employee" means an officer, director, or employee of an organization who received income from such organization as compensation for services at a rate in excess of the Federal minimum wage;

(10) the term "quarterly filing period" means any calendar quarter beginning on January 1, April 1, July 1, or October 1, of any year; and

(11) the term "volunteer" means an individual who works under the direction of an organization without compensation.

APPLICABILITY

SEC. 4. (a) The provisions of this Act shall apply to any organization which—

(1) makes, or makes plans to make, at least ten lobbying communications described in section 3(7)(A) during a quarterly filing period; or

(2) makes, or makes plans to make, at least five lobbying communications described in section 3(7)(A), and at least five lobbying communications described in section 3(7)(B) during a quarterly filing period.

(b) The provisions of sections 5 and 6 of this Act shall not apply to an affiliate of a registered organization if such affiliate engages in activities to the extent described in subsection (a) and such activities are reported by the registered organization. Any registered organization which reports on behalf of any affiliate shall include in its registration and reports an identification of such affiliate.

REGISTRATION

SEC. 5. (a) Each organization shall register with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate not later than fifteen days following the events described in section 4(a).

(b) The registration required by this section shall be in such form as the Secretary and Clerk shall jointly prescribe and shall contain the following:

(1) an identification of the organization;

(2) a description of the types of issues in which the organization, as of the date of filing, intends to engage in lobbying communications;

(3) the approximate number of individuals and organizations who are members of the organization and a description of the principal contributors to, and interests represented by, the registered organization, except that nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to require the disclosure of any membership or contributor list; and

(4) an identification of any retained individual or organization, any volunteer, and any employee who engages in lobbying communications on behalf of the organization, except that an organization shall not be required to identify a volunteer who has not engaged in lobbying communications to the extent described in section 4(a)(2).

(c) A registration filed under subsection (a) shall be effective until the first day of January of the year following the date upon which the initial registration is filed. Each organization shall file a new registration under subsection (a) within thirty days after the first day of January of each year, unless the organization has (1) ceased to engage in the activities described in section 4, and (2) has not made plans to engage in such activities during the ensuing year.

REPORTS

SEC. 6. (a) Each organization shall, between the first and fifteenth day of each quarterly filing period, file a report with the Secretary and the Clerk, at such place as they shall jointly designate, concerning—

(1) any activities described in section 4 which the organization has engaged in, or plans to engage in, as the case may be, during the quarterly filing period in progress; and

(2) an update of the report filed by such organization for the previous quarterly filing period.

(b) The report described in subsection (a) shall be in such form as the Secretary and Clerk shall jointly prescribe and shall contain the following:

(1) an identification of the organization filing the report;

(2) an estimate of the total direct expenditures and indirect costs incurred, or planned to be incurred, with respect to the activities described in section 4;

(3)(A) an identification of any retainee, employee, or volunteer who has engaged, or plans to engage, during the quarterly filing period in progress in a lobbying communication described in section 3(7)(A) on behalf of the organization, except that an organization shall not be required to identify a volunteer who has not engaged in lobbying communications to the extent described in section 4(a)(2); and

(B) an identification of each subject concerning which the retainee, employee or volunteer identified under subparagraph (A) has made, or plans to make, such lobbying communications;

(4) with respect to each subject identified in paragraph (3)(B)—

(A) an estimate of the total direct expenditures with respect to such lobbying communications, which the organization (i) made during the preceding quarterly filing period, and (ii) made, or plans to make, during the quarterly filing period in progress, stated according to the categories described in subsection (c) of this section;

(B) an estimate of the percentage of the amount described in subparagraphs (A)(i) and (A)(ii) expended or planned to be expended, as the case may be, with respect to—

(i) lobbying communications described in section 3(7)(A) of this Act, and

(ii) lobbying communications described in section 3(7)(B) of this Act;

(C) an estimate of the total number of hours spent by volunteers engaging in the activities described in section 4 of this Act with respect to such subject;

(D) an estimate of the number of media contacts made, or planned to be made in conjunction with the activities described in paragraph (4)(B)(ii) of this section; and

(E) a general description of the methodology used by the organization in developing the estimates required under this section.

(c)(1) the amounts described in paragraph (2) shall be stated in the following categories: Category A—amounts less than $10,000; Category B—amounts equal to or greater than $10,000, but less than $100,000; Category C—amounts equal to or greater than $100,000, but less than $500,000; Category D—amounts equal to or greater than $500,000, but less than $1,000,000; and Category E—amounts equal to or greater than $1,000,000.

(2) Any amount listed in Category E shall be stated as the number of millions involved.

(d) For the purpose of this section, the term "indirect costs" means the costs of general operating overhead such as the costs of salaries, office equipment, utilities and rental or mortgage payments, and the costs of legislative activities other than lobbying communications such as attending hearings and gathering information on and analyzing legislation, which are allocable to the activities described in section. 4.

DUTIES OF THE SECRETARY AND CLERK

SEC. 7. (a) It shall be the joint duties of the Secretary and Clerk—

(1) to develop computerized filing, coding, and cross-indexing systems to carry out the purposes of this Act, including a cross-indexing system which, for any person identified in any registration or report filed under this Act, discloses each organization identifying such person in any such registration or report;

(2) to make copies of each registration and report filed with them under this Act available for public inspection and copying, commencing as soon as practicable after the date on which the registration and report involved is received, but no later than the end of the fifth working day following such date, and to permit copying of such registration or report by hand or by copying machine, or, at the request of any individual or organization, to furnish a copy of any such registration or report upon payment of the cost of making and furnishing such copy; but no information contained in any such registration or report shall be sold or utilized by any individual or organization for the purpose of soliciting contributions or business;

(3) to compile and summarize, with respect to each quarterly filing period, the information contained in registrations and reports filed during such period in a manner which clearly presents the extent and nature of the activities described in section 4 which are engaged in during such period;

(4) within forty-five days after the close of each quarterly filing period, to make available the information compiled and summarized under paragraph (3)—

(A) to the public (including offering copies for sale by mail), and

(B) to Members and committees of the Congress, through its online computer system; and

(5) to prescribe such guidelines, reporting formats and procedures as are necessary for the performance of his duties under this Act;

(6) compile each week of a quarterly filing period, from material submitted by the Chairman of each committee of the Congress, the names of each representative of an organization and each organization testifying before the Congress and the purpose of the hearing at which the representative of such organization was testifying; and

(7) collating the matter compiled as provided in paragraph (6) with the other disclosure data compiled for each quarter pursuant to paragraph (3).

RESPONSIBILITY UNDER OTHER LAWS

SEC. 8. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, compliance with this Act shall be deemed to be compliance with the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act (2 U.S.C. 260 et seq.).

AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 9. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 10. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the provisions of this Act shall take effect on the first day of the first calendar quarter which begins more than one hundred and eighty days after the date of the enactment of the Act.

(b) The provisions of this Act requiring the issuance of guidelines to implement this Act shall become effective upon the date of enactment.

By Mr. NICKLES (for himself and Mr. BOREN):

S. 1565. A bill to require the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct a study of alternatives for providing agricultural credit during the 1986 through 1989 fiscal years; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT RELIEF ANALYSIS

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, while we are concentrating our present efforts in agriculture on the 1985 farm bill, farmers and ranchers alike continue to experience farm credit problems, with interest comprising a healthy chunk of total farm expenses.

Today Senator BOREN and I are introducing a measure to analyze three proposals which could drop farmers' interest rates by up to 30 percent on funds borrowed from the farm credit system. The bill I am introducing would require the Secretary of Agriculture to explore lowering farm interest rates by providing a Government guarantee on bonds issued by the farm credit system or by allowing the interest on the bonds to be free from Federal income tax or a combination of the two approaches.

The farm credit system [FCS] is a cooperative that provides credit to farmers and ranchers, their cooperatives, farm-related businesses, commercial fishermen, and rural homeowners. The FCS is supervised by the Farm Credit Administration, an independent Federal agency and contains about one-third of total farm debt. The FCS obtains its funds through the sale of securities to investors in the private credit market.

The FCS extends credit through its component parts: Federal Land Banks [FLB's] and Federal Land Bank Associations [FLBA's]; Federal Intermediate Credit Banks [FICB's] and Production Credit Associations [PCA's]; and the Banks for Cooperatives [BC's].

The 12 FLB's make 5 to 40-year loans, secured by mortgages on farms or rural real estate, to borrowers who apply at local FLBA's. Loans can be used to acquire farms, farmland, equipment and livestock, as well as to refinance existing debt. FLB's will make loans valued at an estimated $5.9 billion in 1986.

The 12 FICB's, through local PCA's, make loans of up to 7 years to farmers and ranchers, rural homeowners, and farm related businesses, and loans of up to 15 years to commercial fishermen. Loans can be used for the production of agricultural products; the harvesting and production of aquatic products; and the purchase, repair, and maintenance of rural homes.

The 12 BC's make long- and short-term loans directly to cooperatives of farmers, ranchers, or commercial fishermen.

Since September of last year, the prime rate has dropped from 13 percent to 9.5 percent, a 27-percent decline. But look at what has happened to farmers' cost of money during this time. Oklahoma Federal Land Bank borrowers saw interest rates jump from 11.75 percent to 12.5 percent on January 1 of this year. Something is wrong when agriculture has to pay more for money when the rest of the economy is paying less.

Mr. President, when the farm credit system takes a loss on a loan, this cost is not coming out of some investor's pocket. It is coming out of a farmer's pocket who can ill afford to bear additional financial liabilities. Last year, the PCA side of the ledger suffered a whopping $308 million in losses; in 1983, $245 million; in 1982, $160 million; and in 1981, $44 million. This trend is no different with the Federal Land Bank with $110 million in losses last year, up substantially from $8 million in 1983, $1.5 million in 1982, and less than $1 million in 1981.

Earlier this year, in testimony before the Committee on Small Business, John Harling, chief executive officer of the Farm Credit Banks of Omaha, explained how FCS borrowers are being hit twice from the deteriorating agriculture economy. When asked what would happen to agriculture lending institutions if the troubled agriculture situation continued, Mr. Harling stated the following:

> We are already seeing the pressure on both the farm credit associations and particularly the small local commercial banks. As those losses come into the portfolio and are written off, that brings continued pressure on earnings, continued pressure on capital and ultimately, if the losses continue, the organization will run out of capital base and will be forced into liquidation.
> Loss sharing agreements have been triggered now two years in a row in which the financially sound and strong PCA's provide capital to the others. The next step is to turn to the credit bank itself for financial assistance, and that is occurring now. But in both cases you can only go so far and then you start adversely impacting all of the other borrowers, and you can't raise your rates to the point where you put that next round of borrowers through the ringer until their loan won't work anymore.
> That is what we are seeing happening, that downward spiral as the pressure of increased costs of funds and losses comes to bear on interest costs.

Mr. Harling went on to state he felt we were "a ways away" from a total collapse of the agriculture credit system but stated, "we believe that some significant action needs to be taken and very soon, the sooner the better, to keep that from happening."

Mr. President, I do not propose that providing Government guaranteed or tax-free farm credit system bonds is the answer to all of agriculture's problems. Nor do I think the farm bill or any other single piece of legislation will cure all of the industry's ills. However, I do think the prospect of lowering farmer's interest rates through the measures I have outlined are worth pursuing.

According to special analyses F of the fiscal year 1986 Federal budget, "tax-exempt interest rates in 1984 have normally been about 75 percent of taxable interest rates on long-term obligations with similar credit risk." Typically, Government guarantees result in interest rates at about 95 percent of market rates. Together, these could result in a 30-percent interest rate reduction for Oklahoma farmers and ranchers. The proposals I am setting forth could be a tremendous boost to get agriculture back on its feet again.

Most of my colleagues are aware the farm credit system is trying to clean up its own house by undergoing some internal changes in order to obtain greater efficiencies in the system. But, I am not sure whether a reorganization plan will result in lower interest rates to farmers and ranchers. I am also concerned that localized input into lending and management decisions will suffer in the process.

Mr. President, we should not wait until the farm credit system comes knocking on the door to consider what should be done. Nor do I want to haphazardly set forth a proposal when certain questions remain unanswered. But this measure will give us the facts about Government guaranteed tax-free farm credit system bonds, and we will then be able to take the right course of action.

Under the bill I am introducing, the Secretary of Agriculture, in consultation with the Treasury Secretary, would take into account any loss in tax revenues resulting from my proposals together with gains in net farm income for farmers and farm-related businesses and the resulting increases in tax revenues. By October 31, the Secretary would tell us what he found. Quite frankly, there are many people in agriculture who would love to become taxpayers. They simply have not been turning a profit. Granted, revenue would be lost from tax-exempt bonds, but the Government might make a dollar by making taxpayers out of a few people along the way.

Under my bill, the Secretary would also consider the potential savings to the Farmers Home Administration resulting from fewer borrowers having to turn to the traditional lender of last resort. In Oklahoma, the demand for FmHA farm ownership money is three times greater than funds available. By easing credit terms at PCA's and Land Banks, the Federal Government could be doing itself a favor by lessening pressure on its own farm lending agency, the Farmers Home Administration.

In closing, let me say there is indeed a crisis in agriculture. No single piece of legislation will solve all of our problems. But collectively, congressional actions can improve the economic climate in agriculture. Through commodity programs, we will be addressing the income side of the equation. Through proposals such as those I have outlined today, we can take steps toward reducing the interest expense which is eating away profits for much of the Nation's agriculture sector. It is my hope to put this legislation on a fast track and hope my colleagues will join me in this effort to bring credit relief to America's farmers and ranchers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of my bill be printed in the RECORD.

S. 1565

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a)(1) the Secretary of Agriculture, in consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury, shall conduct a study of alternatives for providing agricultural credit during the 1986 through 1989 fiscal years.

(2) In conducting such study, the Secretary shall—

(A) estimate the demand for agricultural credit during such fiscal years, based upon current trends in farm income, farm prices, projected interest rates, and changes in farm land values;

(B) estimate the cost of providing direct and guaranteed loans under the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1921 et seq.) during such fiscal years, based upon projected credit demands and farm income;

(C) evaluate a program of providing credit to agricultural producers that would offer cheaper credit to such producers and reduce the dependence of such producers on the Federal Government by providing—

(i) Government guarantees for bonds sold by institutions of the Farm Credit System established under the Farm Credit Act of 1971 (12 U.S.C. 2001 et seq.);

(ii) exemptions from Federal income taxation for interest on such bonds; or

(iii) both such guarantees and exemptions;

(D) take into account any loss in tax revenue resulting from alternatives for providing agricultural credit, together with gains in net income for farmers and farm-related businesses and the resulting increase in tax revenues; and

(E) take into account potential savings to the Federal Government resulting from such alternatives.

(b) Not later than October 31, 1985, the Secretary of Agriculture shall submit a report containing the results of such study, together with any necessary legislation, to the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry of the Senate.

By Mr. DENTON (for himself and Mr. HATCH):

S. 1566. A bill to extend the Adolescent Family Life Demonstration Program for 3 years; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

ADOLESCENT FAMILY LIFE DEMONSTRATION PROGRAM EXTENSION

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, it is my pleasure to join with Senator HATCH to introduce a bill to reauthorize the Adolescent Family Life Act of 1981, title XX of the Public Health Service Act. The bill would reauthorize the law with no changes to the current statute, and at the current authorization level of $30 million for 1986, 1987, and 1988. The $30 million authorization would continue the operations of the multiyear demonstration projects at a time when all informed and thinking Americans acknowledge the alarming number of adolescent pregnancies and abortions.

During the closing days of the 98th Congress, Public Law 98-512 extended the program for an additional year, until September 30, 1985. After hearings and long deliberation, last year's reauthorization was amended by deleting the then existing references to referral for such services, to strengthen and emphasize requirements that care projects provide education and vocational training. Otherwise, the AFL Program remained unchanged as the result of the reauthorization.

Given the efforts of the last Congress, I see no need for extensive consideration of the proposed reauthorization. For my colleagues who are interested in the policy rationale and past achievements of the program, I recommend an examination of the report filed last year by the Committee on Labor and Human Resources (98-496), and of the hearings held on April 24 and 26, 1984, by the Subcommittee on Family and Human Services.

In short, Mr. President, I believe that all of my colleagues are concerned about the health and well-being of teenagers and their families. I urge them to join us in supporting a small but vital program. Through the AFL Program, we are finding and developing prevention, care, and research projects that can help thousands of adolescents directly and, through demonstration and dissemination, create models for successful programs that ultimately can help millions of adolescents and their parents deal with the causes and consequences of teenage pregnancy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

S. 1566

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2010(a) of the Public Health Service Act is amended by striking out "and" after "1984," and by inserting before the period a comma and "$30,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $30,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and $30,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988".

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleague, Senator DENTON, in introducing a bill to reauthorize the Adolescent Family Life Act of 1981, title XX of the Public Health Service Act. We propose that it be reauthorized for 3 years at the current authorization level of $30 million for 1986, 1987, and 1988.

Each year, more than a million American adolescents become pregnant, and a significant number of these pregnancies are unwed mothers. Certainly these statistics demonstrate that the issues of adolescent sexuality, pregnancy, and parenthood are of concern to all of us.

Nonetheless, I believe strongly that these issues are, at their core, family issues. The role of the family, as research supports, is a key factor in dealing with these serious problems. The involvement of the family, especially of parents, in the decisions made by a teenager can be critical to the outcome and adjustment of an adolescent.

For these reasons, I have been a supporter of the Adolescent Family Life Program and am proud to cosponsor its reauthorization for 3 years. This bill, which authorizes funding of service demonstration programs, promotes an integrated family approach which recognizes the sensitive and private nature of these problems.

The Adolescent Family Life Program is an important alternative to previous federally funded programs because it encourages family participation, because it promotes adoption as an alternative to abortion, and because it encourages care, counseling, and education and vocational training for pregnant teenagers and adolescent parents. Although a new governmental program, it takes a more traditional as well as a more comprehensive approach to the problems of adolescent sexuality, pregnancy, and parenthood. This is the correct approach—Government should act to strengthen the bond between parent and child and should support the family unit.

I encourage the Senate to recognize the positive potential of this alternative to the problems of teenage sexuality, pregnancy, and parenthood by reauthorizing the Adolescent Family Life Act for another 3 years.

By Mr. LAXALT (for himself and Mr. HECHT):

S. 1568. A bill to declare that the United States holds certain lands in trust for the Reno Sparks Indian Colony.

RENO SPARKS INDIAN COLONY

● Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, I introduce for myself and my distinguished colleague, Senator HECHT, a bill to declare that the United States holds certain lands in trust for the Reno Sparks Indian Colony.

This bill, Mr. President, will create a new colony consisting of some 1,900 acres in Hungry Valley, some 10 miles north of Reno, NV. The present colony, consisting of some 20 acres, was established in 1917. The tribe has grown over 400 percent since that time and its present land base is simply not sufficient to permit any tribal continuity. Additionally, the bill places the present colony land in trust for the tribe.

The new tribal land provides for the cancellation of grazing rights on some 640 acres which will be used for its housing needs. Separate agreements will be reached between the grazing right holder and the colony for that loss. Grazing rights to the remaining transferred land will remain intact.

For its part, the tribe has agreed to relinquish to Washoe County a parcel of land needed by the county in nearby Lemmon Valley.

I stress that the basic purpose of the bill is to relieve severe crowding of tribal housing and community activities in the colony's present restricted location.●

● Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, today I am privileged to join my senior colleague from Nevada, Senator LAXALT, in introducing legislation to withdraw some 1,900 acres of public land located in Hungry Valley, NV, for use by the Reno-Sparks Tribal Colony.

The Reno-Sparks Indian Colony was established in 1917 through the purchase of a 20-acre tract of land by the Federal Government for the amount of $6,000. This purchase was a direct result of the abolishment of certain treaties by the Congress in 1871 and the subsequent need to address various nonreservation Indian groups who had not been accommodated by the treaty allotment system.

The colony's population has grown in excess of 400 percent since that time, and for the past 15 years the colony has been working diligently to expand its land base for housing and economic development. Today's legislation is a balanced and well-planned culmination of these efforts.

Despite some initial misunderstandings about the colony's development intentions, this proposal now has virtually unanimous support at the local level. Most importantly, enactment of this bill will trigger a contractual agreement between the colony and Washoe County, dated June 26, 1984, which provides for transfer to the county of 160 acres of colony lands located in nearby Lemmon Valley.

Finally, this bill provides for the cancellation of grazing privileges on the 640 acres which the colony intends to develop for housing. It is our intention to cause as little disturbance as possible to the present grazing activities in Hungry Valley, and we believe that the bill's grazing provisions will accomplish this end.

I look forward to working with my colleagues toward this bill's swift enactment, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1568

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) Except as otherwise provided in section 2, all right, title, and interest of the United States in the lands described in subsection (b) of this section are hereby declared to be held by the United States in trust for the benefit and use of the Reno Sparks Indian Colony and are hereby declared to be part of the Reno Sparks Indian Colony.

(b) The lands referred to in subsection (a) comprise approximately 1,948.38 acres of public land within Hungry Valley, Washoe County, Nevada, and are described as follows:

Township 21 North, Range 20 East, Mount Diablo base line and meridian, Section 4, 640 acres more or less, reservation, restrictions, and conditions, if any, rights of way and assessors either of record or actually existing on said premises.

Township 21 North, Range 20 East, Mount Diablo base line and meridian, Section 9, 640 acres more or less, reservations, restrictions, and conditions, if any, rights of way and assessors either of record or actually existing on said premises.

Township 21 North, Range 20 East, Mount Diablo base line and meridian, Section 16, 640 acres more or less, reservations, restrictions, and conditions, if any, rights of way and assessors either of record or actually existing on said premises.

Township 19 North, Range 20 East Mount Diablo base line and meridian, beginning at a point on the North County Road right-of-way fence line described as being 1,268 feet East and 30 feet North of the West quarter corner of Section 7 said point being at the intersection of the boundary fence between L.M. Christianson and A.L. Jensen, with said North County Road right-of-way line; thence North 0 8' West 490.30 feet; thence West 787.74 feet thence South 0 12' West 490.30 feet to North County Road right-of-way fence, thence along said fence line 373.16 feet; thence North 104.35 feet to the North County Road right-of-way fence line 208.71 feet to the place beginning, containing 8.38 acres more or less, beginning reservations, restrictions, and conditions, if any, rights of way and assessors either of record or actually existing on said premises.

Township 19 North, Range 20 East, Mount Diablo base line and a meridian, beginning at the intersection of the East boundary line of the West half of the South West quarter of Section 7 with the South line of Scott Street Road, said point being 30 feet South of the North East corner of said West half of the South West quarter; thence South 89 35' West and along the South line of said Scott Street Road 361.2 feet; thence South and a parallel with the East boundary line of said West half of Southwest quarter of Section 7, 2,326.18 feet South to North line of Glendale Road; thence South 64 30' East along the North line of said Glendale Road 400 feet to the East line of Glendale Road West half of South West quarter of Section 7; thence North along East boundary line 2,501 feet to the place of beginning containing 20 acres more or less, reservations, restrictions, and conditions, if any, rights of way and assessors either of record or actually existing on said premises.

SEC. 2. (a)(1) Except as otherwise provided in this section, nothing in this Act shall deprive any person of any right-of-way, mining claim, grazing permit, water right, or other right or interest which such person may have in the land described in the first section on the date preceding the date enactment of this Act.

(2) Notwithstanding the last sentence of section 402(g) of the Federal Land Policy and Management of 1976 (90 Stat. 2774, 43 U.S.C. 1752(g)), within 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior shall cancel all grazing permits and leases on the following described land:

Township 21 North, Range 20 East, Mount Diablo Meridian, Section 4 comprising 640 acres more or less in Washoe County, Nevada.

(b) Within 120 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with section 402(g) of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (90 Stat. 2774, 43 U.S.C. 1752(g)), shall pay to the holder of any lease or permit cancelled under subsection (a) of this section reasonable compensation, to be determined by the Secretary, for the adjusted value of any improvements which said holder constructed or placed on the land described in subsection (a)(2) of this section and cannot be removed. Such payment shall not exceed the fair market value of the terminated portion of the holder's interest therein.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the Secretary of the Interior, out of funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as the Secretary of the Interior may require to make the payments required under subsection (b) of this section.

(d) The grazing privileges exercised under any grazing permit or lease issued by the Secretary of the Interior on any of the following described lands located within the grazing unit known as the Paiute Canyon Grazing Allotment Range. Washoe County, Nevada, prior to the date of enactment of this Act shall not be affected by this Act, and shall continue to be subject to the terms and conditions of such permit or lease, and to the applicable rules, and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior:

Township 21 North, Range 20 East, Mount Diablo base line and meridian, Section 9, 640 acres more or less.

Township 21 North, Range 20 East, Mount Diablo base line and meridian, Section 16, 640 acres more or less.

(e) The grazing privileges exercised under any grazing permit or lease on the lands described in subsection (d) of this section shall continue to be administered by the Secretary of the Interior through the Bureau of Land Management in accordance with the rules and regulations governing grazing permits and leases on the public lands. Such grazing permits or leases may be canceled or modified by the Secretary of the Interior for failure to meet the terms and conditions of such permits or leases or for failure to abide by the applicable rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior. If a grazing permit or lease is so canceled, the Secretary of the Interior shall not issue a new grazing permit or lease covering the lands described in subsection (d) of this section.

(f) Grazing fees for the grazing permits and leases on the lands described in subsection (d) of this section shall continue to be payable by the holder of such permit or lease to the Secretary of the Interior at the prevailing rates. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, such fees shall be remitted by the Secretary of the Interior to the Reno Sparks Indian colony within 30 days after the date on which such fees are paid to the Secretary of the Interior.

(g) The grazing permits and leases on the lands described in subsection (d) of this section shall not be assigned or transferred to any person or organization other than the Reno Sparks Indian Colony.

SEC. 3. (a) Section 1 of the Act of August 9, 1955 (69 Stat. 539, as amended; 25 U.S.C. 415), is amended by inserting ", and lands held in trust for the Reno Sparks Indian Colony," immediately after "Twenty-nine Palms Band of Luiseno Mission Indians,".

(b) Section 164 of the Act of July 14, 1955 (42 U.S.C. 7474), shall be applied without regard to the provisions of the first section of this Act.●

S. 1569. A bill to amend title XVII of the Public Health Service Act to encourage health promotion and disease prevention through the implementation of a coordinated national nutrition monitoring system; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

IMPROVED PUBLIC HEALTH THROUGH NUTRITION MONITORING ACT

●Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Improved Public Health through Nutrition Monitoring Act of 1985, a bill which I believe will help us better understand and assess the nutritional and health status of Americans.

Last year, I introduced similar legislation. This year's version has some important changes, but the basic purpose is the same. A national nutrition monitoring and surveillance system will help us obtain timely information about the nutritional health of Americans, including diet, nutrition, and health status measurements, food consumption patterns, with the overall goal of insuring a safe and nutritious food supply.

Importantly, this bill links nutrition monitoring efforts to health promotion. The bill promotes the public health and the prevention of diseases by coordinating and improving Federal efforts in nutrition monitoring. We need to begin to combine what we know about good nutrition and health promotion. This bill does this.

Much is being done in this country at this time to improve health care, to reduce costs, and to promote good health. Much of this activity has taken place as a self-help effort, and these efforts need to continue. But we also need to increase our knowledge of those Americans who are in high risk groups or geographic areas and who lack basic nutritional and dietary needs. Presently, however, we have a major problem—a lack of timely nutrition and dietary data, and an analysis of such data that can be used for public use and planning.

The Department of Health and Human Services now engages in several nutrition-related research and monitoring activities. Foremost is the National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (NHANES). The Department of Agriculture also conducts a comparable survey in the Nationwide Food Consumption Survey (NFCS). In 1981, the administration submitted to Congress the long-awaited joint implementation plan for a Comprehensive National Nutrition Monitoring System. This was done to consolidate the two major nutrition studies of NHANES and NFCS into one coordinated survey to begin in 1987. To this date, we are still waiting for implementation and it looks virtually impossible to meet the 1987 deadline.

We now know that nutrition is linked to our health. It is a major component in promoting health and preventing disease, especially during pregnancy, infancy, childhood, and adolescence. We also know that without proper nutrients, the most severe impact can be malnutrition and even hunger and long-term illnesses.

Representative GEORGE E. BROWN, JR., of California, who has been a leading advocate for nutrition-monitoring legislation in the House, has eloquently described the connection between health and the use of nutrition data. I believe his statement concisely explains the critical need that we, in Congress, have for adequate up-to-date nutrition data to make informed policymaking decisions.

Congress needs and should use the information from such a national nutrition monitoring system to formulate and evaluate the consequences of nutrition and health policies and programs, oversee the effectiveness and efficiency of such Federal programs, evaluate the quality of the administration of the programs, and assess the extent to which the programs and policies are consistent and coordinated. Establishment of national baseline data is essential for evaluating the implications of changes in agricultural policy related to food production, processing, and distribution which may affect the nutritional quality and safety of the food supply; for monitoring the impact of food consumption practices and trends; for identifying early warning signals of both low and high caloric and nutrient intake; and for determining the appropriateness of Federal efforts regarding food regulations and nutrition research and education.

Mr. President, my bill would amend title 17 of the Public Health Service Act and require that the Secretary of Health and Human Services prepare a comprehensive health promotion and nutrition monitoring plan over a 10-year period to improve Federal health promotion and disease prevention efforts, particularly nutrition monitoring and related research programs. To advise the Secretary, an Interagency Health Promotion and Nutrition Monitoring Board is established. Furthermore, an Advisory Council on Health Promotion and Nutrition Monitoring will be appointed by the President and Congress to give scientific and technical advice on the development and implementation of the comprehensive plan and to evaluate the progress of the nutrition monitoring program.

The bill authorizes $3 million to carry out the health promotion and nutrition plan: $2 million for a competitive grants program to encourage nutritional status research and cost-effective methods for surveillance, and $1 million for technical assistance to State and local governments. These costs, however, would be offset by the improved health and collection of new, useful nutrition information which would be generated.

In conclusion, Mr. President, nutrition monitoring and related research is now scattered among various Federal agencies and departments. The result has been inefficient management, untimely data collection and dissemination, and a lack of coordinating among the various Federal agencies. In these times of Federal spending restraints, more needs to be done to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of nutrition monitoring. This legislation is a first attempt to assure that accountability, while at the same time getting the information that is so desperately needed.

Similar legislation—H.R. 2436—has been introduced in the House by Representative MACKAY. I urge my colleagues to support this critical measure.●

S. 1570. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to exclude the employees of States and political subdivisions of States from the provisions of that act relating to maximum hours, to clarify the application of that act to volunteers, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, today, I am introducing legislation in response to the Supreme Court's recent decision in Garcia versus San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority which held that the Fair Labor Standards Act [FLSA] is applicable to State and local governments. The total impact of this decision is still being assessed by various State and local entities but evidence presented to a hearing conducted by the Labor Subcommittee, on July 25, which I chair, was staggering. I am convinced that Federal intrusion into the employer-employee relationship at the State and local level is totally unwarranted.

I am very pleased that my distinguished colleague from California, Senator WILSON, has agreed to sponsor this legislation with me. His work and interest in this area are well known and of great assistance to the Labor Subcommittee. In addition, I am pleased to be joined by so many of my colleagues who, recognizing the potential impact of the Garcia decision on their constituents, have agreed to cosponsor this bill.

Briefly, as orginally enacted in 1938, the FLSA required every employer to pay each of its employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce the statutory minimum wage and overtime rate. Initially, the definition of employer excluded both the United States or any State or political subdivision of a State.

This exemption for State and local governments first cracked in 1966. Then, coverage was extended to include an enterprise engaged in the operation of a hospital, an institution primarily engaged in the care of the sick, the aged, the mentally ill or defective who reside at such institution, a school for the mentally or physically handicapped or gifted children, an elementary or secondary school, or an institution of higher education, regardless of whether or not the hospital, institution, or school was public or private. Also, coverage was mandated for both public and private railways and carriers.

After the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of such extension to hospitals, institutions and schools in Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183 (1968), Congress proceeded to extend FLSA coverage to virtually all State and local employees in 1974. A partial exemption from the overtime provisions was granted for firefighters who, under the FLSA, are allowed to work 212 hours in a 28-day cycle and for police officers who are allowed to work 171 hours in the same time period before overtime or premium pay is required. This is in comparison to the standard 40-hour workweek otherwise applicable.

The congressional extension to State and local governments was short lived, however. In National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976), the Supreme Court ruled that the Commerce Clause did not empower Congress to enforce such requirements against the States "in areas of traditional governmental functions." 426 U.S. at 852.

Until February 19, 1985, this remained the law of the land. Then, in a 5–4 vote, the Supreme Court changed its mind and ruled that in covering employees of the San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority under the wage and hour provisions of the FLSA, Congress contravened no affirmative limit on its power under the Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution. Thus, overnight literally State and local governments found themselves facing a potential liability that could reach $3 billion.

For my own State of Oklahoma, the Department of Public Safety has informed me that including prospective troopers attending an intensive stress-type academy will cost the State an additional $68,000 per month in overtime for an average of 50 cadets because of FLSA requirements. The city of Stillwater has reported that the Garcia decision will cost it $624,279 this year alone. These are not isolated instances.

Evidence presented to the Labor Subcommittee on the potential effects of Garcia has led me to conclude that a legislative response is imperative. Therefore, the bill I am introducing today will address the three main problem areas resulting from this decision.

First, the legislation would exempt State and local governments from the overtime but not the wage provisions of the FLSA. This restores to State and local governments the flexibility to schedule their employees to serve best the needs of their own areas. Without this provision, overtime would have to be paid at any time after the statutory permitted hours for a workweek or period had been reached and compensatory time off or comp time in lieu of such overtime would not be permitted. In certain highly stressful occupations such as police work, firefighting, mental health counseling, to name a few, time off is preferable to employees over extra pay. The legislation does not require that compensatory time off be used or that overtime premium pay be given; it merely allows the flexibility to offer comp time as an alternative.

Mandating that overtime be compensated in cash, as Garcia does, presents significant cost problems in providing services needed on a cyclical basis. For example, testimony received at the Labor Subcommittee hearing indicated that Los Angeles County has fire problems about 6 months of each year. During this period, firefighters must work many extra hours and, prior to Garcia, would then take comp time during the slack season. Having to pay overtime is estimated to cost Los Angeles County an additional $12.5 million a year just for fire protection alone. In one 18-day period in June and July of this year, the Los Angeles County Fire Department incurred an additional cost of $564,000 for overtime as a result of Garcia. This legislation would restore Los Angeles County's ability to use comp time.

An extreme example of what can happen under the Garcia decision on police work occurred right here in Washington, DC. Two detectives were pulled off a homicide investigation by police officials who were concerned that the detectives would have to be paid overtime if they continued to work past the end of their shift. To add more insult to this, the two detectives reassigned to the case also were pulled off when their shifts ended. I would ask unanimous consent that a copy of the July 10, 1985, Washington Post article discussing these events be inserted in the RECORD at the end of my statement along with two other articles. One is an article entitled "Overtime Ruling Costly to the Localities" which appeared in the July 15, 1985, Washington Post; and the other, an editorial which appeared in the Wall Street Journal on July 24, 1985.

Second, the bill would exempt volunteers of State and local governments from both the wage and hour provisions of the FLSA. The most common example used in this area is volunteer firemen who, under Department of Labor regulations, are presumed to be employees if they receive more than $2.50 per call as reimbursement for expenses they may have incurred.

Although this is a serious problem, it is even more far reaching. Called into question as a result of the imposition of the FLSA on State and local governments would be, for example, a referee for the local high school basketball game or a school crossing guard who may receive some nominal fee. This local school district could find that time and attendance records are required to assure full compliance with all FLSA requirements. In an example presented at the Labor Subcommittee hearing, a county busdriver for the transportation department who desires to volunteer as a driver in a county-run meals-on-wheels program for the elderly would be prohibited.

Obviously, there are countless other examples. The point, however, is clear. The Federal Government should not be interfering with these individuals who, for humanitarian reasons want to offer their volunteer services at the State and local level. This legislation would not allow this type of intrusion.

Third, the bill would have an effective date with respect to workweeks beginning after February 19, 1985, the day the Supreme Court decided the Garcia case. Another troubling aspect of the Garcia decision to State and local governments is the potential liability they face while bringing themselves into compliance with the FLSA. Although the Labor Department will not institute enforcement proceedings until later, State and local governments are still subject to individual lawsuits not only for backpay but also punitive damages which means successful claimants can receive double the backpay award plus attorney fees. In light of the fact that State and local governments were complying with the law of the land one day and the Supreme Court changed it overnight, imposition of this type of liability seems inappropriate.

I have had several conversations on this matter with administration officials. While they assure me that the administation will not support legislation in this area unless there is active and coordinated support for it by State and local governments, I am confident this bill can meet that test. The administration has been invited to testify as the Labor Subcommittee continues its hearing on Garcia on September 10, 1985. Further, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a letter I received be printed in the RECORD at the end of my statement and after the previously referred newspaper articles. The letter is dated July 22, 1985, and signed by representatives of seven States and local organizations asking for legislative relief.

With the added support of your cosponsorship, I am sure this bill can be a vehicle with the broad-based backing from the grassroots of the White House that is needed to enact a solution to this serious problem.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1570

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 13(b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended—

(1) by striking out the period at the end of clause (29) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and "or"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new clause:

"(30) any employee of a public agency that is a State, a political subdivision of a State, or an interstate govenment agency.".

SEC. 2. Section 3(e) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended—

(1) by striking out "paragraphs (2) and (3)" in paragraph (1) and by inserting in lieu thereof "paragraphs (2), (3), and (4)"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) The term 'employee' does not include any individual who is a volunteer for a public agency that is a State, a political subdivision of a State, or an interstate governmental agency, even if the individual is paid expenses or a nominal fee to perform the services for which the individual volunteered.".

SEC. 3. The amendments made by the first section of this Act shall take effect with respect to work weeks beginning after February 19, 1985.

D.C. POLICE TAKE DETECTIVES OFF SLAYING PROBE TO AVOID OVERTIME

(By John Ward Anderson)

It apparently was one of the shortest cases that D.C. homicide detectives Tom Arnold and Joe Schwartz had ever worked.

At 10:30 Monday night they left the office at 300 Indiana Ave. NW to investigate a fatal shooting at Harvard Street and Georgia Avenue NW. About an hour later their roles in the investigation came to a halt when an official in the Criminal Investigations Division ordered them back to D.C. police headquarters for an unprecedented reason: police officials were concerned that the detectives, who got off work at 11:30 p.m., would have to be paid overtime to continue working the case.

Two more investigators, Julia Crosby and Daniel Villars, were assigned to the case and worked it through the night. When their shift of duty was finished at 7:30 a.m., they, too, were ordered to go home, again because of overtime.

When a suspect in the slaying was arrested about noon yesterday, Detective Dwayne Stanton appeared at the D.C. Superior Court arraignment, but because he had only limited knowledge of the case, the proceeding had to be postponed until today.

While homicide officials and investigators reacted with anger and frustration at what one termed the "round robin" of detectives assigned to the case, police officials—embarrassed at the way the investigation was handled—said a misinterpretation of a memo on work hours caused the confusion.

Gary Hankins, labor committee chairman of the Fraternal Order of Police, said the community was "shortchanged" in the quality of the investigation.

"Any time an investigation is being conducted, when the evidence is freshest and people's memories are freshest is the most productive time. The idea of pulling people off at that time of an investigation is ludicrous," Hankins said.

"We certainly are not going to stop our job as police officers because someone is going to eat up [compensatory] time or overtime," said Assistant Chief of Police Isaac Fulwood Jr., who called the removal of the original detectives "unacceptable."

"It should never have happened," Fulwood said. "They should have stayed on the scene and finished the case."

The victim of the shooting was identified by police as Duane Lee Taylor, 18, of 589 Columbia Rd. NW, who was shot once in the upper right chest and was taken by D.C. Fire Department ambulance to the Washington Hospital Center, where he died a short time later.

Police said a 16-year-old Northwest Washington youth, whose name was not released, was arrested about 1 p.m. yesterday and charged with second-degree murder in the slaying.

No officials or investigators in the homicide unit would speak on the record about the investigation of the incident because of a standing order that members of the unit not talk with the press. Details were provided by homicide officials, investigators, and other police department sources who were familiar with the case.

Fulwood said the removal of investigators was due to a "misinterpretation" of a July 3 police memo that attempted to spell out new guidelines on when and how police officers should be paid overtime.

The new guidelines were necessary, Fulwood said, because of a recent Supreme Court ruling that police officers and firefighters nationwide are covered by the federal Fair Labor Standards Act.

Previously, D.C. police officers who were not covered by the act could work overtime in exchange for an equal amount of leave. Under the Supreme Court ruling, however, an officer who works more than 171 hours in a 28-day period has to be paid time-and-a-half.

The memo said that "Compensatory time earned as a result of late runs, late arrest, etc., must be documented," justified and signed by the watch commander.

According to Fulwood, the purpose of the memo was "not only to control [compensatory] time but to get a handle on the impact" of the Supreme Court ruling, which he said could have a "devastating effect on the budget of the department." Fulwood said he thought the memo was "perfectly clear."

"If there was a misunderstanding, it's been cleared up," he said.

OVERTIME RULING COSTLY TO LOCALITIES

(By Lee Hockstader)

A recent Supreme Court ruling forcing state and local governments to adhere to federal wage and hour laws will add $10 to $15 million a year to the costs of operating the D.C. government and hundreds of thousands of dollars to suburban governments, area officials say.

That is only a small portion of what is now estimated to be the overall $2 billion to $4 billion cost to state and local governments from the ruling that forces the governments to pay overtime wages to most of their workers instead of giving them compensatory time off.

"It's too much money," complained attorney Gilbert J. Ginsburg, a labor lawyer who is an adviser to many cities, including Alexandria and New York.

The ruling "hits very, very hard and is a burden," said Cornelius J. O'Kane, Fairfax County's personnel director. Officials there estimate the court's Feb. 19 ruling will cost Fairfax taxpayers $500,000 to $1 million a year.

Most of the added costs will come in overtime to police and firefighters, who in the past have earned substantial amounts of compensatory time off.

For example, one immediate impact of the ruling is in western states such as California, where thousands of firefighters will be collecting time-and-a-half overtime pay for battling the forest fires that were out of control in that region last week. Paying the California firefighters overtime wages, rather than compensating them with time off later, will cost $10 million to $20 million, according to James D. Mosman, the state's director of personnel administration.

Cities, which are expected to be hit the hardest when the Labor Department starts enforcing the court ruling Oct. 15, are raising the possibility of layoffs, reduced services or higher taxes. Officials in the Labor Department and the White House say they have been flooded with calls and letters from mayors worried about the impact of the ruling on their budgets.

Local governments attacked the ruling when it was announced, but say they are only now beginning to add up the likely costs as their budget and personnel officers supply them with more precise estimates.

"We are just now getting a handle on it, and it is very difficult," said Donald Weinberg, the District's director of labor relations. "It is causing a real problem."

District officials say the impact of the ruling here will not be as severe as in some other large cities because Washington already pays overtime to many of its employes.

"If there are no other pressures then it is clearly manageable," said Betsy Reveal, the District's budget director. "But it cannot be seen in isolation. In combination with other pressures it could cause problems." The District's annual payroll is about $850 million.

Under guidelines for the Fair Labor Standards Act, which state and local governments now must follow, police must receive overtime pay if they work more than 171 hours in a 28-day period. For firefighters, overtime must be paid after 212 hours.

Blue-collar employes in public works as well as clerical and technical employes, many of whom commonly work overtime hours, would also be covered. Teachers, as professional employes, are excluded from coverage under the law.

The Supreme Court ruling came in a case known as Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority on the question of whether overtime provisions in the act apply to municipal workers.

Joseph Garcia, a bus driver in San Antonio, had brought suit against the city, challenging its practice of paying time-and-a-half overtime only when bus drivers worked on their days off or on holidays. For all other overtime hours worked, bus drivers were paid at the normal hourly rate. The city said it should be exempt from the act; Garcia, backed by labor unions, said it should not.

The 5-to-4 high court ruling has diverse implications. For example:

Municipalities will no longer be able to accept volunteer or subminimum wage services from their employes. Crossing guards—frequently senior citizens working for little or no pay—will have to be paid at least a minimum wage, for instance. This provision is expected to hurt small towns, which frequently depend on volunteer workers to a large degree.

Municipalities may have to pay substantial sums of overtime wages to police recruits in academies who devote long hours to their training. "We've heard of an instance where trainees are paid at a higher rate than police captains," said a White House official. The official who asked not to be identified, said the likely effect in that instance would be a cutback in training time for police officers.

Public employes in some rural jurisdictions who saved compensatory time by working long hours in the winter so they could plant their crops in the spring will be unable to continue that practice.

In Puerto Rico, implementing the act is expected to cost millions of dollars because the government must start paying the minimum wage to public employes who have been earning less.

Officials also express fears of curtailed work by public safety employes, and cite the case of four D.C. homicide detectives whose investigation of a murder was cut short last week to avoid paying them overtime. The incident occurred shortly after police officials had circulated a memorandum outlining steps to comply with the ruling.

"There's an increasing degree of alarm about the costs and the disruption, both of which will be substantial," said the White House official.

Congressional hearings on the issue are scheduled for July 25, and three governors as well as a host of local officials are expected to raise the prospect of budget-busting expenses because of the ruling.

Groups such as the National Association of Counties and the National League of Cities also are increasing pressure on the Reagan administration to introduce legislation that would repeal overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and effectively neutralize the fiscal impact of the Supreme Court's ruling.

The White House official acknowledged that the administration is considering backing such a bill. Congressional aides say the measure would be opposed by organized labor, and would stand little chance of passage in the Democratic-controlled House of Representatives.

"What happens on the House side depends on how much pressure we can gin up," said one Senate aide who would like to see the Garcia decision undone by Congress. "But politically I just don't think we can do it."

Susan Meisinger, deputy under-secretary for employment standards in the Labor Department, said she believes legislation is possible. "There's a growing concern about the impact," she said. "What happens depends on how hard state and local governments push."

In a speech to the American Bar Association last week, Attorney General Edwin Meese III blasted the court for the Garcia ruling, declaring that it "undermines the stability" of state and local governments.

To comply with the ruling, Los Angeles will have to pay $100 million a year; San Francisco, $50 million, and New York, $40 million, according to Cynthia M. Pols, counsel to the National League of Cities.

Many municipalities are in the process of determining how many of their workers are covered by the federal guidelines and how many are not. Some personnel officials acknowledge privately that in borderline cases where there is room for discretion, governments may tend to classify workers as exempt from the law, and therefore ineligible for premium pay.

State and local government officials also are afraid of the effects of a provision in the federal law that allows employes to bring private lawsuits to recover back overtime pay. Because the court's ruling was effective April 15, any municipal worker who wants to collect overtime since that date will be able to do so, along with a penalty doubling the overtime payment.

Ironically, although labor union officials initially were elated by the Supreme Court decision in February, some are now acknowledging that their members are unhappy about losing compensatory time off.

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 24, 1985]

A MESSAGE FROM GARCIA

This week a Senate subcommittee will begin hearings on the application of the Fair Labor Standards Act to state and local governments, a subject that usually glazes the eyes of all but the most devoted. This year, though, it is not just a matter of a million dollars here, a million there. Real money is at stake. And state and local political leaders actually may be coming forward to say so.

Early this year the Supreme Court, in the Garcia decision, extended the reach of the FLSA to cover state and local government activities that were once exempt. Among other changes, local employees will not be permitted to work overtime and take compensatory time off later on. From now on the workers will have to be paid for their overtime at time-and-a-half rates. Local government trainees, from firefighting recruits to youth employment program workers, will also fall under the time-and-a-half rule.

The price tag will vary by locality and region. Big cities in the Northeast will suffer least, since their labor practices are already the most expensive and most favorable to public employee unions. But even these cities will pay more than their spokemen currently admit. And for the country as a whole, the Garcia decision may cost about $3 billion.

Lest you think this figure is a righ-wing scare tactic, be advised that it does not include the cost of renegotiating contract, administering the changes or going to court in disputes over retroactive pay. Nothing in the current Reagan budget will even approach this decision in added burden to local governments.

As the Journal's Joann S. Lublin pointed out in a story yesterday, even local government workers are not ecstatic about the Garcia decision. The rule requiring time-and-a-half for overtime will often mean no overtime at all, and hence less total wages than in the bad old days. Senior citizens who now do government jobs at relatively low wages in order to stay below their Social Security ceilings may well find the jobs eliminated. Paramedics who work in town and volunteer their after-hours services in their rural home communities will not be able to do so anymore. Though the public employee unions have an institutional interest in uniform national labor standards, labor organizations are divided on this issue.

Until very recently, local governments were urging the Reagan administration to press for corrective legislation but somehow not yelling quite loud enough for their voices to reach the general media or the Democrats in the House of Representatives. With state and local support slow in coming, the administration faced its own dilemma: Should it step forward and take the political heat alone, or should it let the cost run up and start to entrench themselves until the localities got up the gumption to join vigorously in the debate?

In the past few days there have been signs of more action. The hearings will give us the first public indication of how all the calculations have come out. If a thundering silence emerges from the hearing room, do not assume that the Garcia problem is trivial; what you hear will simply be local leaders whose ties to an old ideology make them afraid to acknowledge the depth of the trouble. And if you hear a bit of healthy yelling, you will know that economic realities are at last forcing some necessary reconsiderations in American urban politics.

JULY 22, 1985.

Senator DON NICKLES,
Chairman, Senate Labor Subcommittee, SH-608, Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR NICKLES: We are writing to seek your support for legislation to mitigate the impact of the Supreme Court's February 19, 1985 decision in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority on state and local government. In that decision, the Supreme Court overruled its 1976 National League of Cities v. Usery decision that the Tenth Amendment was a bar to application of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) to state and local employees engaged in traditional governmental functions, effectively extending the wage and hours provisions of the FLSA to states and localities.

We believe that, in at least three areas, amendments to the FLSA are necessary to accommodate the unique problems of state and local government.

First, individuals who provide service to state and local government on a volunteer basis should not be subject to the wage and hours provisions of the FLSA. Of particular concern to states and localities are the provisions of the Department of Labor's (DOL) regulations which establish the presumption that volunteer firefighters are employees whenever they receive more than $2.50 per call as reimbursement for incidental expenses. As a result of this regulation, many of the estimated one million volunteer firefighters in the nation will be entitled to receive the minimum wage and overtime compensation for volunteer activities. This regulation will have a devastating impact on the many state and local jurisdictions which rely on volunteer firefighters.

Second, the overtime provisions of the FLSA should not apply to state and local employees. Under Section 7 of the FLSA, regular employees are entitled to compensation on a time and a half basis for hours worked in a week in excess of 40. Similarly, overtime pay must be paid to firefighters for hours worked in excess of 212 in a 28 day period and to police officers for hours worked in excess of 171 in a 28 day period. These provisions mean that numerous employment practices of state and local government, many of which have been incorporated into collective bargaining agreements at the request of employees and are long-standing practices, must be ended.

For example, duty cycles for firefighters of 24 hours on duty and 48 off duty, the most common duty cycle in the nation, can no longer be utilized unless the governing body is willing to pay overtime compensation. Similarly, the practice of using compensatory time off in lieu of overtime compensation is generally not permissible under the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Under the "comp" time concept, both public safety and regular employees are allowed to accumulate compensatory time for later use as time off. This practice is advantageous to both the governmental entity, which is provided with scheduling flexibility, and the employee, who is able to take longer vacations.

Third, a prospective effective date for the application of the FLSA to states and localities should be established. On June 14, DOL announced plans to begin enforcement actions against states and localities and to impose liability on states and localities retroactive to April 15. This retroactive enforcement policy will compound the problems caused by application of FLSA to states and localities. The FLSA regulations establish countless new regulatory requirements for states and localities, many of which are being imposed in the middle of budget cycles and collective bargaining agreements. In our view, it is essential that Congress establish a moratorium on the application of the FLSA to states and localities that will ensure an orderly and harmonious transition period.

The proposed changes in the FLSA, which are necessary to prevent undue federal interference with the operation of state and local government, must be approved by Congress as soon as possible, preferably before DOL enforcement activities begin on October 15. Furthermore, because expedited congressional action is essential, we urge your support for narrowly crafted legislation which includes only provisions relating to the application of the FLSA to states and localities.

Sincerely,

Alan Beals, Executive Director, National League of Cities; Matthew B. Coffey, Executive Director, National Association of Counties; John J. Gunther, Executive Director, U.S. Conference of Mayors; William Hansell, Jr., Executive Director, International City Management Association; Earl S. Mackey, Executive Director, National Conference of State Legislatures; Carl W. Stenberg, Executive Director, Council of State Governments; Barton D. Russell, Executive Director, National Association of Towns and Townships.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise today in support of legislation that is being introduced to mitigate the severe financial and administrative impact that the U.S. Supreme Court's recent decision, Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, is causing on the State and local governments of this Nation. I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague from Oklahoma, Senator NICKLES, to introduce a bill to release State and local governments from the undue burdens of the maximum hours provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act [FLSA].

On July 15, I introduced legislation, S. 1434, to relieve State and local governments and their employees from the inflexible maximum hours of the FLSA. I am pleased that this legislation has already been cosponsored by 20 of my colleagues. I am hopeful that my colleagues who have joined me in the effort to return fiscal stability and autonomy to the State and local governments, will support the Nickles-Wilson legislation.

The Nickles-Wilson bill incorporates the provisions of S. 1434 and enhance its impact by allowing volunteers to continue to provide services to State and local governments. To date, State laws and collective bargaining rights have been adequate to ensure that State and local government employees and volunteers are treated fairly.

Had the Supreme Court been rectifying employment abuses by State and local governments, I would have introduced S. 1434 or joined with the Senator from Oklahoma in introducing this legislation. However, nowhere in the Court's lengthy opinion is there one citation of an employment injustice committed by a State or local government. That is because these local governmental employers are not running sweat shops. Rather, they are forced by local tax reduction efforts and reduced Federal assistance to develop creative employment strategies, such as comp time and flexible scheduling, to provide needed community services within the constraints of extremely tight budgets.

The State and local governments of this Nation need this legislative relief immediately. A Joint Economic Committee hearing I chaired on the impact of the Garcia decision provided evidence that the FLSA's overtime requirements will cost States and municipal governments across the Nation billions of dollars. California alone, it has been estimated, will have to spend at least $300 million in order to comply with the FLSA's rigid requirements. These governmental entities will not receive any extra services for these tremendously increased costs.

I want to commend Senator NICKLES for his leadership in holding hearings before the Subcommittee on Labor. He too has taken testimony from local government officials who stated that the Garcia decision creates a financial and administrative nightmare for local governments.

I am extremely pleased that a position was solidified on this issue here in the Senate. Local government groups such as the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the National League of Cities, the National Association of Counties and others wholeheartedly support this legislation. I have heard from many State and local government employees from my State and others that support this legislation because it offers them the flexibility to negotiate for compensatory time off in lieu of overtime pay, a practice prohibited by the FLSA. The administration is supportive of the effort to mitigate the harsh effect of the Garcia decision.

Mr. President, State and local government employees should have the flexibility that is prohibited under the FLSA, citizens who choose to volunteer their time should have the option of doing so, and finally our State and local governments need the autonomy to deal with their special labor situations—pragmatism requires it and the Constitution mandates it. The Nickles-Wilson bill will achieve these objections.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of this important legislation, which will release State and local governments from the burdens of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority.

The Garcia case held that the Fair Labor Standards Act [FLSA] is applicable to State and local governments. The result of this decision is that State and local governments will no longer have the flexibility to set up their employees' work schedules without Federal interference.

Since the time of this decision, I have received letters from numerous local government officials from all over my State of Georgia. They have expressed deep concern about the effect of this ruling on critical government services. From small counties to large cities, the negative impact could be devastating. Though it is impossible to measure exactly what the financial effect of this decision will be around our Nation, it is estimated it could be in the billions of dollars.

By making the provisions of the FLSA applicable to State and local governments, many communities are forced to either shift resources from essential safety programs to comply with this mandate or reduce the manpower needed to provide these services. I seriously question the sensibility of any decision which so negatively impacts the services of communities throughout America. In these times of congressional actions to reduce the deficit, it is time to get the Federal Government off the backs of local communities. It is time to minimize the Federal mandates and regulations with which cities must comply, not increase them.

I believe this legislation addresses the problem in a comprehensive and constructive manner. This bill, which will take effect concerning work weeks beginning after February 19, 1985, will exempt State and local governments from the overtime provisions of the FLSA. These employees will be given the opportunity to again enjoy compensatory time off as a result of their hard work. However, State and local governments will not be exempted from the minimum wages provisions of the FLSA, the child labor provisions, or the Equal Pay Act.

Senior citizens, who now work in government jobs for relatively lower wages to stay below Social Security ceilings, may possibly find they no longer have these jobs. Yet the responsibilities they fulfill, such as busdrivers and school-crossing guards, still exist. Also exempted will be volunteer firefighters, who perform such a vital public service to their communities.

Mr. President, the effect of the Garcia decision will be to place a costly and unnecessary burden on local governments, their employees, and the taxpayers. I urge my colleagues to join in the passage of this much-needed legislation.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

S. 1571. A bill to stabilize international currency markets in support of fair global competition; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

STRATEGIC CAPITAL RESERVE ACT

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, the volatility of the international currency market makes it impossible for U.S. employers to offer secure job opportunities in most of our trade-sensitive industries. In addition the lack of competitiveness of the dollar is eroding the selling strength of thousands of U.S. businesses. The resulting trade deficit threatens both our long-term economic health, and, ultimately, our national security. As our economic house starts to burn, the administration seems to be mesmerized by an academic debate on whether or not water will put out a fire. Some congressional proposals only add to the problem by confusing the problem of trade deficits and trade barriers.

We must start thinking strategically about the problems of trade barriers and trade deficits plaguing the world economy of the eighties. Only a clear economic strategy will provide the long-term stability we need to prosper, and that requires that we go to the source of our economic problem.

An article on the front page of Tuesday's Wall Street Journal addressed what I believe is the source of the problem of the trade deficit. The article reveals that $150 billion worth of currencies are traded worldwide each day. Furthermore, the net long-term capital flow from Japan to the rest of the world was $55 billion for the year that ended March 31. During the same time, net long-term capital inflows to the United States exceeded $100 billion a year. These financial tidal waves washing back and forth across the Atlantic and Pacific trade communities play havoc with daily investment decisions. They wipe out corporate gains overnight, and they destroy the competitiveness of American businesses. We cannot even establish the real impact of unfair trade barriers until we stabilize the dollar.

Congress must take action to make American companies more competitive in world markets. Today I am introducing the Strategic Capital Reserve Act of 1985. This bill will direct the Federal Reserve and the U.S. Treasury to build up a strategic capital reserve of foreign currencies for the purpose of stabilizing currency markets and simultaneously building up the competitiveness of the dollar. The bill improves the competitiveness of the dollar—and the competitiveness of U.S. businesses in trade-sensitive industries—by building a strategic reserve of foreign currencies to counteract financial flows that promote other countries' exports. Once the strategic capital reserve is in place, its very existence will stabilize international currency markets by giving the U.S. Government a tool for cushioning sharp movements in exchange rates in either direction.

First, the Strategic Capital Reserve Act will establish a set of procedures by which the Federal Reserve, in consultation with the U.S. Treasury, will build up the strategic capital reserve. It directs the Federal Reserve to purchase foreign currency in any fiscal quarter that two conditions are met. One, the amount by which U.S. imports of goods and services exceed U.S. exports of goods and services must have been running at a yearly rate greater than 1½ percent of GNP for the previous four quarters. In other words, the dollar must have a 1-year continuously uncompetitive track records on the foreign exchange markets.

Two, the value of the dollar measured against the other major trading currencies must be 15 percent above the level required for full U.S. competitiveness abroad. That is, the value of the dollar must be at least 15 percent above the level needed for a balanced current account. In any quarter that both conditions are met, the Federal Reserve will purchase at least $3 billion of foreign currencies for the strategic capital reserve. The purchase must not exceed the value of the current account deficit for the previous fiscal quarter. Under our current trade deficit, Treasury would have to establish a reserve of at least $12 billion and a maximum of $100 billion over the next year.

Second, the Strategic Capital Reserve Act amends the charter of the Federal Reserve to require the Federal Reserve to exclude the purchase of foreign currencies for the strategic capital reserve when it sets monetary policy. Currently, when any central bank—including the U.S. Treasury—sells dollars, the Federal Reserve considers itself forced to sell enough U.S. treasury bills to offset the additional dollars made available to worldwide consumers. For the buildup on the strategic capital reserve to strengthen the competitiveness of the dollar, it is necessary for the Federal Reserve to avoid counteracting the impact of strategic capital reserve foreign currency purchases and dollar sales.

The third provision of the bill directs the President to work with our 10 major trading partners to establish an international financial commission. The commission would be asked to report within 1 year on how to stabilize the world financial system to minimize financial shocks to our economy. The commission would include representatives of the 11 major financial world powers. One matter the commission should investigate is the availability of short-term as well as long-term securities issued by foreign governments to residents of each major trading country. The commission will continue consideration of measures to improve international macroeconomic coordination started at the Williamsburg summit in 1983.

Fourth, the bill directs the Chairman of the Federal Reserve and the Secretary of the Treasury to report annually to Congress on strategic capital reserve operations, as well as to consult with the central banks of Germany, Japan, Britain, and France to ensure maximum cooperation in stabilizing trade conditions.

We have a serious problem in foreign trade. The size of our trade deficits threaten the stability of our economy. It has become a matter of national security. But as with other areas of national security, we must identify the greatest dangers and take effective steps to minimize their potential impact. In this case, we must cushion our economy against the potential impact of financial shocks by establishing a currency reserve, just as we have cushioned ourselves from the impact of oil supply shocks by building a strategic petroleum reserve. What we need is action, not more talk.

Our businesses have always been at the forefront of industrial change. It is time for the Government to get its house in order so that our businesses can continue to succeed on the basis of their natural advantages: innovation and commitment in the work force. The Strategic Capital Reserve Act is an important step toward unleashing the natural competitive potential of American workers and businesses. ●

By Mr. D'AMATO:

S. 1573. A bill to extend patent numbered 3,387,268, "Quotation Monitoring Unit," for a period of 10 years; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF PATENT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Senate companion to H.R. 1012, legislation introduced earlier this year in the House by Representative SOLARZ. Our bills seek to undo a serious inequity resulting from 15 years of restrictive Federal regulations that have only recently been changed.

On September 9, 1963, Prof. Sidney Epstein of Brooklyn, NY, filed for a patent on his invention, the Quotation Monitoring Unit. This invention enables investors to obtain the most recent quotations on selected stock issues directly. Professor Epstein was awarded Patent No. 3,387,268 for this invention on June 4, 1968.

For this invention to be fully useful, however, a subsidiary communication authorization [SCA] is needed. The SCA permits information to be sent over FM airwaves to the Quotation Monitoring Unit. Unfortunately, for the first 15 years of the life of Professor Epstein's patent, FCC regulations did not permit SCA's to be used with Quotation Monitoring Units.

By the time the FCC's regulations were changed in 1983 to permit SCA's to be used with Professor Epstein's invention, the patent had nearly expired. For more than 10 years, Professor Epstein was denied the benefit of his patent by a set of Federal regulations that have since been abandoned.

Only Congress can correct this inequity. I urge my colleagues to support this bill to bring justice to a deserving individual inventor who has had the bad fortune to run into a series of bureaucratic regulations that should have been changed long before they were. I urge my colleagues to support this bill in the interests of equity and fair play and I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1573

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Commerce, acting through the Commissioner of Patents, shall, when patent numbered 3,387,268 (relating to a quotation monitoring unit) expires, or as soon thereafter as possible, extend such patent for ten years, with all the rights pertaining thereto.●

By Mr. LUGAR (for himself and Mr. HATCH):

S. 1574. A bill to provide for public education concerning the health consequences of using smokeless tobacco products; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

HEALTH CONSEQUENCES OF SMOKELESS TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I am pleased, along with my colleague, Mr. HATCH, to introduce a bill that requires warning labeling for all smokeless tobacco products and advertisements and provides public education concerning the health consequences of using these products.

Like smoking tobacco, snuff, and chewing tobacco contain significant levels of nicotine which is associated with a rise in blood pressure and addiction. Additionally, use of smokeless tobacco causes commonly occurring alterations in the tissues of the mouth such as gingival recession, or recission of the gums, peridontal bone destruction, tooth abrasion, and most importantly, precancerous lesions such as leukoplakia. Approximately 7 percent of leukoplakia lesions convert to squamous cell carcinomas accounting for roughly 90 percent of all oral cancers.

A study by the Coalition on Smoking OR Health indicated that the risk of developing cancer is four times greater for snuff users than for nonusers, and is approaching 50 times greater for long-term chronic users. One research group reported that there may be as many as 70 deaths per year from oral cancer caused by smokeless tobacco. The Surgeon General reports that smokeless tobacco contains the highest amount of certain cancer causing toxins permitted in a consumer product for oral consumption. Because of the significant health risks associated with the use of smokeless tobacco products, a number of professional organizations encourage the enactment of legislation that would require warning labels on smokeless tobacco products, including the American Cancer Association, the American Lung Association, the American Heart Association, the American Dental Association, the American Academy of Otolaryngology, the American Association of Pediatrics, and the American Medical Association.

Until recently, the use of smokeless tobacco had been restricted to a relatively small percentage of the United States population. However, the National Cancer Institute estimates that today some 22 million Americans use smokeless tobacco. Sales of snuff increased 188 percent between 1970 and 1979, and continued to increase by 7 to 9 percent per year in the 1980's. In fact, Time magazine reported on July 15, 1985, that the amount of snuff sold annually in the United States has risen 60 percent since 1978.

This increase in the use of smokeless tobacco products is alarmingly pronounced among our youth. Surveys conducted in Indiana among 8th to 12th graders by Arden G. Christen of the Indiana University School of Dentistry, indicate that 48 percent of the students are users of smokeless tobacco. In fact, in one Indiana junior high school surveyed, 6.3 percent of the seventh-grade boys and 12.6 percent of the eighth-grade boys are regular users of smokeless tobacco. One study in Oregon recently found that 19 percent of ninth-graders and 23 percent of 10th-graders admitted they were daily users of smokeless tobacco. Other local studies in Massachusetts, Oklahoma, and Texas suggest that between 20 and 40 percent of high school boys are chewing or dipping. Moreover, smokeless tobacco usage has become quite common among college students nationwide.

Unfortunately, many of these young people are under the misimpression that use of smokeless tobacco carries no significant health risk. Teens seem to view smokeless tobacco as a healthy altenative to smoking cigarettes, and current advertising and packaging of smokeless tobacco products does nothing to dispel this inaccuracy.

Precedent for warning labels outlining the health hazards of regular use of tobacco products has been clearly established through legislation such as the Compehensive Smoking Education Act, signed into law during the 98th Congress. The serious health risks associated with use of smokeless tobacco products, in addition to the increase in use of these substances, particularly among young Americans, can no longer be ignored. It is imperative that warnings clearly outlining these health risks be prominently displayed on packages of smokeless tobacco and on all advertising of these products.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of this bill be printed in full.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1574

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Comprehensive Smokeless Tobacco and Health Education Act of 1985".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) scientific research has determined that—

(A) the use of smokeless tobacco is a cause of oral and pharyngeal cancer, oral leukoplakia, gum disease, and tooth loss; and

(B) smokeless tobacco contains nicotine and may be addictive;

(2) the use of smokeless tobacco by adolescents is increasing;

(3) there is a widespread lack of knowledge among the general public of the health risks associated with the use of smokeless tobacco; and

(4) State and local efforts are insufficient to educate the public on the dangers of smokeless tobacco use.

PUBLIC EDUCATION

SEC. 3. (a)(1) The Secretary of Health and Human Services, through the Office of Smoking and Health of the Department of Health and Human Services, shall—

(A) develop educational programs and materials and public service announcements respecting the dangers to human health from the use of smokeless tobacco; and

(B) make such programs, materials, and announcements available to States, local governments, and school systems.

(2) In develping programs, materials, and announcements under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall consult with the Secretary of Education, medical and public health entities, consumer groups, and other appropriate entities.

(b) One year after the date of the enactment of this Act, and annually thereafter, the Secretary shall transmit a report to the Congress concerning the activities undertaken under subsection (a) during the preceding year.

(c) The Secretary, through the Office of Smoking and Health of the Department of Health and Human Services, may provide technical assistance to States to assist such States in the development of educational programs and materials and public service announcements respecting the dangers to human health from the use of smokeless tobacco.

REPORT ON SMOKELESS TOBACCO AND HEALTH

SEC. 4. The Secretary, through the Surgeon General of the United States, shall transmit a report to the Congress not later than January 1, 1987, and annually thereafter, containing—

(1) a description of the effects of health education efforts on the use of smokeless tobacco products;

(2) a description of current practices and methods of smokeless tobacco product advertising and promotion;

(3) a description of the use by the public of smokeless tobacco products;

(4) an evaluation of the known health effects of smokeless tobacco products; and

(5) such recommendations for legislation and administrative action as the Secretary considers appropriate.

SMOKELESS TOBACCO WARNING STATEMENTS

SEC. 5. (a)(1) It shall be unlawful for any person to manufacture, package, or import for sale or distribution within the United States any smokeless tobacco product unless the package of the product bears, in accordance with the requirements of this section, one of the following statements:

"WARNING: THIS PRODUCT MAY CAUSE MOUTH CANCER

"WARNING: THIS PRODUCT MAY CAUSE GUM DISEASE AND TOOTH LOSS

"WARNING: THIS PRODUCT CONTAINS NICOTINE AND MAY BE ADDICTIVE".

(2) It shall be unlawful for any manufacturer or importer of a smokeless tobacco product to advertise or cause to be advertised within the United States any smokeless tobacco product unless—

(A) the advertising of such product bears one of the statements specified in paragraph (1);

(B) in the case of television advertising, one of the statements specified in paragraph (1)—

(i) appears for the duration of each advertisement; or

(ii) is read once during each advertisement; and

(C) in the case of radio advertising, one of the statements specified in paragraph (1) is read once during each advertisement.

(b) Each statement required by subsection (a) shall appear—

(1) in the case of the smokeless tobacco product package—

(A) on the top of the package or in another prominent location on the package; and

(B) in conspicuous and legible type in contrast by typography, layout, and color with all other printed material on the package; and

(2) in the case of print and television advertising—

(A) in a conspicuous location and in conspicuous and legible type in contrast by typography, layout, and color with all other printed material in the advertisement; and

(B) in a format prescribed by the Federal Trade Commission.

(c) The statements specified in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) shall be rotated by each manufacturer or importer of a smokeless tobacco product in each twelve-month period in an alternating sequence on packages of each brand of smokeless tobacco product manufactured by the manufacturer or importer and in the advertisements for each such brand of smokeless tobacco product in accordance with a plan submitted by the manufacturer or importer and approved by the Federal Trade Commission. The Federal Trade Commission shall approve a plan submitted by a manufacturer or importer of a smokeless tobacco product which will provide the rotation required by this subsection and which assures that all of the statements required by paragraph (1) of subsection (a) will be displayed by the manufacturer or importer at the same time.

(d) Not later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Federal Trade Commission shall promulgate such regulations as it may require to implement subsections (a), (b), and (c).

(e)(1) After the Advisory Committee on the Health Consequences of Using Smokeless Tobacco appointed by the Surgeon General of the United States completes its study and report products, the Surgeon General and the Federal Trade Commission shall review the findings and conclusions of such study. After the completion of such review, the Federal Trade Commission may, by regulation, promulgate revisions of the statements specified in paragraph (1) of subsection (a). Any such revision shall be based on the findings and conclusions of such study.

(2) Any regulations promulgated under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be promulgated in accordance with subchapter II of chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code.

(f) Any person who violates the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall on conviction thereof be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000.

(g) The several district courts of the United States are invested with jurisdiction, for cause shown, to prevent and restrain violations of this section upon application of the Attorney General of the United States acting through the several United States attorneys in their several districts.

(h)(1) No statement relating to the use of smokeless tobacco products and health, other than the statements required by this section, shall be required on any package of a smokeless tobacco product.

(2) No requirement or prohibition based on the use of smokeless tobacco products and health shall be imposed under State law with respect to the advertising or promotion of any smokeless tobacco product the packages of which are labeled, and the advertisement of which is conducted, in conformity with the provisions of this section.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 6. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "package" means a pack, box, carton, can, or any other container of any kind in which smokeless tobacco is offered for sale, sold, or otherwise distributed to consumers;

(2) the term "person" has the same meaning as in section 3(5) of the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act;

(3) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Health and Human Services;

(4) the term "smokeless tobacco" means any finely cut, ground, powdered, or leaf tobacco that is intended to be placed in the oral cavity; and

(5) the term "United States" has the same meaning as in section 3(3) of such Act.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 7. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), this Act shall take effect one year after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Section 5(d) shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased, along with my colleague, Mr. LUGAR, to introduce a bill which would require warning labeling for all smokeless tobacco products and advertisements.

Recently, the Surgeon General reported that smokeless tobacco contains the highest amount of certain cancer-causing elements of any consumer product intended for oral consumption. The suspect ingredient in smokeless tobacco is N-nitrosonornicotine [NNN]. This chemical has been proven to cause cancer of the esophagus, nasal cavity, trachea, and lungs in laboratory animals. The most common problem for smokeless tobacco users is leukoplakia, a precancerous lesion within the oral cavity, 7 percent of which convert to squamous cell carcinomas. These account for 90 percent of all oral cancers.

In the past, the number of smokeless tobacco users was only a small percentage of the population. However, today, the popularity of this product is increasing rapidly, especially among other youth. Of those that are regular users, 55 percent began the habit by or before the age of 13. In September 1984, the Utah Department of Health conducted a survey of 3,232 Utah students between the ages of 10 and 18. Fifty-two percent were male and 48 percent were female. The study showed that males are much more likely to use snuff or chew than are females. The survey also indicated that 39 percent of all males surveyed have tried smokeless tobacco at some point in their lives. Of all surveyed, females and males alike, 25 percent have used smokeless tobacco at some time in their life.

Many of these young people aren't aware of the dangers of chewing tobacco. It is essential that people are warned of the health risks associated with the use of these products. In 1984, I sponsored the "Smoking Education Act of 1984", which was signed into law. This will be effective in better educating the people of our country about the dangers of cigarette smoking. It is imperative that this additional warning labeling legislation be passed into law and the public made aware of the health risks of smokeless tobacco. We have made great strides toward cigarette smoking education and now it is time to do the same with smokeless tobacco use education.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join with me and Senator LUGAR in sponsoring this important public health bill.

By Mr. WEICKER (for himself and Mr. BUMPERS):

S. 1575. A bill to recognize the Cabinet status of the Administrator of the Small Business Administration; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CABINET STATUS OF THE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to raise the status of the Administrator of the Small Business Administration [SBA] to Cabinet level. This legislation urges the President to make the Administrator of SBA a full participant in the duties and activities of the President's Cabinet, and further, that he be the President's principal adviser on all matters relating to small business. Accordingly, his salary would be raised commensurate with this inceased status.

Mr. President, the SBA Administrator serves a critical role as the voice of small business within the administration. He or she is the chief advocate for small enterprise, clearly the driving force behind our economy. The President's 1985 Report of the State of Small Business states that there are 14.2 million American small businesses, which comprise 97 percent of all businesses in this country. The reports tells us that all—100 percent—of the 1 million net, new jobs created during the recent recession were generated by businesses with fewer than 20 employees. And while large firms lost 1.6 million jobs between 1980 and 1982, small firms created 2.6 million new jobs during that same time. In addition, small business dominated industries added jobs at a rate almost twice that of industries dominated by large firms between 1982 and 1984.

Mr. President, the small business sector is our Nation's undisputed economic leader. It clearly warrants Cabinet level representation, so that we may be assured that small business' concerns are addressed when tax, regulatory, and other executive branch policy decisions are being carved out.

Mr. President, Congress has once again recognized the importance of American small business by enacting legislation to reconvene the White House Conference on Small Business by September 1986, to be preceded by conferences in all 50 States, which are currently being implemented by the President. By elevating the status of the SBA administrator, this legislation gives proper recognition to the importance of this agency and the constituency it represents.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1575

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the sense of the Congress that the Administrator of the Small Business Administration should be designated by the President—

(1) as a member of, and a full participant in all functions, duties, and activities of, the Cabinet, and

(2) the President's principal advisor on all matters relating to small business.

(b)(1) Section 5312 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Administrator of the Small Business Administration."

(2) Section 5314 of such title is amended by striking out:

"Administrator of the Small Business Administration."●

By Mr. MITCHELL:

S. 1576. A bill to amend the Trade Act of 1974 to authorize the President to negotiate an agreement establishing a joint commission to resolve trade and other economic disputes between the United States and Canada; to the Committee on Finance.

JOINT COMMISSION TO RESOLVE ECONOMIC DISPUTES BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am today reintroducing legislation I originally introduced in the 98th Congress calling for the creation of an International Joint Economic Commission to aid in resolving trade and economic disputes between the United States and Canada.

This bill would authorize the President to negotiate with Canada for the establishment of a joint commission which would have authority to conduct fact finding analysis, making advisory recommendations, and, if asked by both parties, provide arbitration of disputes on trade and other economic issues.

The United States enjoys a unique and special relationship with Canada marked by close political, social and economic ties. As each others largest trading partner we engage in extensive two way trade in many sectors. Last year that trading relatinship—the largest trading partnership in the world—grew a full 25 percent. But this growth in trade has been followed by an escalation in the number and intensity of trade disputes that threatens further progress in our relationship.

As a Senator from a border State, I witness the influence that lingering trade problems can have on public attitudes toward overall United States-Canadian relations. Maine has strong economic ties to the eastern provinces in Canada, but continuing complaints from such important regional industries, as fishing, lumber, and potatoes have strained relations and produced in some cases an ambivalent or even hostile attitude regarding further economic dealings with the Canadians.

The same is true in other parts of the country where industries have been hurt by the recent surge in Canadian imports. For many years, until 1982, United States-Canada trade flows were roughly equal. Then in 1982 the United States recorded a merchandise deficit of $13.9 billion which increased to $15.4 billion in 1983 and $21.8 billion last year. Next to Japan, that was our largest bilateral trade deficit.

In 1984, imports from Canada grew by almost 28 percent, double that recorded for the year before. In fact three-quarters of all Canadian exports go to the United States. Our exports to Canada have also increased and now account for one-fifth of our global sales.

As trade flows have increased and the strong growth in Canadian imports has displaced our domestic products, tensions have been aggravated and trade disputes, which in many cases have lingered for years, are taking on a new urgency. A number of bills have been introduced in Congress to deal with trade disputes with Canada involving softwood lumber, pork products, fresh vegetables, tourist literature, and beef products.

Precisely because our relationship with Canada is so close and of a unique nature we should make more of an effort to diffuse the kinds of economic conflicts that can too readily escalate out of control.

Although we do have close governmental ties with Canada, I believe that our process of settling disputes can be improved. The current process tends to be highly political, and there is significant likage among issues. Less powerful interests in each country become suspicious that their interests are being traded off and that their positions are not judged on their merit. Furthermore, there is nothing to compel the United States and Canada to resolve their disputes.

Of course, these drawbacks characterize most bilateral relationships. But the close ties and harmonious relationship the United States has with Canada suggest that a more effective method of dispute settlement may be possible.

This bill would authorize the creation of a new entity, the International Joint Economic Commission, with a mandate to facilitate the settlement of bilateral disputes involving economic issues. The new commission would be modeled after the successful International Joint Commission which has dealt successfully with boundary water problems since 1911. It would have an equal number of commissioners appointed by each country and would have three basic powers.

First, it would conduct fact-finding investigations and analyses of major bilateral issues. Disputes are often characterized by disagreements over facts, so the exercise of this function could help establish a common factual basis in controversial issues. Furthermore, an independent analysis of the issues involved in a dispute could highlight possible solutions overlooked by each country.

Second, the International Joint Economic Commission could give advisory opinions or recommendations on issues referred to it by both governments.

This function would obviously be most useful when each government follows the recommendation. The IJC has been especially successful in this regard. Because the decisionmaking process of the IJC is well respected, its recommendations are usually adopted.

Third, the International Joint Economic Commission could actually arbitrate disputes, again on a referral basis. While arbitration is a useful method if dispute settlement, this function would not likely be used very much. The IJC has never employed its arbitral responsibility, probably because this requires each country to yield part of its autonomy. Nonetheless, the new commission should be given this responsibility in the event that the United States and Canada determine that arbitration would be useful in settling certain disputes.

In spite of an escalation of trade problems, economic relations with Canada have improved as a result of recent changes in Canadian Government policies toward United States and other foreign investment. The Canadian Government is again emphasizing its special trade relationship with the United States and both governments are exploring the possibility of entering into a bilateral free-trade arrangement. Such an arrangement is at this time quite distant and may perhaps be undesirable. A number of divisive issues would first have to be resolved but if an arrangement is reached, our economic and political ties will be undoubtedly be furthered strengthened.

That would not, however, diminish the value of a joint commission to facilitate the settlement of economic and trade disputes between our two nations. Indeed, the closer economic ties and increased trade resulting from a free trade arrangement would make this type of dispute resolution body even more necessary.

Last year the Senate approved legislation giving the President authority to negotiate the establishment of a joint economic commission with Canada. That provision was deleted in conference with the House along with provisions for a free-trade arrangement with Canada. Regardless of what progress occurs on a free-trade arrangement, we should improve our bilateral relationship with Canada through the creation of a joint commission to address trade and other economic disputes.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1576

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. JOINT COMMISSION TO RESOLVE ECONOMIC DISPUTES BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Section 612 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2486) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) The President is authorized and requested to seek, through an agreement, the establishment of a joint commission to resolve trade and other economic issues between the United States and Canada. All disputes concerning such issues should be referred to the joint commission for fact-finding and resolution through arbitration in a manner similar to the procedure established by the Convention Concerning the Boundary Waters Between the United States and Canada (36 Stat. 2448). Nothing in this subsection shall be construed as prior approval of any legislation which may be necessary to implement such an agreement.".●

S. 1577. A bill to transfer title, control, and custody of certain lands near Aiken, SC, from the U.S. Department of Agriculture to the U.S. Department of Energy; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN FEDERAL LAND

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, along with my distinguished colleague from South Carolina, Senator HOLLINGS, I am very pleased to introduce legislation today at the request of the Department of Energy. This bill would effect a transfer of title, control, and custody of certain Federal lands near Aiken, SC, from one Federal agency to another.

The background and need for this measure is amply detailed in the materials I will submit for the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. Therefore, I only wish to briefly state now that enactment of the bill would allow a land transfer to take place from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Energy, thereby significantly enhancing security at the Savannah River plant in my home State of South Carolina.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a letter I have received from Assistant Secretary of Energy Garrish, together with a copy of a letter from the Honorable J. Michael Farrell, General Counsel of the Department of Energy, to Vice President BUSH, appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY,
Washington, DC, July 29, 1985.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND: Today, the Department has forwarded to the Congress a legislative proposal to transfer lands near Aiken, South Carolina, from the United States Department of Agriculture to the United States Department of Energy.

This proposal would enhance security at the Department's Savannah River Plant. It is necessary because the Department of Agriculture, which concurs with this proposal, does not have the authority to transfer lands to another Federal agency without specific legislation.

I have enclosed a copy of the draft bill as well as the forwarding letter to the Vice President, which explains the proposal in detail. Your assistance with respect to this legislation would be very much appreciated.

Sincerely,

THEODORE J. GARRISH,
Assistant Secretary for Congressional, Intergovernmental, and Public Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY,
Washington, DC, July 29, 1985.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed is proposed legislation "[t]o transfer title, control, and custody of certain lands near Aiken, South Carolina from the United States Department of Agriculture to the United States Department of Energy." The Office of Management and Budget advises that it has no objection to the submission of this proposal from the standpoint of the President's program.

PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

The purpose of this legislation is to transfer back to the Department of Energy lands near Aiken, South Carolina that had been transferred from the Department to the United States Forest Service in 1972. The lands were given National Forest status in 1974. The Forest Service does not have the authority to transfer lands to another Federal agency without specific legislation (16 U.S.C. § 521).

Acting under Executive Order 11508, dated February 10, 1970, the General Services Administration (GSA) surveyed Federal land holdings and utilization and made recommendations to the President regarding the use and disposal of property. Seven parcels of Savannah River Plant (SRP) lands, totaling 49,300 acres, were proposed for disposal by GSA. The Atomic Energy Commission, the Department's predecessor agency, strenuously objected to this transfer based on programmatic, security, and public safety grounds. Despite these objections, however, three parcels totaling 6,021 acres were transferred to the Forest Service. The transfer was done to provide public recreational benefits under the President's "Legacy of the Parks" program. Enclosure 1 depicts these parcels in relation to the SRP.

In recent years, there has been a continuing increase in the use of international and domestic terrorism by various groups to achieve political, economic, and other objectives. These trends and their implications for U.S. facilities have been the subject of intense interest and concern by the Administration and Congress. The Department has revised its internal threat guidance to recognize more specifically the terrorist threat and the potential for acts of sabotage resulting in program interruptions and adverse effects upon public safety. In particular, we have evaluated the security implications of uncontrolled public access to the three parcels near Aiken and concluded that their acquisition would enhance SRP security.

THE LEGISLATION

Section 1 of the proposed bill would transfer from the Forest Service to the Department, without cost, the three parcels of land numbered 1, 2, and 3 in Enclosure 1. It would increase significantly the distance between areas of uncontrolled public access and SRP facilities whose uninterrupted operations are essential to meeting our national defense mission.

In the specific case of parcels 2 and 3, the critical facilities of concern include the Savannah River Laboratory, Fuel Fabrication facilities, Computer Center, and Emergency Operating Center. See Enclosure 2. These facilities are potential sabotage targets. Roving patrols and intensive development provide active perimeter security for access routes directly in front of these facilities. Acquisition of parcels 2 and 3 would increase the distance between the less protected flanks and SRP boundaries from 5,000 feet to about 7,000 feet for the Savannah River Laboratory and from 4,000 feet to 8,000 feet in the case of the Fuel Fabrication facilities.

The critical facilities of concern for parcel 1 are the supporting facilities necessary for the effective and reliable operation of the SRP. Facilities in close proximity to this tract include electrical, cooling water, and steam distribution systems, power generation facilities, and experimental facilities. Our ability to deny public access to this tract would aid in the effectiveness and reliability of SRP security systems by reducing significantly the possibility of establishing staging areas in close proximity to critical facilities or undetected access onto existing Department land. See Enclosure 3. Acquisition of this parcel would increase the overland distance between these critical facilities and the SRP boundary from 3,000 feet to 15,000 feet.

Section 2 of our proposal would provide that valid existing rights with respect to these lands are protected.

The increasing incidence of terrorism throughout the world has added a new dimension to maintaining security at national defense facilities. Transfer of the land in question back to the Department will enhance security significantly by limiting public access to lands that are in close proximity to critical nuclear facilities.

Acquisition of these lands is consistent with, and an extension of, other recent actions taken to ensure the integrity of the SRP perimeter from uncontrolled public access, including requests for airspace restrictions, fencing and barricades on public Highway 125, additional security personnel, and security enhancements in the operating areas.

COST AND BUDGET DATA

Enactment of this legislation would result in no significant increase in the budgetary requirements for the Department of Energy.

Sincerely,

J. MICHAEL FARRELL,
General Council.

S. 1578. A bill to amend the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act to improve procedures for the implementation of compacts providing for the establishment and operation of regional disposal facilities for low-level radioactive waste, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE POLICY AMENDMENTS ACT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am introducing a bill to amend the Low-Level Waste Policy Act of 1980. I am also offering this same language as an amendment to S. 1517, introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. MCCLURE] earlier this week. This language provides for an orderly system of low-level nuclear waste disposal during the period of 1986 through 1992.

Mr. President, the issue of how this Nation will dispose of its low-level nuclear waste is at a critical point. Under the 1980 act, States were encouraged to enter regional compacts to handle this waste. Thirty-three States have done so, and now the Senate Judiciary Committee has before it six of these regional agreements. As an incentive for entering such compacts, the 1980 act authorized any such organized region whose compact has obtained congressional approval to exclude out-of-region waste beginning January 1, 1986.

However, Congress has not yet granted consent to any such compact, and therefore the full burden of nationwide disposal continues to fall on the three current sites: Beatty, NV; Barnwell, SC; and Richland, WA. The Governors of these three States have indicated that they will close these sites at the end of this year if Congress has not satisfactorily addressed the disposal problem.

Thus, we face the situation where there could be no site for low-level waste disposal after December 31 of this year if Congress does not act before the end of this session. Since ratification of these compacts alone would allow Nevada, South Carolina, and Washington to exclude all waste generated outside their respective regions, and since other sites will not be available by January 1, 1986, I am introducing this legislation to provide the necessary transition beginning in 1986.

This legislation is similar to the one considered by the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. It would give regions without sites time to create disposal sites by 1993, while enforcing caps on the amount of waste the currently sited States will have to accept.

This legislation contains several important features:

Under section 5, nonsited regions will be allowed access to existing disposal facilities through December 31, 1992. Caps will be placed on the volume of waste the three existing disposal facilities are required to take. In order to stay within the volume caps, each utility generator will be allocated a specific amount of disposal space;

To encourage the development of disposal sites, nonsited compact regions and nonmember States will be required to meet specified milestones. Failure to meet these milestones will result in loss of access to the generators of the violating compact region or State. Access will be restored once compliance with the milestone is established; and

All generators outside of sited compact regions will be required to pay surcharges on waste shipped to the existing disposal facilities.

I believe this legislation strikes a reasonable balance between the need for disposal of low-level waste and fairness to those States which have done more than their share in handling all of the Nation's low-level waste.

The Governors of Nevada, South Carolina, and Washington support this legislation, and I believe its passage, along with congressional approval of pending compacts, will avert the crisis we now face and will place us on the road to a long-term solution to this problem.

Mr. President, as I have already indicated, there are currently six compacts pending in the Judiciary Committee. These six regions and their member States are:

Southeast: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia.

Northwest: Alaska, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Utah, and Washington.

Rocky Mountain: Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, and Wyoming.

Central Midwest: Illinois and Kentucky.

Central: Arkansas, Kansas, Louisana, Nebraska, and Oklahoma.

Midwest: Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio, and Wisconsin.

I would also note that the Judiciary Committee has the option to report these compacts at anytime, and could attach this legislation, or similar language, as a condition for approval of these compacts. However, the House has opted to pursue the course of introducing separate legislation to address the transition period from 1986 through 1992, when the compact regions could exclude out-of-region waste. Therefore, I am introducing this legislation to put this body on a parallel track, which should expedite final congressional approval of the transition provisions. Also, by introducing this legislation as a separate item, other Senate committees, with expertise in this area, will be given the opportunity to review this proposed transition legislation.

However, I want to make it clear that I intend for this bill to be part of a package approach whereby Congress approves the pending compacts and provides for a transition period through 1992. In fact, this bill is strictly contingent upon congressional approval of the pending compacts. I will not support passage of this, or similar legislation, without concurrent approval of these compacts, and I have been assured by the majority leader of the Senate that this bill will only be considered as part of a package granting congressional approval for these compacts. Congressman MORRIS UDALL, chairman of the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, has also assured me that he will work to have this legislation and these compacts considered as a package by the House.

It is my hope that these other committees will move expeditiously in light of the deadline the Nation is facing. It is my intention to ask the majority leader to accommodate Senate floor consideration of this matter in time to obtain congressional approval for these compacts, with the transition provisions in one form or another, by the end of this year.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that copies of letters I have written to Senator DOLE and Congressman UDALL and their replies, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, August 1, 1985.

Senator ROBERT DOLE,
Majority Leader, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR BOB: Thank you for your commitment to treat pending low-level nuclear waste compacts and legislation providing for a transition period for low-level waste disposal as a single package, and your agreement not to bring up any "transition" legislation without a concurrent agreement to approve these compacts.

The transition legislation will help provide a means to solve the low-level waste disposal problem, and your commitment means that currently-sited states can join in this earnest effort to reach a solution, without incurring the risk of continued responsibility for unlimited nationwide disposal.

I will be working with the other members of the Judiciary Committee, and with the other Committees involved, in an effort to reach a consensus solution before the January 1, 1986, deadline. Your commitment ensures that the Senate will undertake a comprehensive and fair review of this critical issue.

With kindest regards and best wishes,
Sincerely,

STROM THURMOND,
Chairman.

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE MAJORITY LEADER,
Washington, DC, August 1, 1985.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR STROM: Thank you for your letter today concerning the proposed procedure for handling the ratification of regional compacts and the transitional legislation under the "Low Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act".

I agree that it would be unfair to the three States that are now burdened with all of the nation's radioactive waste to simply pass the transitional legislation without acting on the compacts that have been negotiated to handle this waste on a regional basis. I will be pleased to work with you to ensure the joint scheduling of these matters so that we can reach fair resolution for South Carolina, Kansas, and other States involved.

Sincerely yours,

BOB DOLE,
Majority Leader.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, August 1, 1985.

Representative MORRIS K. UDALL,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I appreciate having the opportunity to discuss with you the low-level nuclear waste compacts and legislation providing for a transition period that was reported out of your Committee yesterday.

Thank you for your commitment to treat these compacts and any "transition" legislation as a single package. Your commitment ensures that currently-sited states can join in an earnest effort to reach a solution to the low-level waste problem, without incurring the risk of continued responsibility for unlimited nationwide disposal.

Senate Majority Leader Dole has assured me that he considers the compacts and the transition legislation to be a single package, and that he will not bring up any "transition" legislation without a concurrent agreement to approve these compacts.

I appreciate your fine work on this critical issue, and look forward to a successful resolution of this matter before the end of this Session.

With kindest regards and best wishes,
Sincerely,

STROM THURMOND,
Chairman.

COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS, U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, August 1, 1985.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
U.S. Senate,
218 Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND: Legislation for approval of interstate compacts for low-level radioactive waste management is essential this year. The Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs yesterday voted to report to the House all the bills on this subject. H.R. 1083, being the legislation under which the compact system will function, was agreed to first, and the six regional compacts were subsequently approved by unanimous consent.

I intend to pursue an identical procedural approach on the House floor. Once issues related to the compact system are resolved in H.R. 1083, there is no reason for delay in approval of the interstate compacts.

I look forward to completing work on all these bills this fall.

Sincerely,

MORRIS K. UDALL,
Chairman.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in cosponsoring the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1985.

It is my greatest hope that Congress will avoid a national crisis in low-level radioactive waste disposal by swiftly approving this bill and the six regional compacts pending before Congress.

Time is running out on this issue. Since passage of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act of 1980, several attempts have been made to ratify the regional compacts pending before Congress. Congressional ratification of the compacts has been blocked, however, because some States failed to comply with the 1980 act and develop alternative disposal plans and sites in a timely manner. Thus, the full burden of nationwide disposal continues to fall on the three current sites: Richland, WA, Barnwell, SC, and Beatty, NV.

Washington, South Carolina, and Nevada have shouldered all of the other States' low-level waste burden for too long. The State of Washington has done much more than its share and has cooperated in dealing with the national problem of low-level waste disposal in an exemplary fashion. In 1981 Washington State, in conjunction with other Northwest States, established the first compact in the Nation. While waiting for Congress to ratify the Northwest Interstate Compact on Low-Level Radioactive Waste Management, Washington State has continued to accept for disposal over 50 percent of the low-level radioactive waste produced in the United States, although Washington itself generates only 3 percent of the Nation's waste.

Washington has been reasonable and patient long enough. This situation has become totally unacceptable to the citizens of Washington State, and I am prepared to support any reasonable actions which Washington officials decide are necessary to protect the health and safety of the people of our State, in the event that Congress does not ratify the Northwest Compact this year. The Governors of Washington, South Carolina, and Nevada all have indicated that they will not continue to accept the entire Nation's low-level waste after this year if Congress has not satisfactorily addressed the disposal problem.

We face a situation where there could be no site for low-level waste disposal after December 31, 1985, if Congress does not act before the end of this session. Since ratification of these compacts alone would allow Washington, South Carolina, and Nevada to exclude all waste generated outside their respective regions, and since other sites could not be available by January 1, 1986, it is imperative that Congress provide the necessary transition by approving the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1985.

Washington, South Carolina, and Nevada have developed this compromise legislative package in consultation with unsited States and other interested parties. It strikes a reasonable balance between the needs of both the sited and unsited States.

The basic elements of the package—guaranteed post-1985 access for unsited States' generators, volume caps, volume reduction, surcharges, and enforceable milestones to ensure that new sites are developed—are carefully balanced and firmly linked together. They must be accepted as a package and passed in conjunction with the pending compacts. The provision requiring Washington, South Carolina, and Nevada to dispose of the Nation's low-level waste for another 7 years is very distasteful to the sited States and would be completely unacceptable if this requirement was not accompanied by the other elements in the package.

I firmly believe that the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1985 offers a viable framework for averting the national disposal crisis that is certain to occur if the current legislative stalemate continues, and I urge Congress to give prompt consideration to this bill.

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, today I am pleased to join my colleague from South Carolina, Senator THURMOND, in introducing a bill to provide for fair and reasonable management of the Nation's low-level nuclear waste. Although the Congress attempted to deal with the issue of low-level waste disposal sites in 1980, most States have not responded as the Congress and the Nation had hoped.

As a result, the States of Nevada, South Carolina, and Washington continue to bear the full national burden of low-level nuclear waste disposal. It is simply unfair to expect this situation to go on much longer. This bill provides administrative and financial incentives for all States to act responsibly and together plan for the safe and efficient disposal of low-level nuclear waste. It makes a gesture of good faith to all the States by extending the period during which they may free access to the Nevada, South Carolina, and Washington sites. Most importantly, it provides for a series of events that must occur on a preestablished schedule and a time certain when other waste disposal sites are to be in operation.

It is my hope that this bill will finally lay to rest the conflict and concern that has plagued this issue, and will lay the groundwork for the Nation to focus instead on how to best use nuclear technology to help build a safe and prosperous future.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting this legislation.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I am a cosponsor of the low-level nuclear waste legislation being introduced today.

This bill is the result of a valiant effort, led by Gov. Richard Riley of South Carolina, to break the current increase over low-level nuclear waste policy. As my colleagues know, a 1980 law says that any region of the country with a congressionally approved interstate compact may stop taking out-of-region nuclear waste, starting on January 1 of next year. However, some other States have not lived up to their responsibilities under the 1980 act. They now seek to block congressional approval of the compacts formed by the three regions with existing low-level waste burial grounds. They want continued access to our sites.

Governor Riley and the Governors of Washington State and Nevada have bent over backward to try to find a reasonable solution to this impasse. They have worked with Congressman UDALL and others to fashion acceptable legislation. The bill being introduced in the Senate today reflects those negotiations. In this bill, South Carolina has gone just about as far as it can go. Because of pressures from other regions, the three States with disposal facilities agree to take waste from outside their regions for several more years.

In return, the amounts of waste disposed of annually at the three sites will not increase, and three States will receive special surcharges. States that do not meet clearly defined milestones for developing their own disposal capacity will be denied access to the three existing facilities. Most importantly, the bill makes clear that the provisions providing additional access to disposal sites will only become effective once the Southeast Compact and the other compacts receive congressional consent. Congressional consent to the compacts is a central part of this compromise agreement.

If this is the package that is finally brought before the full Senate, I will support it. It is more than generous to the regions without disposal sites, and it protects the key interests of my State, Washington State, and Nevada.

Mr. President, I would like to add to a final comment regarding this issue of low-level nuclear waste. The three States with waste facilities are under no obligation, legal or moral, to continue operating them. Nothing in current law requires it. My State opened a site many years ago to handle its own waste. South Carolina acted responsibly. But as I have said before, South Carolinians are increasingly impatient with those who somehow expect our State to keep taking their nuclear garbage indefinitely. We will not do that. Governor Riley has clearly stated that he will close our Barnwell site if Congress does not pass reasonable legislation on this issue. I fully support him in this matter.

Time is running very short on this issue, and, frankly, time is working against those who do not have their own disposal capacity. We need a legislative compromise soon, or whole regions of the country will find themselves without places to put their low-level waste. The bill being introduced today, when coupled with congressional consent language, will be just barely acceptable to South Carolina. I urge everyone involved to support this fragile compromise and not to push changes or alternatives that will simply destroy agreement. In particular, I hope that the utility industry does not push a rival bill. If they undercut the current compromise, they may find themselves with no burial sites at all.

Mr. President, I look forward to working with our colleagues to pass an acceptable legislative package that will protect both the States with waste sites and those without them.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today I am pleased to join forces with the distinguished chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND, and sponsor the Low Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1985.

The introduction of this measure signals a breakthrough on one of the most technically complicated and politically difficult issues before the 99th Congress. It offers a nonpartisan consensus proposal to avert an imminent problem over disposal of low-level radioactive waste.

Achieved after extensive negotiations over the past year, and the product of substantial compromises on all sides, this legislation offers a rational, workable solution that is in the interest of every State. It accommodates the need for States like Massachusetts to continue to have interim access to the three existing disposal sites, while bolstering ongoing efforts to develop their own alternatives. At the same time, the bill will implement the regional system Congress created in 1980 to lift sole responsibility for nationwide disposal from the three States—South Carolina, Nevada, and Washington—that have already shouldered more than their fair share of the burden.

Technology that produces low-level radioactive waste includes nuclear medicine, products like smoke detectors manufactured with radioactive isotopes, and nuclear generated electricity. Each year over half of the hospital patients in the country are treated or diagnosed with radiopharmaceuticals; and 3,300 medical centers, hospitals, and clinics are certified to handle radioactive materials. In just 1 year Boston's New England Medical Center uses nuclear medicine to treat or diagnose almost 30,000 patients. Massachusetts General Hospital generates eighty 30-gallon drums of waste annually. Harvard University, which performs research with radioactive materials and accepts radioactive waste from a dozen teaching hospitals in the Commonwealth, is responsible for 2,200 drums a year. And in Massachusetts alone the nuclear industry contributes over 10,000 jobs and more than a billion dollars annually to the State economy.

Obviously nuclear technology is important to the people of Massachusetts and to citizens all across the country, but it requires strict regulation and safe, environmentally sound disposal of the waste it generates. Since 1980 both Congress and Governors throughout the country recognized that low-level waste disposal is the responsibility of the 50 States, and that this responsibility should be shared fairly on a regional basis.

Congress launched this policy in the Low-Level Waste Policy Act of 1980, which encouraged States to form regional agreements for the disposal of low-level waste. As an incentive for entering "interstate compacts" the 1980 act permitted any region in a congressionally approved compact to refuse to accept waste from outside the region beginning January 1, 1986.

With that deadline rapidly approaching, Congress has not yet ratified a single compact; after 6 years, no additional disposal space has been created. The three States with operational sites are understandably concerned over the lack of progress. But it is now clear that States cannot move fast enough to build new waste facilities before the 1990's. The challenge, which until now has been insurmountable, has been to reach an agreement acceptable to the three States with disposal sites, and the 47 States without, that allows continued access to existing sites while assuring the timely development of new capacity.

The bill we introduce today breaks the deadlock by providing for an orderly system of nationwide low-level waste disposal for the next 7 years, together with congressional approval of pending regional compacts. South Carolina, Nevada, and Washington are guaranteed that by 1993 they will no longer be the sole dumping ground for all low-level waste in the country. During the transition period there will be restrictions on generators of waste to reduce the volume they ship to these three sites. A surcharge on waste will provide financial incentives for additional volume reduction. The States that do not yet belong to a regional compact with an operating site, are guaranteed access for 7 years to existing sites under tough but reasonable conditions they can satisfy. And enforceable milestones toward opening new sites will ensure continued progress in creating new disposal capacity.

Judging from the widespread support for this legislation, I believe this approach is realistic and achieveable. Massachusetts waste generators are already practicing significant waste reduction, and the Commonwealth no longer produced the largest amount of low-level waste. In addition, under the able guidance of State Senator Carol Amick, Secretary of Environmental Affairs James Hoyt, and other officials, the Commonwealth is on its way toward meeting its obligations for waste disposal, with full public involvement every step of the way. Massachusetts expects to reach the milestones that will be required under the Federal legislation as a preconditions for shipping its waste to existing sites.

The proposed amendments to the 1980 act are more than a good beginning—they provide a carefully crafted and balanced framework for avoiding a problem in 1986 that could damage the public health, the environment and the economy. I look forward to working with Senator THURMOND, State Governors and all interested parties to achieve timely action on this measure.

This bill would not have been possible without the leadership in the House of Representatives of the chairman of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, MO UDALL, and the chairman of the Energy, Conservation and Power Subcommittee, ED MARKEY, my colleague from Massachusetts. Nor would we be at this point without the tireless efforts and cooperation of three outstanding Governors: Richard Riley of South Carolina, Richard Bryan of Nevada, and Booth Gardner of Washington. And as my colleagues are well aware, Senator THURMOND has almost single handedly kept the need for this legislation as a priority in the Senate.

Enactment of this bill will be an impressive legislative achievement. It will be as much a victory for Democrats as for Republicans, for Massachusetts as for South Carolina, for environmental groups, utilities, university research centers and all Americans. I urge my colleagues in the Senate to support this measure.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. KERRY, and Mr. RIEGLE):

S. 1579. A bill to clarify the remedies available for the enactment of certain civil rights statutes are applicable to the States; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

CIVIL RIGHTS REMEDIES EQUALIZATION ACT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I have today introduced S. 1579 the proposed Civil Rights Remedies Equalization Act of 1985. This bill would clarify congressional intent that the remedies of violations of section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 prohibiting Federal agencies and recipients of Federal financial assistance from discriminating against handicapped persons are available against the States to the same extent as they are available against Federal agencies and against local government and private recipients of Federal funds. This legislation is necessary, for the purpose of implementing congressional intent in enacting section 504, because of a recent Supreme Court ruling that, even though the statute authorizes an aggrieved party to bring suit in Federal court against a category of entities that literally includes the States, the States may not be sued in Federal court unless the law expressly makes the States answerable in Federal court.

The bill would, in the same manner, ensure equalization of the remedies for violations of the prohibition in title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 against sex-based discrimination in education, and the prohibition in the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 against discrimination based on age.

I am also submitting an amendment to the bill amendment No. 584 with a substitute text extending the coverage to include the prohibition in title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 against discrimination based on race, color, or national origin, and the provisions of any other Federal statute prohibiting discrimination by recipients of Federal financial assistance.

Joining me in introducing these measures are Senator STAFFORD, a coauthor with me of the original section 504 provision and the 1974 and 1978 amendments to section 504 and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Education of the Labor and Human Resources Committee; Senator KENNEDY, the ranking minority member of the Labor and Human Resources Committee; Senator WEICKER, chairman of that committee's Subcommittee on the Handicapped; Senator KERRY, the ranking minority member of that subcommittee, where I served throughout the seventies; and Senator RIEGLE, with whom I have often worked closely in efforts to improve the opportunities for disabled and elderly persons, among others.

BACKGROUND

Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, of which I was a principal author, prohibits Federal agencies and federally assisted programs from subjecting qualified handicapped individuals to discrimination. As the courts have acknowledged, Congress created a right of action in Federal or State court to remedy violations of section 504—with no exception in the law either for the States or for any particular type of remedy, such as monetary damages.

Nevertheless, on June 28, 1985, in the case of Atascadero State Hospital versus Scanlon, the Supreme Court held—in a 5-4 decision—that the Congress, in enacting section 504, had not exercised its authority to waive the States' general immunity under the 11th amendment to suits for damages in the Federal courts. Senators STAFFORD and WEICKER and Representatives MARIO BIAGGI, DON EDWARDS, WILLIAM FORD, JAMES JEFFORDS, and GEORGE MILLER, and I had submitted an amicus brief urging the Court not to reach that result.

In this case, an individual suffering from diabetes and the loss of sight in one eye claimed that the State had violated section 504 by denying him employment in a State hospital as a graduate student assistant recreational therapist. The Supreme Court, reversing the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, held that the individual's claim for compensatory damages against the State or a State agency could not be heard in Federal court.

The same holding also applies to injunctions, but it is well established that the 11th amendment does not bar Federal courts from issuing injunctions against named State officials, as distinguished from the State itself, even though the effect is exactly the same as an injunction against the State. Therefore, as the result of Atascadero, injunctive relief is now the only relief available in Federal court against a State agency for a violation of section 504 or any other civil rights statute on the receipt of Federal financial assistance.

NEW RULE FOR CONSTRUING LEGISLATION WAVING THE 11TH AMENDMENT

Mr. President, as I have indicated, the Supreme Court has interpreted the 11th amendment of the Constitution—which literally shields a State only from suits brought in Federal courts by citizens of another State or by citizens or subjects of a foreign nation—as barring all private persons from suing a State in the Federal courts. However, the States themselves and the Congress may waive that immunity.

Federal legislation waiving the States' 11th amendment immunity, however, is subjected to special rules that the Court has been developing in recent years. These purported rules of statutory construction differ significantly from those ordinarily applied, which are designed to ascertain the Congress' intent and give it effect. Regardless of whether the congressional intent is clear, the Court now insists that for a Federal law to waive the States' immunity the intention to do so must be stated "in unmistakable language in the statute itself."

I want to emphasize for my colleagues how extraordinary this rule is. Even where—as in the case of section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act—a statute makes all persons and entities in a specified category of persons and entities subject to suit in Federal court and that category clearly and literally includes States and State agencies, and no exception is provided—or even anywhere implied—for States or their agencies, the Court will hold that the law is not sufficiently clear to constitute a waiver. To further underscore this point, I would note that the Congress always clearly intended and understood that section 504 would apply to the States. The language used in section 504 to apply to non-Federal entities—"any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance"—had been used in the title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, with the word "education" inserted before "program," in title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. The regulations implementing title VI that had been adopted by Federal departments and agencies prior to the enactment of either title IX or section 504, as well as the regulations implementing title IX and section 504 itself, were, by their terms, expressly applicable to the States to the same extent as any other recipient of Federal financial assistance. Moreover, the 1973 Rehabilitation Act extensively restructured and authorized a substantial increase, from $600 million in fiscal year 1973 to $650 million in fiscal year 1974, in appropriations for the Federal-State Vocational Rehabilitation Program. The States now receive more than $1 billion annually under this program. In addition, the States and State agencies unquestionably have constituted a major segment of the category of recipients of all Federal financial assistance throughout the period which these three laws were enacted and since.

Nevertheless, in the absence of a single word in the statute or its legislative history or the implementing regulations of the lead agency or, for that matter, of any department or agency to support their position, five justices concluded that suits against the States for damages in Federal court for violations of section 504 were not authorized. Therefore, only private and Federal and local government entities may be sued in Federal court for damages for such violations.

Mr. President, the purpose of the rule that the Court has adopted seems to be not to assist it and other courts in ascertaining and carrying out congressional intent, but, rather to impose on the Congress a formalistic requirement that the Court now insists be complied with in order for it to give effect to congressional action.

As a result of the Court's decision, a disabled individual who has suffered unfair discrimination at the hands of a State agency has two choices—a suit in State court for damages or injunctive relief, or both, or Federal suit for an injunction against individual State officials. Those choices are not adequate. As to the limit on Federal remedies, litigation involving a claim of discrimination often takes years to resolve. Thus, where the disabled person is seeking employment or is trying to pursue an education or to particiapte in a project having only a 2- or 3-year life, an injunction may come too late to be a value in remedying the harm done through the unlawful discrimination. In a very real sense, the availability of only injunctive relief postpones the effective date of the antidiscrimination law, with respect to a State agency, to the date on which the court issues an injunction because there is no remedy available for violations occurring before that date.

This result is especially devastating in the context of employment discrimination against disabled persons because they—unlike women and members of race and national origin minorities—are not protected by the Civil Rights Act title VII prohibition against employment discrimination, which is enforceable in Federal court through suits for damages.

The availability of a remedy for damages in State court is not adequate for three main reasons. First, State courts—because of a variety of factors including the greater likelihood of State judges being deferential to State officials and laws—are not as likely to be as sympathetic to aggrieved parties in interpreting Federal statutes and applying them to state officials as are the Federal courts.

Second, State judges generally lack the familiarity with and the expertise in interpreting and applying Federal laws that Federal judges typically have.

Third, State courts often have backlogs far greater than those in the Federal courts in the same geographical areas.

Perhaps the best indication of the inadequacies of State courts in this regard is that, according to advice I have received from civil rights lawyers, the overwhelming majority of persons bringing suit based on claims that their rights under Federal laws have been violated by State agencies file their cases in Federal court.

QUESTIONS RAISED WITH RESPECT TO CIVIL RIGHTS LAWS OTHER THAN SECTION 504

Mr. President, it appears that the holding in Atascadero may create problems in carrying out congressional intent with respect to the availability of Federal court suit for damages against States under other civil rights laws in addition to section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act.

In terms of the entities that section 504 prohibits from discriminating and against which it thus creates a right of action for violations of that prohibition, section 504 was patterened after title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. In addition, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 incorporates the basic structure of these three laws. Thus, it appears that legislation is needed to ensure that Federal court remedies are available against the States to the same extent that they are available against all other entities within the scope of these three statutes as well as any other Federal law prohibiting discrimination by recipients of Federal funds.

PROVISIONS OF THE LEGISLATION

Mr. President, I disagree with the Court's action in setting up a hurdle that the Congress must clear before its intent to waive the 11th amendment will be given effect. However, the fact is that the hurdle now exists and further legislative action is necessary in order for section 504, and possibly other civil rights laws using similar operative language, to be given full effect.

Therefore, our legislation would reverse the holding in Atascadero by providing that, unless otherwise expressly provided in Federal statute, the remedies available to enforce the four major Federal civil rights laws noted above, and any other Federal civil rights law based on receipt of Federal financial assistance, against public or private entities other than States shall also be available against the States. Thus, under our proposal, if a Federal suit for damages were generally available to enforce a civil rights law against a recipient of Federal funds—and nothing in that law were to exempt the States from such a suit—a Federal suit for damages would be available against a State or a State agency.

In this way, our legislation would eliminate the Court-made barrier to effectuating congressional intent that the holding in the Atascadero case raises. Under the bill as amended, a statute that is, on its face, equally as applicable to and enforceable against a State agency as it is against other entities, would be enforceable by the same means against State and non-State entities alike.

Our legislation also specifies that it would take effect, with respect to each affected statute, on the date that the law in question took effect. Thus, for example, in the case of section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, which took effect on September 26, 1973, its date of enactment, our proposal would take effect retroactive to that date.

Finally, I would note my understanding that, as has been clearly established in Supreme Court cases, including the Atascadero case, over the past 21 years, the Congress has the authority to waive the States' 11th amendment immunity under the following provisions of the Constitution: the commerce clause, the spending clause, and section 5 of the 14th amendment. In my view, this legislation is clearly authorized by at least the latter two provisions.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, without regard to one's views about the reasoning underlying the Atascadero case—and I believe, as did the four dissenting Justices in the case, that the decision was misguided—I believe that the overwhelming majority of my colleagues would agree that civil rights laws prohibiting discrimination on the part of Federal agencies and the recipients of Federal financial assistance should be enforceable against the States to the same extent that they are enforceable against municipalities and units of local governments, private schools, businesses, and other entities—and the Federal Government itself. Our bill would provide for that result and, thus, make clear that the States may be held accountable in Federal court for injuries they inflict on disabled persons, women, members of minority groups, and older persons through violations of such statutes.

Thus, I urge my colleagues to give this legislation prompt and thorough consideration and strong support. A very significant part of our national legal framework for combating unjust discrimination has been destroyed. We in the Congress should repair the damage as swiftly as possible.

(The text of amendment No. 584 appears in today's RECORD under "Amendments Submitted.")

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. DENTON, and Mr. EAST) (by request):

S. 1580. A bill to provide for comprehensive reforms and to achieve greater equity in the compensation of attorneys pursuant to Federal statute in civil and administrative proceedings in which the United States, or a State or local government, is a party; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEGAL FEES EQUITY ACT .

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am introducing today an administration proposal—the Legal Fees Equity Act—to provide a revamping of the federally mandated attorney compensation schemes applicable to civil, criminal, and administrative proceedings involving the United States and to civil proceedings involving State and local governments.

The purpose of this legislation is to provide a statutory framework for a more equitable balance in compensation for professional legal services rendered in litigation involving the Government. In seeking to attain this goal, the bill would:

Set a $75 per hour maximum rate for attorney's fees awarded, and eliminate the use of bonuses and multipliers to escalate fee awards. This will compensate private attorneys general at a level commensurate with—but still significally higher than—that of their Government counterparts, but provide a reasonable incentive sufficient to attract competent counsel;

Allow recovery of attorneys' fees only when party has prevailed on the merits of its complaint, or where the suit is concluded by a favorable settlement agreement;

Allow recovery of attorneys' fees only for work performed on issues on which the party prevailed;

Permit the reduction or denial of the amount of fee awards, for example, where a party has unreasonably protracted the litigation; where the services provided were excessive with regard to the nature of the controversy; or where the fee award would unreasonably exceed the hourly salary of a salaried attorney;

Provide that monetary judgment be reduced—but not more than 25 percent—by the amount of the attorneys' fees allowed in the proceeding. Exceptions are allowed for suits under certain provisions of the Equal Access to Justice Act, suits for recovery of disputed taxes, or in cases of undue hardship;

Establish certain procedural requirements for attorneys' fee applications, including a 30-day time limit after final judgment for submitting fee applications, and require courts and agencies to develop additional guidelines; and

Clarify the circumstances in which attorneys' fees may be awarded when a claim becomes moot or the party refuses to accept a reasonable settlement offer.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD along with the letter of transmittal from the Department of Justice and accompanying section-by-section analysis.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1580

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as "The Legal Fees Equity Act."

SEC. 2. Findings and Purposes.

(a) Congress hereby finds and declares that—

(1) Many Federal statutes authorize awards of attorneys' fees to be made to parties who prevail against the United States, or against state or local governments, in judicial and administrative proceedings;

(2) The failure to provide standards to guide courts and administrative bodies in awarding such fees has led to inconsistent interpretations of these federal civil fee-shifting statutes, and in many instances to excessive awards of attorneys' fees under them;

(3) It is inappropriate for the federal government to impose on state and local governments the statutory requirement to pay awards of attorneys' fees without providing standards by which to make such awards;

(4) The limitation of $75 per hour prescribed by Congress for civil judicial and administrative proceedings under the Equal Access to Justice Act provides a reasonable and appropriate maximum hourly rate for the award of attorneys' fees against the United States, or against state or local governments, in judicial or administrative proceedings;

(5) It is inappropriate for awards of attorneys' fees to be made to parties who have not prevailed on the merits of their complaint against the United States, or against state or local governments, in judicial or administrative proceedings;

(6) It is appropriate that parties in judicial or administrative proceedings against the United States, or against state or local governments, pay a reasonable portion of their attorneys' fees when monetary awards are recovered;

(7) Statutory provisions are necessary to control the circumstances and conditions under which awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses or costs may be made against the United States, or against state or local governments, in judicial or administrative proceedings; and

(8) Statutory amendments are also appropriate to limit the circumstances in which federal agencies hire outside private counsel from litigation and the amounts at which such outside counsel can be paid.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act—

(1) To establish a uniform hourly rate that shall be the maximum compensation authorized to be awarded against the United States, or against state or local governments, in judicial or administrative proceedings to which any federal fee-shifting statute applies;

(2) To require that awards of attorneys' fees against the United States, or against state or local governments, in judicial or administrative proceedings to which any federal fee-shifting statute applies be made only to parties who have prevailed in the proceedings;

(3) To prescribe standards for the awarding of attorneys' fees and related expenses or costs against the United States, or against state or local governments, in judicial or administrative proceedings to which any federal fee-shifting statute applies; and

(4) To authorize the Attorney General to promulgate regulations governing the circumstances in which federal agencies can retain outside private counsel for litigation and to impose a uniform limit on the rates such counsel can be paid from appropriated funds.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

For the purpose of this Act—

(1) "Attorneys' fees" means fees attributable to professional legal services performed by a person, or persons, licensed to practice law (but shall not include services by pro se claimants), or to services by enrolled tax practitioners with respect to proceedings before the United States Tax Court, including overhead expenses, as defined in this Act, but not including related expenses;

(2) "Fee-shifting statute" means any federal statute that provides for recovery by a party of attorneys' fees or related expenses against the United States, or against a state or local government;

(3) "Overhead expenses", except in extraordinary circumstances, shall include, but not be limited to, rent or mortgage payments, maintenance (including heating and cooling costs), furniture and supplies, reporters, treatises, and other books, secretarial and other clerical and librarian time (including computer word processing expenses), telephone services and calls, and mailing expenses;

(4) "Related expenses" means those expenses that may be awarded pursuant to a federal law, and which are actually incurred by the attorney in connection with judicial or administrative proceedings, but does not include attorneys' fees or overhead expenses, as defined in this Act, or costs enumerated in section 1920 or title 28, United States Code;

(5) "Party" means, for purposes of judicial proceedings, a party as defined by Rule 17 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or, for purposes of administrative proceedings, a party as defined in section 551(3) of Title 5, United States Code;

(6) "Judicial proceeding" means a civil proceeding in any court or under the jurisdiction of a judicial officer, in which a party may by law be awarded attorneys' fees or related expenses;

(7) "Administrative proceeding" means any proceeding, other than a judicial proceeding, in which a party may by law be awarded attorneys' fees or related expenses;

(8) "Administrative officer" means the official(s) or person(s) authorized by statute or regulation to decide the substantive issues being considered in an administrative proceeding, or the official(s) or person(s) designated by the head of the agency as the administrative officer(s) for the purpose of this Act;

(9) "Prevailed on the merits" means having obtained a final decision in which the party has succeeded on a significant issue or issues in the controversy and obtained significant relief in connection with that issue or issues, and may include, where the party is a defendant in a suit by the government, obtaining the dismissal of the complaint;

(10) "Final decision" means a final judgment by the court, or a final order by an agency, in which a party establishes entitlement to relief on the merits of the claim or claims brought in the proceeding, and includes a judgment or order obtained by a party dismissing the proceeding with prejudice or pursuant to a settlement agreement;

(11) "United States" means the United States, or any agency of the United States, or any official of the United States acting in his or her official capacity;

(12) "State" means any state government, or any agency of the state government, or any official of the state government acting in his or her official capacity, and includes the territories and the District of Columbia; and

(13) "Local government" means any county, city, town, municipality, municipal corporation, school board, special governmental district, or other political subdivision created by a state, or any agency of such entity, or any official of such entity acting in his or her official capacity.

SEC. 4. SCOPE AND APPLICATION; RELATIONSHIP TO OTHER LAWS.

(a) The provisions of this Act—

(1) apply to any judicial or administrative proceeding in which a award of attorneys' fees and related expenses is authorized, pursuant to any federal fee-shifting statute, to be made against the United States, or a state or local government, and

(2) establish minimum criteria and requirements for the award of attorneys' fees and related expenses to which this Act applies.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no award of attorneys' fees or related expenses shall be made against the United States, or against state or local governments, in any judicial or administrative proceeding, except as expressly authorized by law (other than this Act), and in accordance with the provisions of this Act. No such award shall exceed the amount determined under the provisions of this Act.

(c)(1) The provisions of any applicable federal fee-shifting statute that establish criteria or requirements in addition to those provided in this Act for the award of attorneys' fees and related expenses in such proceedings, or that otherwise limit awards of attorneys' fees in such proceedings, shall apply in addition to the provisions of this Act.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall be interpreted to create any right to, or provide any authority for, an award of attorneys' fees or related expenses in any judicial or administrative proceeding.

(d) No award of attorneys' fees or related expenses shall be made under a federal fee-shifting statute against a party who has intervened to defend the validity of a law or action of the United States, or a state or local government, and who has not been found to have violated a constitutional or statutory right of the party seeking the award.

(e) Awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses otherwise authorized under section 504 of title 5 of the United States Code or section 2412(d) of title 28 of the United States Code (the Equal Access to Justice Act) shall be made in accordance with the provisions of this Act, except that subsections (a)(1), (b)(1)(C), (b)(2)(A), and (c) of section 6 of this Act shall not apply.

(f) The provisions of this Act shall not apply to compensation of attorneys in proceedings under section 3006A of title 18, United States Code.

SEC. 5. ALLOWANCE OF ATTORNEYS' FEES.

A party otherwise eligible to receive attorneys' fees and related expenses to which this Act applies must establish that—

(1) the party has prevailed on the merits against the United States, or against a state or local government;

(2) the work for which the award of attorneys' fees and related expenses is sought—

(A) was performed in the judicial or administrative proceeding in connection with issues upon which the party prevailed against the United States or against a state or local government, and

(B) was not excessive, redundant, or otherwise unnecessary to resolve the controversy; and

(3) the application for attorneys' fees and related expenses is made in accordance with sections 6(a) and 7 of this Act.

SEC. 6. AMOUNT OF ATTORNEYS' FEES.

(a)(1) No award of attorneys' fees against the United States, or against the state or local government, to which this Act applies shall exceed $75 per hour.

(2) Bonuses or multipliers shall not be used in calculating awards of attorneys' fees.

(b)(1) The court or administrative officer shall reduce or deny accordingly the amount of attorneys' fees and related expenses otherwise allowable if it is found that—

(A) the prevailing party, during the course of the proceeding, engaged in conduct that unreasonably protracted the final resolution of the controversy,

(B) the amount of attorneys' fees otherwise authorized to be awarded unreasonably exceeds the hourly salary of the the attorney representing the party, or

(C) the time spent and legal services provided were excessive with regard to the nature of the controversy.

(2) The court or administrative officer, in the exercise of discretion, may reduce or deny an award where—

(A) the amount of attorneys' fees otherwise authorized to be awarded unreasonably exceeds the monetary result or value of injunctive relief achieved in the proceeding, or

(B) a reduction or denial of the amount of attorneys' fees would otherwise be appropriate under the applicable fee-shifting statute.

(c) Whenever a monetary judgment is awarded in any judicial or administrative proceeding to which a federal fee-shifting statute applies, a portion of the judgment (but not more than 25% thereof) shall be applied to satisfy the amount of attorneys' fees authorized to be awarded against the United States, or against a state or local government. If the authorized award of attorneys' fees exeeds 25% of the judgment, the excess shall be paid by the United States, or the state or local government. This subsection shall not apply to awards of attorneys' fees pursuant to section 7430 of the Internal Revenue Code.

(b) Section 593(g) of title 28, United States Code, relating to independent counsel investigations, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Such award shall not exceed $75 per hour.".

SEC. 7. TIMELY APPLICATIONS AND PROCEDURES.

(a) In any judicial or administrative proceeding to which this Act applies, a party may seek an award of attorneys' fees and related expenses only within thirty days after a final decision by the court or agency from which no appeal is taken. The party seeking an award of attorneys' fees shall submit to the court or agency such information as may be required by the court or agency.

(b) Courts and agencies shall develop procedures, not inconsistent with this Act, for filing of applications for awards of attorneys' fees, which shall provide guidance as to what information should be required to be submitted pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, when such information should be submitted, and when determinations should be made concerning awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses. In no event shall an award of attorneys' fees and related expenses be made prior to entry of a final decision by the court or agency.

SEC. 8 MOOTNESS AND SETTLEMENT DEFENSES

No award of attorneys' fees and related expenses subject to the provisions of this Act may be made—

(1) where the government demonstrates that—

(A) the claims have become moot due to a change in government policy, and

(B) the pendency of the judicial or administrative proceeding was not a material factor in such change in policy; or

(2) for services performed subsequent to the time a written offer of settlement is made to a party, if the offer is not accepted and a court or administrative officer finds that the relief finally obtained by the party is not more favorable to the party than the offer of settlement.

SEC. 9. COMPTROLLER GENERAL REPORT.

The Comptroller General of the United States shall submit on April 1 of each year a report to the President and the Congress on the amount of attorneys' fees and related expenses awarded during the preceding fiscal year against the United States, or against state or local governments, in judicial and administrative proceedings to which this Act applies. The courts and each agency shall provide the Comptroller General with such information as is necessary to comply with the requirements of this section.

SEC. 10. LIMITATION ON EMPLOYMENT AND COMPENSATION OF OUTSIDE, PRIVATE COUNSEL.

Section 3106 of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ a3106. Employment of attorneys; restrictions

"(a) Except as otherwise authorized by law, the head of an Executive department, military department, or other agency, including and independent agency, board, or commission, may not employ an attorney or counsel for the conduct of litigation in which the United States, as agency, or employee thereof is a party, or is interested, or for the securing of evidence therefor, but shall refer the matter to the Department of Justice.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

(1) an Executive department, military department, or other agency, including an independent agency, board, or commission, shall not retain outside, private counsel for the conduct of judicial or administrative litigation in which the United States, an agency, or employee thereof is a party, or is interested, or for the securing of evidence therefor, except upon a certification of need by the Attorney General and in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Attorney General; and

(2) no payment from appropriated funds to such outside, private counsel retained pursuant to subsection (b)(1) shall exceed $75 per hour.

"(c) The Attorney General, after consultation with the Office of Management and Budget, the Office of Personnel Management, and other interested agencies, and upon public notice and comment pursuant to section 553 of this title, shall promulgate regulations implementing this section, including-

(1) the circumstances, terms, and conditions under which Executive departments, military departments and other agencies, including independent agencies, boards, and commissions, are authorized to employ outside, private counsel to be paid from appropriated funds;

(2) procedures for the receipt and prompt resolution of applications from any agency for a certification of need by the Attorney General, in a particular case or class of cases, authorizing the retention of outside, private counsel for litigation in circumstances not otherwise permitted under this section; and

(3) the coordination of the use and availability of the expertise of attorneys within the Executive Branch of government for litigation.

The regulations authorized by this subsection and the determinations of the Attorney General pursuant to such regulations shall not be subject to judicial review.

"(d) For the purposes of this section, the term "outside, private counsel" means an attorney, firm, legal services organization, or association engaged in the practive of law other than as an employee of the United States.

"(e) This section does not apply to the employment and payment of counsel under section 1037 of title 10.".

SEC. 11. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The provisions of this Act shall apply to any award of attorneys' fees and related expenses incurred subsequent to the enactment of this Act, including those incurred after such date in actions commenced prior to such enactment.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE AND INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, July 31, 1985.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed for your consideration and appropriate reference is a legislative proposal "To provide for comprehensive reforms in compensation of attorneys pursuant to federal statute in civil, criminal, and administrative proceedings in which the United States is a party, and in civil proceedings involving state and local governments."

The proposal, known as the "Legal Fees Equity Act," would establish standards and procedures for awards of attorneys' fees in civil judicial and administrative proceedings against the United States, states, and local governments in cases where federal statutes allow such awards, and eliminates excessive awards in such cases. This bill specifically includes fee awards to subjects of investigations under the Independent Counsel statute, 28 U.S.C. § 593(g), and also expands the authority of the Attorney General over the hiring of outside counsel by federal agencies for litigation.

Numerous federal statutes provide that parties to civil suits and administrative proceedings against the United States, states, or local governments may, in appropriate circumstances, recover. "reasonable attorneys' fees" from government defendants. These fee-shifting statutes, for the most part, provide little or no guidance as to when an award of attorneys' fees is appropriate, or as to what constitutes a reasonable award. As a consequence, courts have reached conflicting interpretations of these statutes, and in some cases have made awards of attorneys' fees that greatly exceed the relief obtained by the parties in the proceeding. Multipliers and bonuses have been used to double, even triple, normal commercial hourly rates. Attorneys' fees awards at rates in excess of $100 per hour are becoming increasingly common, with some attorneys' fee requests exceeding $400 per hour through the use of multipliers.

Federal, state, and local taxpayers are the ones who must bear the cost of these excessive attorneys' fee awards that confer windfalls upon a select group of attorneys. These developments have fueled litigation over attorneys' fee awards that frequently overshadows the case on the merits, and have created a burgeoning area of practice for legal practitioners and publishers who hold themselves out as experts on how to obtain large awards of attorneys' fees against government defendants.

The need for legislation is, if anything, even more acute with respect to the award of attorneys' fees against state and local governments than against the federal government. As the liability of states and localities for damages and awards of attorneys' fees has greatly expanded under new federal statutes and recent decisions of the Supreme Court, the obligation of Congress to define more clearly the circumstances and extent to which these entities should be liable for attorneys' fees under federal statutes has also grown. The sound functioning of our federal system demands that the national government should not impose upon the state governments an obligation to pay attorneys' fees in circumstances and amounts not limited by Congress.

We are pleased that Congress was able last year to pass part of this proposal doubling the rates for cases under the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3006A, but we think that only strengthens the case for enacting the balance of this comprehensive reform of attorneys' fee statutes. We can see no justification for allowing the award of attorneys' fees at the rate of several hundred dollars per hour in civil actions when attorneys representing defendants in criminal proceedings or habeas corpus actions are paid at the revised rates of $40 or $60 per hour. The current state of the law still reflects a serious misallocation of resources, at the expense of the public treasury. The intent of the bill is to achieve a more equitable balance in compensation among the various attorneys litigating for or against the government—attorneys for the government, defense attorneys paid under the Criminal Justice Act, and private attorneys receiving fees under fee-shifting statutes.

The Department of Justice urges prompt and favorable consideration of the proposed legislation, which would establish much-needed guidelines for awards of attorneys' fees in civil cases against federal, state, and local government defendants. Enactment of this legislation would promote a more equitable system of compensation for attorneys paid by the government in civil cases, and should substantially reduce the present burdens of litigation over attorneys' fee awards, which one Supreme Court Justice has labeled "one of the least socially productive types of litigation imaginable." Hensley v. Eckerhart, 103 S. Ct. 1933, 1944 (1983) (Brennan, J., dissenting).

The brief summary accompanying this letter outlines the salient features of the bill.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised this Department that the enactment of this proposed legislation would be in accord with the President's program.

Sincerely,

PHILLIP D. BRADY,
Acting Assistant Attorney General.

SUMMARY OF KEY PROVISONS OF THE BILL

1. Level of the Fee Cap: The bill would set the maximum rate for attorney compensation in civil judicial and administrative proceedings under all federal fee-shifing statutes at $75 per hour, which is the same rate established in the Equal Access to Justice Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d) and 5 U.S.C. § 504 (which is still in effect for cases filed before October 1, 1984). The bill would, in all cases under federal fee-shifing statutes, eliminate bonuses and multipliers that courts have used excessively to escalate awards of attorneys' fees.

Because private attorneys in cases under federal fee-shifting statutes are, in one sense, doing "government legal work," it is inappropriate for the compensation that taxpayers pay to "private attorneys general" who sue the government to exceed significantly the compensation paid to the "public attorneys general" who defend the government. The proposed legislation would compensate private attorneys at a level commensurate with (but still significantly higher than) that of their government counterparts, and would provide for a reasonable incentive sufficient to attract competent counsel in fee-shifting cases.

2. Awards to Prevailing Parties: The bill would allow recovery of attorney's fees only when a party has prevailed on the merits of its complaint, or, in accordance with existing case law, where the suit is concluded by settlement agreement. In addition, the bill would allow recovery of attorneys' fees only for work performed on issues in the case on which the party prevailed, and only to the extent the work performed was not excessive, redundant, or otherwise unnecessary.

3. Reduction of Fee Awards: The bill would specify several bases for reducing or denying fee awards that otherwise would be allowed under federal fee-shifting statutes. Reduction of the award would be appropriate, for example, in cases where a party has unreasonably protracted the litigation; where the award is excessive in comparison to the monetary results achieved in the litigation; or where the services provided were excessive with regard to the nature of the controversy. The bill would also provide for reduction of the fee award when it unreasonably exceeds the hourly salary of a salaried attorney. As a guideline, the proposal would require special scrutiny of awards at rates exceeding an amount double an attorney's hourly salary. Allowing twice the hourly salary should cover normal overhead expenses and provide for a reasonable allowance in most cases. The provision would not require courts to limit awards to an amount twice the attorneys' hourly salary, but is designed to ensure that courts carefully review awards to salaried attorneys so as to avoid conferring windfalls at the expense of taxpayers.

The bill would also provide that, in any case where a party recovers a money judgment against a federal, state, or local government, up to 25% of the judgment shall be applied to the party's legal fees. This provision would not apply to suits under certain provisions of the Equal Access to Justice Act that allow attorneys' fees only when the government's position is not found to be substantially justified. This provision also would not apply to suits for recovery of disputed taxes under 27 U.S.C. § 7430.

4. Procedural Guidelines: The bill would establish certain procedural requirements for processing of attorneys' fee applications under federal fee-shifting statutes, and would require courts and agencies to develop additional guidelines.

5. Independent Counsel Investigations: To avoid any ambiguity in the coverage of the legislation, the bill would specifically amend the Independent Counsel statute, 28 U.S.C. § 593(g), to impose the same $75 per hour limitation upon any fee award to a subject of an investigation under that statute.

6. Limitation on Outside Counsel Retained by Federal Agencies: To further the comprehensive nature of the bill, and to promote efficiency and economy in the federal government's use of outside counsel, the bill would impose a $75 per hour limit upon the amounts payable to outside private counsel retained by any federal agency for litigation where the taxpayers must foot the bill. It would also authorize the Attorney General to promulgate regulations governing the circumstances in which any federal agency could retain outside counsel for litigation. Although the Department of Justice presently has such regulations and enforces a $75 per hour limit for outside counsel in litigation subject to its litigation control, legislation such as this is necessary in order to extend the Attorney General's authority over the outside counsel practices of agencies with independent litigation authority. This amendment only relates to the hiring of outside counsel from appropriated funds for purposes of litigation, and does not affect an agency's use of its own attorney's for litigation.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SECTION 1—SHORT TITLE

Section 1 provides that the Act may be cited as the "Legal Fees Equity Act."

SECTION 2—FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

Numerous federal statutes provide that parties to Civil suits and administrative proceedings against the United States, states, or local governments may, in appropriate circumstances, recover "reasonable attorneys' fees" from government defendants. These statutes have put a great burden on the courts because, for the most part, Congress has provided little or no guidance as to when an award of attorney's fees is appropriate, or as to what constitutes a reasonable award. As a consequence, courts have reached conflicting interpretations of these statutes—in some cases using "multipliers" and "bonuses" to double, and even triple, the normal hourly rates of the prevailing party's attorney. This has resulted in uncertainty at least the appearance of arbitrariness or unfairness to litigants. Litigation over attorneys' fee awards frequently overshadows the case on the merits, and has led to the creation of a burgeoning area of practice for attorneys' fee litigators.

The problems evident in this area are in some respects even more serious with respect to the states and localities. Recent decisions of the Supreme Court have expanded greatly the liability of states and local governments to suits under various Federal statutes, and correspondingly to awards of attorneys' fees. As the liability of the states and localities has greatly expanded in recent years, the obligation of Congress to define more clearly the circumstances and extent to which they should be held liable for attorneys' fees under Federal statutes has also grown.

The purpose of the bill is to have Congress provide greater guidance to the courts and federal agencies for the award of attorneys' fees pursuant to federal statute, and to reduce the current uncertainties and disparities reflected in the present decisions. The bill is not intended to deny fees to attorneys for prevailing parties; only to set common standards and procedures that would apply to all awards of attorneys' fees against the United States, and against state and local governments. This will increase the fairness and equity of the current maze of fee-shifting statutes, and should increase public acceptance of these statutes which compensate private attorneys from the public treasury.

With respect to civil judicial and administrative proceedings, the bill is intended to provide guidance in the calculation of fee awards, and to limit the hourly rate of compensation to $75 per hour, which is the same rate established in the Equal Access to Justice Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2412 (d)(1) and (d)(3) and 5 U.S.C. § 504(b). This $75 per hour rate would also apply specifically to a fee award to a subject of an independent counsel investigation pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 593(g). The bill would eliminate the use of bonuses and multipliers.

The bill is also intended to limit the recovery of attorneys' fees to those cases in which a party has prevailed on the merits of the complaint, and only for work performed on issue in the case on which the party prevailed. The bill also specifies several discretionary bases for reducing or denying fee awards that otherwise would be allowed under federal fee-shifting statutes—for example, where a party's conduct unreasonably protracted the litigation; or the requested fee award unreasonably exceeds the hourly salary of a salaried attorney—and provides, in any case where a party recovers a money judgment against a federal, state, or local government, for up to 25 percent of the judgment to be applied to the party's legal fees.[1]

Finally, the bill would amend the existing restrictions of 5 U.S.C. § 3106 to expand their coverage specifically to include the employment of outside private counsel by federal agencies.

SECTION 3—DEFINITIONS

Section 3 defines the terms used in the bill. "Attorneys' fees" are defined as fees attributable to professional legal services performed by a person, or persons, licensed to practice law, including enrolled tax practitioners who practice before the United States Tax Court. This definition is intended to limit awards to licensed practitioners, and not to allow awards to non-licensed, pro se claimants or law students.[2] The definition applies to all fee-shifting statutes, and is intended to cover all awards of fees that in fact reflect compensation of attorneys, however denominated, including those designated as "costs" by the court or administrative agency.[3] "Attorneys' fees" includes "overhead expenses" but does not include "related expenses."

Expenses to be included as "overhead expenses" should be considered as such except in extraordinary circumstances. The list of overhead expenses is not exhaustive, and other appropriate expenses may be included as "overhead expenses." The list is intended to preclude considering these expenses as "related expenses," except in extraordinary circumstances.

"Related expenses" are those expenses that may be awarded pursuant to federal statute, are not "overhead expenses," and are actually incurred by the attorney as a result of judicial or administrative proceedings. The term is intended to be a generic term encompassing those expenses that can properly be awarded under federal law; it does not expand the types of expenses that may be awarded. "Related expenses" does not include "attorneys' fees."

This definition is not intended to affect case law under Title VII and 42 U.S.C. § 1988 which, in some instances, has authorized awards of costs beyond those specified in 28 U.S.C. § 1920 to include such items as lodging and travel expenses. See, e.g., Northcross v. Board of Education, 611 F.2d 624, 639 (6th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 447 U.S. 911 (1980). However, as noted, the definition of overhead expenses precludes considering the items enumerated there as "related expenses." The definition also excludes costs enumerated in 28 U.S.C. § 1920, and the bill is not intended to affect the allocation of costs enumerated in that section.

Courts and administrative officers may include as "related expenses" actual costs incurred for the services of paralegals and law clerks who assist attorneys in representing their clients.

The definitions of "final decision" and "prevail on the merits" are discussed in connection with the provisions of section 5(1) of the bill, which requires that a party seeking an award of attorneys' fees must prevail on the merits.

SECTION 4—SCOPE AND APPLICATION; RELATIONSHIP TO OTHER LAWS

Subsection (a) provides that the provisions of this bill are intended to apply to all awards of attorneys' fees against the United States, or any state or local government, and to establish minimum criteria for such awards. In this way, this bill will provide greater uniformity in the application of the scores of fee-shifting statutes that authorize awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses against the federal, state, and local governments.

Subsection (b) provides the general rule that, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the provisions of this bill would apply to, and modify, all federal fee-shifting statutes, including the Equal Access to Justice Act, 5 U.S.C. § 504 and 28 U.S.C. § 2412 (b) and (d). No award of attorneys' fees and related expenses could exceed the amounts determined under the bill.

Nothing in this bill is intended to overturn cases such as Christiansburg Garment Co. v. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 434 U.S. 412, 421 (1978), where the Supreme Court held that attorneys' fees may be awarded to a prevailing defendant if the plaintiff's claim is found to be "frivolous, unreasonable or without foundation, even though not brought in subjective bad faith." Moreover, 28 U.S.C. § 2412(b) presently provides a statutory basis for the award of attorneys' fees against the United States under certain established common law theories. However, any such awards would be governed by the provisions of this bill.

Subsection (c)(1) provides that the criteria for the award of attorneys' fees and related expenses established by this bill would not supersede more restrictive criteria contained in other statutes for making such awards. The provisions of this bill establish minimum criteria to be applied for determining and awarding attorneys' fees and related expenses or costs in judicial and administrative proceedings against the United States or against state or local governments.[4] Subsection (c)(2) provides that nothing in the bill shall be interpreted to create any right to an award of attorneys' fees of related expenses. Any right to such an award derives solely from the provisions of other laws. Where the underlying federal law does not provide authority for an award of attorneys' fees, see, e.g., Webb v. Board of Education, 105 S. Ct. 1923 (1985), there would be no basis for a fee award under this bill.

The bill does not affect the compensation of attorneys in suits against the government such as those under the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2671-2680, or involving National Service Life Insurance or United States Government Life Insurance, under 38 U.S.C. § 784(g). Those statutes are not federal fee-shifting statutes, because the final award of damages or proceeds is calculated without reference to attorneys' fees and there is no additional element of the award that is attributable to the prevailing party's attorneys' fees. However, the bill would apply to an award of attorneys' fees under any statute that requires the inclusion of a separate element in the damage award to account for attorneys' fees. See e.g., the Uniform Property Relocation Act, 42 U.S.C. § 4654(c).

Subsection (d)(1) is similar to provisions for determining attorneys' fees in the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, 43 U.S.C. § 1619(d)(2). Subsection (d)(2) is intended to protect a party intervening in defense of his own interests with respect to a governmental action but whose conduct did not give rise to the dispute at issue from the specter of liability through an automatic shift of attorneys' fees should the plaintiff prevail. Under the fee-shifting statutes generally, a plaintiff who does not prevail is ordinarily not liable for the government's attorneys' fees. See Christiansburg Garment Co. v. EEOC, 434 U.S. 412 (1978). Similarly, an intervenor-defendant who defends his own rights under the challenged governmental scheme but whose conduct did not give rise to the controversy and did not violate the constitutional or statutory rights of the plaintiff also should not ordinarily be liable for attorneys' fees.

Subsection (e) provides that, although the bill generally would apply to awards under the Equal Access to Justice Act ("EAJA"), the provisions of section 6(a)(1) (establishing a limitation of $75 per hour for attor-

[1] This 25 percent reduction would not apply to suits under certain provisions of the Equal Access to Justice Act, or to suits for recovery of disputed taxes under 26 U.S.C. § 7430.

[2] Most courts have ruled that pro se litigants generally are ineligible for attorneys' fees awards. See Cofield v. City of Atlanta, 648 F.2d 986 (5th Cir. 1981); Owens-El v. Robinson, 498 F. Supp. 877 (W.D. Pa. 1980); Crooker v. Department of Justice, 632 F.2d 916, 922 (1st Cir. 1980); and Burke v. Department of Justice, 559 F.2d 1182 (10th Cir. 1977), aff'g mem. 432 F. Supp. 251 (D. Kan. 1976). The D.C. Circuit, however, has awarded attorneys' fees under the FOIA to pro se prisoners and to law students who received 12 hours of course credit. See Crooker v. Department of Treasury, 663, F.2d 140 (D.C. Cir. 1980); Jordan v. Department of Justice, 691 F.2d 514 (D.C. Cir. 1982). The definition of "attorney," however, is not intended to affect judicial interpretations regarding whether individual statutes authorize awards of attorneys' fees to licensed attorneys appearing pro se. For example in White v. Arlen Realty & Development Corp., 614 F.2d 387 (4th Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 447 U.S. 923 (1980), the Fourth Circuit denied an award of attorneys' fees to a plaintiff-attorney under the Truth-in-Lending Act.

[3] Generally, courts have followed the principle that attorneys' fees, which are authorized by various fee-shifting stautes, are distinct from costs, which are authorized by 28 U.S.C. §§ 2412(a) and 1920. However, some statutes, such as Title VII of the Civil Rights Act and 42 U.S.C. § 1988, have been interpreted to make attorneys' fees part of costs. See Delta Air Lines v. August, 450 U.S. 346 (1981) (Title VII). If left unaddressed, parties could attempt to circumvent the $75 fee limitation and other provisions in this bill regarding attorneys' fees by seeking attorneys' fees as costs under these statutes.

[4] For example, 5 U.S.C. § 7701(g)(1) provides that attorneys' fees may be awarded if (1) the party has prevailed; and (2) the award of attorneys' fees would be "warranted in the interest of Justice. . . ." The second of these two criteria, which is not contained in the bill, would continue to apply.

neys' fees) and section 6(c) (reduction of fee awards in money damages cases) of the bill would not apply to awards made under 5 U.S.C. § 504(a)(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 2412 (d)(1)(A) and (d)(3) (as in effect for cases filed before October 1, 1984). Those provisions of the EAJA provide for awards of attorneys' fees to eligible parties who prevail in litigation with the United States unless the government proves that its position in the litigation was substantially justified. Those provisions already have a general rule limiting fee awards to no more than $75 per hour. In addition, the factors listed for reduction of fee awards in paragraphs (3) and (4) of section 6(b) of the bill would not apply under those provisions of the EAJA.[5] The language and legislative history of those provisions of the EAJA reflect Congress's intent to award attorneys' fees to prevailing parties who meet the qualifications of that Act, unless the government's position was "substantially justified" or "special circumstances" would make an award of attorneys' fees unjust. The purpose of this subsection is to assure that the special characteristics of the EAJA in this respect will not be affected by this bill. The exceptions described in this subsection would not apply to attorneys' fee awards under 28 U.S.C. § 2412(b).

Subsection (f) provides that the provisions of the bill shall not apply in federal criminal proceedings or civil habeas corpus proceedings in the federal courts under the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3006A.

SECTION 5—ALLOWANCE OF ATTORNEYS' FEES

Section 5 of the bill establishes the prerequisites to an award of attorneys' fees and related expenses against the United States, or against state or local governments, in any civil judicial or administrative proceeding to which a federal fee-shifting statute applies. The party seeking such awards must establish, and the court or administrative officer must determine, (1) that the party prevailed on the merits of its complaint in the proceeding; (2) that the work for which the award is sought was performed in the proceeding in connection with issues on which the party prevailed against the United States or a state or local government and was necessary to resolve the controversy; (3) that the application is submitted in compliance with the procedural requirements of Section 7 and does not exceed amounts authorized under Section 6; and (4) that the services for which attorneys' fees are sought are not excessive, redundant, or otherwise unnecessary.

As set forth in section 4(c) of the bill, the requirements of this section for awards of attorneys' fees, including the requirement that a party "prevail," are not intended to supersede other additional requirements established by law, such as those under 5 U.S.C. § 7701(g)(1) (where an award to a prevailing party must be "warranted in the interest of justice").

Nothing in this section is intended to change the burden of proof for determinations of "substantial justification" in applications for fee awards under the Equal Access to Justice Act, 5 U.S.C. § 504(a)(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 2412 (d)(1)(A) and (d)(3) (as in effect for cases filed before October 1, 1984). The burden remains in the government to prove "substantial justification" in connection with such applications.

Prevail on the Merits.—Paragraph (1) would preclude awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses against the United States and against state and local governments unless the party seeking the award prevailed on the merits of its complaint. The definition of "prevail on the merits" focuses on whether the party was successful on significant issues in the controversy and obtained significant relief in connection with these issues. This is intended to be a more flexible standard than some formulations of this term. CF. Taylor v. Sterrett, 640 F.2d 663, 669 (5th Cir. 1981) (a prevailing party for attorneys' fees purposes "has been successful on the central issue" in the case, and has "acquired the primary relief sought"). The relief sought need not be "central," but must be significant in terms of the result sought by the party. In this respect, the bill reflects the first part of the test enunciated by the Supreme Court in Hensley v. Eckerhart, 461 U.S. 424, 433 (1983) ("plaintiffs may be considered 'prevailing parties' for attorneys' fees purposes if they succeed on any significant issue in litigation which achieves some of the benefit the parties sought in bringing suit") (emphasis added).

This bill differs, however, from the second part of the Hensley formulation. The language of Hensley is subject to an overly expansive reading, as the district court did in Laffey v. Northwest Airlines, Inc., 572 F. Supp. 354 (D.D.C. 1983), rev'd, 746 F.2d 4 (D.C. Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 53 U.S.L.W. 3882 (U.S. June 17, 1985). There, the district court found the plaintiffs to be prevailing parties for all purposes even though they in fact failed to achieve the results sought in important respects.

The purpose of the bill is to state more precisely that the relief obtained by the party must be significant, not merely "some of the benefit" the party sought. The relief obtained should be significant in terms of the result sought by the party in bringing the suit. Cf. Hensley v. Eckerhart, 461 U.S. at 440 ("A reduced fee award is appropriate if the relief, however significant, is limited in comparison to the scope of the litigation as a whole").

The requirement to show that the party has prevailed on the merits would also apply to statutes, such as the Clean Air Act, that authorize the award of attorneys' fees "when appropriate."[6]

This paragraph provides that the party must prevail in a "final decision" of a court or a final disposition by an agency in an administrative proceeding. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure generally define a final judgment as any order from which an appeal lies, including dismissals and default and summary judgments, and final judgments entered on less than all pending claims pursuant to Rule 54(b). In an adversary proceeding, the final decision is one which determines the rights of the parties and from which no further review is provided within the administrative process. The definition of "final decision" is limited to those final judgments in which the party establishes entitlement to relief on the merits. Thus, an award of attorneys' fees would not be appropriate for a party who has prevailed only on a motion for preliminary injunction or for a temporary restraining order, where the merits of the suit have not been resolved. However, the definition would permit the award of attorneys' fees where the party defending against a suit brought by the government obtains the dismissal of a groundless complaint.[7]

The bill would preclude so-called "interim awards" of attorneys' fees except where the text or legislative history of an applicable fee-shifting statute indicates that Congress has authorized them, but such awards should be made only "to a party who has established his entitlement to some relief on the merits of his claims, either in the trial court or on appeal." Hanrahan v. Hampton, 446 U.S. 754, 757 (1980) (per curiam). In Hanrahan, the Supreme Court noted that the legislative history of 42 U.S.C. § 1988 cited, as examples of appropriate circumstances for interim fee awards, two cases[8] in which the "party to whom the fees were awarded had established the liability of the opposing party, although final remedial orders had not been entered." Id. at 757. The Court found that the plaintiffs had not prevailed on the merits of any of their claims and reversed the award of attorneys' fees. Id. at 758. Further, the Court ruled that attorneys' fees are not to be awarded for nondispositive rulings regarding matters of discovery, evidence, or procedure. Id. at 759. See also Smith v. University of North Carolina, 632 F.2d 316, 350-51 (4th Cir. 1980).

Paragraph (1) is not intended to modify existing case law providing that attorneys' fee may be awarded in cases where the litigation is terminated by settlement agreement, as long as the party seeking fees has prevailed on the merits of the relief sought.[9] Nor is the provision intended to preclude discussions between the parties of attorneys' fees, or the waiver thereof, before the decision on the merits by a court or the final disposition by an administrative officer, or to prevent the government from discussing liability for attorneys' fees in conjunction with liability on the merits as part of a settlement agreement, or from including in a settlement agreement provisions for attorneys' fees and related expenses or costs.

Necessary Work on Prevailing Issues.—Under paragraph (2), a prevailing party

[5] These discretionary factors authorize a reduction of the attorneys' fee award based on findings that the time and legal services were excessive with regard to the nature of the controversy, or that the amount sought unreasonable exceeds the monetary result or injunctive relief achieved.

[6] The Supreme Court in Ruckelshaus v. Sierra Club, 103 S. Ct. 3274, 3281 (1983), held that the claimant must demonstrate that it enjoyed "some degree of success on the merits" in order to receive attorneys' fees under the Clean Air Act, which provides for such fees "when appropriate."

[7] See H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 96-1434, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. 21-22 (1980). See also United States ex rel. Heydt v. Citizens State Bank, 668 F.2d 444, 447 (8th Cir. 1982) (organization which successfully opposed IRS summons in order to protect the confidentiality of its members was a prevailing party under the EAJA; however, no attorneys' fees were awarded because the IRS position was substantially justified).

[8] Bradley v. Richmond School Board, 416 U.S. 696 (1974) and Mills v. Electric Auto-Lite Co. 396 U.S. 375 (1970), are cited in the legislative history of the Civil Rights Attorneys' Fees Awards Act of 1976. S. Rep. No. 94-1011, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 2, and H.R. Rep. No. 94-1558, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 6 (1976).

[9] See, e.g., Ward v. Schweiker, 562 F. Supp. 1173 (W.D. Mo. 1983). As the court stressed in Parker v. Matthews, 411 F. Supp. 1059, 1054 (D.D.C. 1976), aff'd, 561 F. 2d 320 (D.C. Cir. 1977), the settlement should be carefully scrutinized to determine if an award of attorneys' fees is justified:

"[W]hether to award attorneys' fees where there has been a settlement of a title VII lawsuit must be determined by a close scrutiny of the totality of the circumstances surrounding the settlement, focusing particularly on the necessity for bringing the action and whether the party is the successful party with respect to the central issue—discrimination."

seeking an award of attorneys' fees and related expenses against the United States, or against state or local governments, must show that the work for which fees are sought was performed in connection with issues, substantive or procedural, upon which the party prevailed in the disposition of the controversy.[10] This provision is not intended to preclude awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses where a party's pleadings contain meritorious alternative grounds for relief, based on the same facts as those on which the party prevailed, on which a court or administrative officer did not rule because the party prevailed on other grounds. In such instances, awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses may include amounts attributable to time expended on such alternative pleadings, if the court or administrative officer determines that the alternative pleadings were reasonably directed to the resolution of the merits of the controversey. Of course, a party who seeks different types of relief under different statutory provisions is not entitled to fees for those claims where no relief was provided; nor are awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses to be made in cases where the specific statutory provisions construed in the case do not provide for the award of attorneys' fees.[11]

Paragraph (2) also requires the party seeking attorneys' fees to establish that the services for which fees are sought were not "excessive, redundant, ortherwise unnecesary."[12] Because prevailing intervenors are "parties" for the purposes of this bill, they may receive awards of attorneys' fees if they meet the requirements of the applicable fee-shifting statute and this bill, including the showing required by this paragraph.

Compliance with this Act.—Paragraph (3) requires that applications for an award of attorneys' fees and related expenses be made in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

SECTION 6—AMOUNT OF ATTORNEYS' FEES

Civil fee-shifting statutes

Paragraph 6(a)(1) establishes a maximum hourly rate of $75 for attorneys' fees awards against the United States, states, and local governments under federal fee-shifting statutes.[13] This provision shall not apply to awards under the Equal Access to Justice Act, 5 U.S.C. § 504(a)(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d)(1)(A) and (d)(3), because the EAJA has its own limit of $75 per hour, subject to specified exceptions.[14] In calculating the amount of any award of fees, section 6(a)(2) provides that multipliers or bonuses shall not be used.

The $75 per hour limit in subsection (a) is intended to assure that fees paid to private counsel in fee-shifting cases are brought somewhat more in line with the salaries of attorneys who represent the government in these cases, while providing sufficient incentive to attract competent counsel. This is appropriate, because many federal fee-shifting statutes are premised on the theory that groups or individuals who sue the government for the public benefit are acting as "private attorneys general." Attorneys' fees paid by taxpayers to these "private attorneys general" should be generally commensurate with the salaries paid by taxpayers to federal "public attorneys general."[15] Even the rate of $75 per hour set in the bill is well above the compensation of government attorneys.

It is emphasized that this subsection establishes only a maximum hourly rate of compensation, and that prevailing rates may in fact be less than the maximum allowed under the bill. Courts should give due consideration to the fees normally received by the attorney for similar work and other relevant factors. Attorneys' fees may be awarded at hourly rates less than the maximum established by this bill.

Subsection (b)(1) provides that courts or administrative officers shall reduce or deny awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses against the United States, or against state or local governments, where it is determined that (A) the prevailing party unreasonably protracted the final resolution of the controversy; (B) the attorneys' fee unreasonably exceeds the hourly salary of the attorney; or (C) the time spent and legal services provided were excessive with regard to the nature of the controversy. Subsection (b)(2) also authorizes a reduction or denial of a fee award if (A) the award otherwise allowable would unreasonably exceed the monetary result or the value of injunctive relief achieved in the proceeding; or (B) the award would otherwise by unjust or inappropriate. The amount of any reductions pursuant to subsection (b)(2) shall be at the discretion of the court or administrative officer.[16]

Paragraph (1)(A) is patterned on the Equal Access to Justice Act, 28 U.S.C. 2412(d)(1)(C) and 5 U.S.C. 504(a)(3). Paragraph (1)(C) addresses the problem of a case that is overlawyered. It is derived from Hughes v. Repko, 578 F.2d 483 (3d Cir. 1978), where the district court was directed to determine whether it was reasonably necessary to spend the number of hours claimed by the attorneys in order to perform the legal services for which compensation was sought.

Paragraph (1)(B) provides that the court or administrative officer may consider, as a basis for reducing an otherwise allowable fee award, whether the award would unreasonably exceed the hourly salary of the party's attorney. This provision is intended to apply to all attorneys who are paid on a salaried basis, including in-house counsel and associates in a law firm. As a general guideline, an application for an award may be regarded as unreasonably high under paragraph (1)(B) if it is more than twice the attorney's hourly salary. Twice the attorney's hourly salary should, in general, provide reasonable compensation and cover normal overhead expenses. The bill is intended to encourage courts and administrative officers carefully to review applications for awards that would substantially exceed the actual cost of the litigation, and to reduce awards that would confer windfalls on attorneys or the organizations that employ them.

Paragraph (2)(A) is intended to address the anomalous result where attorneys receive far greater benefit from the litigation than their clients, such as in cases where $100,000 is awarded in attorneys' fees for a $10,000 judgment, or where $22,000 in attorneys' fees is awarded for only a $500 award to each of three clients. In other cases, the injunctive relief actually achieved in the case might be so limited that it does not warrant the amount of attorneys' fees otherwise allowable. Cf. Hensley v. Eckerhart, supra, 461 U.S. at 435-36 & n.11 (The award of full attorneys' fees to a party who has achieved only partial or limited success would be "an excessive amount"). In determining whether reduction of an award is appropriate, courts or administrative officers should consider both the monetary judgment achieved and any significant injunctive or other equitable relief obtained by the parties in the proceeding.

Paragraph (2)(B) provides that the bases for reducing an award of attorneys' fees that are listed in this subsection are not meant to be exclusive, and courts and administrative officers should continue to consider other factors that are appropriate under existing law. See Hensley v. Eckerhart, supra, 461 U.S. at 436-37. For example, the legislative history of the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Award Act of 1976, 42 U.S.C. § 1988, provides that "special circumstances" are to be considered by courts in awarding attorneys' fees. Nothing in this bill is intended to preclude consideration of [10] See Hensley v. Eckerhart, supra, 461 U.S. at 435 ("[W]ork on an unsuccessful claim cannot be deemed to have been 'expended in pursuit of the ultimate result achieved.' . . . [T]herefore no fee may be awarded for services on the unsuccessful claim.").

[11] See Smith v. Robinson, 104 S. Ct. 3457 (1984) (affirming court of appeals' reversal of district court's award of attorneys' fees where case was grounded on the Education for All Handicapped Children Act, which does not provide for the award of attorneys' fees, even though the plaintiff included allegations based on section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and 42 U.S.C. § 1983, which the courts did not reach). The Court agreed with the respondents' contention that "Whatever Congress' intent was in authorizing fees for substantial, unaddressed claims based on § 1988 or § 505, it could not have been to allow plaintiffs to receive an award of attorney's fees . . . where Congress has made clear its intent that fees not be available." Id. at 3466. See also Irving Independent School District v. Tatro, 104 S. Ct. 3371, 3379 (1984).

[12] See Hensley v. Eckerhart, supra, 461 U.S. at 434 ("Cases may be overstaffed, and the skill and experience of lawyers may vary widely. Counsel for the prevailing party should make a good-faith effort to exclude from a fee request hours that are excessive, redundant, or otherwise unnecessary, just as a lawyer in private practice ethically is obligated to exclude such hours from his fee submission.").

[13] In determining the total award of attorneys' fees, courts and administrative officers should continue the practice of determining the number of hours reasonably expended in the proceeding, multiplied by a reasonable hourly rate not exceeding $75. In deciding whether the hours claimed were "reasonably expended" under any fee shifting statute, the Supreme Court has admonished that "[h]ours that are not properly billed to one's client also are not properly billed to one's adversary pursuant to statutory authority." Hensley v. Eckerhart, supra, 461 U.S. at 434, citing Copeland v. Marshall, 641 F.2d 880, 891 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (en banc) (emphasis in original). In arriving at the total fee award, the factors set forth in section 6(b) and those identified by the Supreme Court in Hensley v. Eckerhart, supra, 461 U.S. at 434-37, should be considered.

[14] The provisions of the Equal Access to Justice Act, unlike other fee-shifting statutes, predicate awards of attorneys' fees not only upon a finding that the party prevailed, but also that the government was not substantially justified in its position. In light of the latter requirement and the EAJA's existing fee limitation provision, it is unnecessary to apply the general fee limitation of this bill to the EAJA.

[15] Federal fee-shifting statutes "should not be implemented in a manner to make the private attorney general's position so lucrative as to ridicule the public attorney general." Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, Inc., 488 F.2d 714, 719 (5th Cir. 1974).

[16] The factors set forth in paragraphs (1)(C) and (2)(A) would not apply to awards under 5 U.S.C. 504 and 28 U.S.C. 2412(d) of the Equal Access to Justice Act (as in effect for cases filed before October 1, 1984). This exception is intended to maintain the status quo in the interpretation of the "special circumstances" provision of the EAJA, and not to affect the courts' construction of that term in the context of fre awards under the EAJA.

such "special circumstances" to reduce the amount of fee awards against the government.

Subsection (c) provides that, whenever a monetary judgment is awarded against the United States, or against a state or local government, a portion of the judgment (but not more than 25%) shall be applied to satisfy the amount of attorneys' fees allowed in the proceeding. If a fee award exceeds 25% of the judgment, the defendant government would be liable for the excess. On the other hand, if a fee award is less than 25% of the judgment, the award would be satisfied from the amount of the judgment. Any amount not applied to attorneys' fees, of course, would be paid to the plaintiff.

The rationale for this offset is not to reduce the attorneys' compensation, but to provide that a prevailing party should pay part of its legal expenses from any monetary award recovered in a judicial or agency proceeding. This provision would not apply to attorneys' fee awards under the Equal Access to Justice Act, 5 U.S.C. § 504(a)(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 2412 (d)(1)(A) and (d)(3), where fee awards are available only where the government's position was not substantially justified. Cf. note 13, supra. It also would not apply to awards in cases brought for recovery of disputed tax payments under 26 U.S.C. § 7430, in order to avoid inconsistent adjudications under the Internal Revenue Code.[17]

The result of the 25 percent reduction in monetary awards to be applied toward attorneys' fees is similar to that under the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2678, and section 206 of the Social Security Act, 42 U.S.C. § 406, which provide for compensation of attorneys from any monetary awards recovered by the parties, except that the fee award under a fee-shifting statute would not be limited to 25 percent of the judgment.

Independent counsel investigations

As amended in 1982, the statute providing for the appointment of an Independent Counsel to investigate allegations of criminal wrongdoing by the President and other specified Executive officials now authorizes the court to award reimbursement to a subject of an independent counsel investigation for all or part of his or her attorneys' fees incurred in the course of such investigation if no indictment is brought against the subject and the attorneys' fees would not have been incurred but for the Independent Counsel investigation. 28 U.S.C. § 593(g). This statute, however, does not provide for a limitation on the amount of fees awarded.

New subsection 6(d) of the bill would impose a limit of $75 per hour on awards under the Independent Counsel provision, the same limit as for other civil fee-shifting statutes. This change is made expressly to avoid any uncertainty as to the reach of the statute. As provided in section 11 of the bill, this amendment would apply to all attorneys' fees incurred after the date of enactment of the bill.

Criminal Justice Act fees

As introduced in the 98th Congress (S. 2802 and H.R. 5757), the bill contained provisions that would amend the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(d), to double the compensation rates for defense attorneys in criminal proceedings—from $30 per hour for time expended in court and $20 per hour for time expended out of court to $60 and $40, respectively—and also double the maximum total compensation to $2,000 per attorney for felony cases, $800 per attorney for misdemeanor cases, and $500 per attorney for post-trial and probation revocation proceedings.

Those provisions were enacted separately in the closing days of the 98th Congress as part of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-473. Thus, the much-needed increase in the maximum hourly rates for attorneys who represent parties under the Criminal Justice Act has already been achieved. Accordingly, the bill presently focuses solely on attorneys' fee awards in the civil and administrative context. We see the enactment of this bill as just as significant a step in bringing about a better balance in civil fee awards as the Criminal Justice Act amendments were in the criminal context.

SECTION 7—TIMELY APPLICATIONS AND PROCEDURES

Subsection (a) establishes a jurisdictional requirement that a party seeking an award of attorneys' fees and related expenses submit an application for such award within 30 days of a final decision on the merits by a court or the entry of a final disposition by an administrative officer, from which no appeal is taken. A final decision on the merits is defined as the entry of judgment under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and includes a dismissal of the suit and a dismissal pursuant to a settlement agreement. Parties may not be awarded attorneys' fees and related expenses by a court or administrative officer if the fee award application is made after the 30 day time limit.

This requirement is consistent with the jurisdictional time for filing fee applications pursuant to the Equal Access to Justice Act, and is responsive to the Supreme Court's recent observation that courts can adopt procedural rules setting reasonable time limits for applications for attorneys' fee awards. White v. New Hampshire Department of Employment Security, 455 U.S. 445 (1982).[18] Subsection (a) also requires the party seeking an award to submit such information as may be required by the court or agency.

Subsection (b) directs courts and agencies to provide guidance to parties regarding the information required to be filed. Courts and agencies should, at the least, require submission of the following information: a statement of the basis of the claim for attorneys' fees; a statement that attorneys' fees are awardable under applicable law; a statement of the amount sought; a copy of any written fee agreement; and an itemized accounting of the hours expended and the specific tasks performed by the attorney on each issue in the proceedings.[19] Further, courts and agencies should require the submission of information to assist them in making the findings under section 6(b) of this bill, with respect to the reduction of awards of attorneys' fees. Subsection (b) further requires courts and agencies to establish procedures regarding the timing of applications for attorneys' fees and supporting information, and the timing of judicial and agency rulings on these applications.[20]

To ensure that courts are consistent in issuing requirements for submission of information for fee applications, the bill anticipates that the Judicial Conference of the United States would prescribe guidelines for courts to follow in establishing these requirements. These guidelines would not supersede any requirements for submission of information required by law in conjunction with attorneys' fees applications. The bill also anticipates that agencies, when establishing requirements for submission of information in conjunction with fee applications, will follow the guidelines established by the courts.

Section 7(b) requires that these guidelines provide that attorneys' fees may be awarded only final decisions. The meaning of final decision, including dismissals and so-called "interim awards" in the circumstances outlined by the Supreme Court in Hanrahan v. Hampton, supra, are discussed in connection with section 5(1) of the bill.

SECTION 8—MOOTNESS AND SETTLEMENT DEFENSES

Under existing law, a party will be held to be a prevailing party and entitled to recover attorneys' fees and related expenses or costs even if the claim has been mooted, if it is found that the suit was a "catalyst" for the change of policy that rendered the claim moot. See, e.g., Maher v. Gagne, 448 U.S. 122, 129-30 (1980). Subsection (a) would codify the standard by which pending litigation is determined to have been such a catalyst by requiring that the litigation be a "material factor" in the policy change. This is the standard that is currently being applied by most courts. See, e.g., Morrison v. Ayoob, 627 F.2d 669 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1102 (1981). This provision would ensure that courts do not place undue emphasis on chronology—that is, the fact that the plaintiff's case was pending when [17] Inconsistent adjudications could result because the tax laws permit taxpayers who contest many government tax claims either: (1) to pay the contested taxes and sue for a refund in a district court or in the Claims Court, or (2) to bring suit, without payment, in the Tax Court. A taxpayer who sued in the District or Claims Court and won would receive a monetary award. Presumably, 25% of this amount would otherwise be applied to reduce any attorneys' fees award. However, a taxpayer who sued in the Tax Court and won would not receive a monetary award but, instead, simply a determination that no liability existed. Thus, the 25% reduction would hinge entirely upon the taxpayer's choice of forum, an anomalous result that would otherwise channel many more cases to the already overburdened Tax Court.

[18] As noted by the Supreme Court in White, courts currently differ with respect to the time in which attorneys' fees awards must be sought. Id., 455 U.S. at 450 n.9. Before White, some courts allowed only 10 days from the time of entry of judgment for filing of fee applications under Fed. R. Civ. P. 59(e); other circuits have imposed no time constraints. The Eighth Circuit has recommended a rule for filing attorneys' fee requests within 21 days after entry of judgment. See Obin v. District 9, Int'l Ass'n of Machinists, 651 F.2d 574, 583 (8th Cir. 1981).

[19] A requirement for this type of information is consistent with the District of Columbia Circuit's ruling in National Ass'n of Concerned Veterans v. Secretary of Defense, 675 F.2d 1319 (D.C. Cir. 1982), which required detailed documentation by a party seeking an award of attorneys' fees.

[20] For example, in some cases fee applications can be resolved immediately following the district court's decision on the merits in order to permit a simultaneous appeal on the merits and of the fee award. This would prevent piecemeal appeals, and might be appropriate where no disagreement existed over the calculation of the award or where the determination required complete familiarity with the record. See White, supra, 455 U.S. at 454. In other cases, however, it might be preferable to defer attorneys' fees issues until all appeals have been completed and the plaintiff's entitlement to relief on the merits has been established with finality. This might be appropriate in cases where the determination of attorneys' fees is difficult and likely to consume more time than the appeal on the merits.

the government changed the policy that mooted the suit. Under this provision, governments would be encouraged to carry out planned policy reforms without fear of incurring liability for fees in pending suits, but would still be liable for attorneys' fees unless the government could prove that the suit actually was not a "material factor" in the policy change.

Subsection (b) would deny awards of attorneys' fees and related expenses for services performed after a written offer of settlement by the United States, or by state or local governments, if the party refuses the offer but is ultimately able to do no better when the case is resolved on the merits. The Supreme Court has already construed Rule 68 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to reach this same result in cases under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Marek v. Chesny, No. 83-1437 (U.S. June 27, 1985). This subsection would apply the Marek result to all fee-shifting statutes under which attorneys' fees are awarded against the government. This would provide an incentive for governments to make reasonable settlement offers, and encourage parties to give serious consideration to such offers. As the Supreme Court noted in Marek, slip op. at 9, "Section 1988 encourages plaintiffs to bring meritorious civil rights suits; Rule 68 simply encourages settlements. There is nothing incompatible in these two objectives." [21] This bill would make that construction uniform for all fee-shifting statutes to avoid the need for litigation over the construction of each such statute.

SECTION 9—COMPTROLLER GENERAL REPORT

Section 9 requires the Comptroller General of the United States to submit an annual report to the President and the Congress on the amount of attorney's fees and related expenses or costs awarded against the United States or against state and local governments under federal fee-shifting statutes in judicial and administrative proceedings. To assist the Comptroller General, courts and agencies should provide whatever information is needed. In preparing this report, the Comptroller General should use the reports prepared under the Equal Access to Justice Act by the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and the Chairman of the Administrative Conference of the United States, respectively, under 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d)(5) and 5 U.S.C. § 504(e).

[21] The contrary rule would provide little incentive for parties to settle cases early in the litigation. See Fioretti and Convery, "Attorney's Fees Under The Civil Rights Act—A Time for Change," 16 J. Mar. L. Rev. 261, 277-78 (1983) (discussing earlier cases that had failed to apply the approach of Marek v. Chesny):

"Aside from the 'prevailing party' issue, the present application of § 1988 results in a lack of incentive for plaintiff's attorneys to enter into pretrial settlements. The more hours the attorney spends on the case, the higher his potential fee award. The motivation then is not to settle, but to proceed to trial, where the hourly rates are even higher.

"Nor is such a result in the plaintiff's best interests. The purpose of the Civil Rights Act as a whole is to protect those who have suffered a constitutional tort. It naturally follows that if an early settlement is possible, the plaintiff, the protected party under the Act, should be compensated swiftly. However, a plaintiff's attorney, who during the early phase of the litigation has spent relatively few hours in preparation, may lack incentive to settle until compensable hours have reached a significant level. Thus, the overriding goal of the Civil Rights Act is thwarted and litigation is encouraged. The already crowded courts are further congested, so that the taxpayer suffers as well."

SECTION 10—LIMITATION ON EMPLOYMENT AND COMPENSATION OF OUTSIDE PRIVATE COUNSEL

This section, a new provision in the bill, would impose upon the federal government the same fee cap—$75 per hour—that the bill would impose upon attorneys' fee awards to parties in litigation with the federal government, or with the states.

Section 3106 of Title 5 of the United States Code currently requires that Executive departments must refer all litigation to the Department of Justice, unless otherwise authorized by law. The Department already has regulations governing the hiring of private counsel in litigation under its authority, and it has consistently limited the payment of private counsel to $75 per hour. But the Department's regulations now do not reach agencies with independent litigation authority. Where agencies are authorized by law to employ attorneys to conduct litigation, there presently are no statutory restrictions upon the hiring of outside counsel as opposed to staff attorneys, or upon the hourly rates that may be paid. As a result, many agencies presently expend taxpayer dollars on private attorneys at a cost well in excess of the cost of staff attorneys. Other agencies, though, including those with large litigation caseloads such as the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Federal Trade Commission, rely entirely upon staff counsel and do not use outside private counsel.

As part of the overall reform effort of the Legal Fees Equity Act, the bill would make all agencies accountable to the Attorney General with respect to the hiring of outside counsel. This amendment would provide that, notwithstanding any other provision of law, no agency could retain private counsel at the expense of the taxpayers to conduct litigation except in accordance with regulations adopted by the Attorney General. The bill also sets a limit of $75 on the hourly rate of such attorneys retained by the government and paid from appropriated funds. This provision corresponds to the $75 limit on the hourly rate on all fee-shifting statutes, so that the taxpayers will pay private agency counsel a rate no higher than would be paid by those same taxpayers to a prevailing plaintiff in a fee-shifting case. (For attorneys directly employed by the federal government, of course, the effective hourly rate would be far less than $75 per hour.)

This section would amend 5 U.S.C. § 3106. The two existing sentences of § 3106 would be retained largely without change as subsections (a) and (e), respectively. The only change is that the first sentence of present § 3106, which refers to Executive departments and military departments, would be expanded to include a reference to all other agencies including independent agencies, boards, and commissions, to make subsection (a) consistent with the reach of the limitations of subsection (b). Of course, there are many independent agencies, boards and commissions that already have independent litigation authority, and they would not be affected by the change to subsection (a). They would, however, be affected by the limitations of subsection (b), which would apply to the hiring of private counsel at taxpayer expense by any agency, independent or not.

Subsection (b) states the general rule that no agency may retain private counsel at taxpayer expense to handle any litigation except as provided in regulations adopted by the Department of Justice, and that, in any event, such private counsel may not be paid more than $75 per hour from funds appropriated for agency litigation. This includes any funds appropriated to the agency for litigation or legal services, and the permanent, indefinite appropriation to the Judgment Fund under 31 U.S.C. § 1304. It is not intended to apply, however, to the compensation of counsel on a contingency-fee basis, rather than on an hourly basis, for the collection of debts owed to the federal government, should that practice be authorized by Congress.

Subsection (c) authorizes the Attorney General to promulgate regulations implementing the provisions of this section as amended. The regulations could not raise the overall limit of $75 per hour in subsection (b)(2) but, subject to that limit, they may take into account different types of litigation and the experience and skill of attorneys. The subsection also contemplates a procedure for an agency, in exceptional circumstances, to apply to the Attorney General for a certification of need to employ outside private counsel, for a particular case or a class of litigation, in circumstances that would not otherwise be permitted by the regulations. This will preserve a measure of flexibility in the hiring of outside counsel in response to unexpected demands. The regulations also provide that the Attorney General may act to coordinate the use and availability of the expertise of the some 17,000 attorneys presently employed by the federal government, in order to promote their more efficient use and to reduce the need for hiring more expensive outside counsel. The bill specifically precludes judicial review of the regulations adopted by the Attorney General under this subsection and the determinations and actions he takes pursuant to those regulations, because judicial review of the Attorney General's supervison of litigation involving the United States would be most inappropriate.

SECTION 11—EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 11 applies the provisions of the bill to any award of attorneys' fees and related expenses incurred subsequent to the enactment of the bill. Further, the provisions of the bill apply to actions commenced prior to enactment, but only for attorneys' fees and related expenses incurred after the date.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in July 1981, the Constitution Subcommittee began a series of hearings to examine the degree to which recent Federal statutes and court opinions have subjected States and municipalities to growing liabilities for awards of attorney fees. Several leading State and local officials testified about the deleterious effects to these unanticipated liabilities. One State attorney general, for instance, noted that:

States have shown that they have paid sometimes 10 times as much money to pay off these attorney fee awards than they had to pay to satisfy plaintiffs.

Hearings on S. 584 and S. 585, Subcommittee on the Constitution, 97th Congress, 1st session 561 (1981).

At the same time, officials in the Reagan administration undertook a review of the need for some standards to govern the award of attorney fees under numerous statutes which, under broadly defined circumstances, shift the entire expense of litigation to the State, local, or Federal Government defendant. The legislation, which I am sponsoring today, the Legal Fees Equity Act, is the product of careful study to develop uniform standards for setting fees at levels sufficient to attract competent counsel without granting windfalls to lawyers.

This careful study has shown that standards for determining eligibility for, and the amount of, attorney fees awarded against Government parties have varied widely from court to court and State to State. This has often resulted in the award of excessive fees. For example, some courts have even used "multipliers" to double or triple an attorney's customary hourly rate when computing the amount of a fee award.

These inconsistent and troublesome results are primarily due to the ambiguity of fee-shifting statutes which provide no uniform standards for the award of attorney fees to a litigant who prevails to some degree in litigation against a government. Judicial and administrative officers are simply left without adequate guidelines in the law to fashion uniform and fair awards. Thus, the Legal Fees Equity Act is needed to provide standards and procedures for awarding attorney fees in proceedings against the United States as well as State and local governments in cases where Federal statutes allow such awards.

This bill differs in several important respects from S. 2802, the version of this legislation which I sponsored in the 98th Congress. As a result of hearings held on S. 2802, this bill specifically applies to the Independent Counsel statute, 28 U.S.C. 593, and expands the authority of the Attorney General to enforce limits on the hiring of outside counsel by Federal agencies. This bill also differs from S. 2802 in that the portions of S. 2802 which doubled the attorney fee compensation rates for the Criminal Justice Act have already been enacted.

It is noteworthy, however, that disparities between the compensation of attorneys awarded fees in civil actions against the Government and the compensation of attorneys awarded fees for representing indigent criminal defendants. Although the attorneys working under the Criminal Justice Act protect some of our Nation's most vital constitutional rights in criminal trials where life and liberty may be at stake, they still are compensated at levels far below attorneys who are paid under fee-shifting statutes. The Legals Fees Equity Act continues to try to remedy that inequity.

BACKGROUND

Since first established by the Supreme Court in 1796, Arcambel v. Wiseman, 3 Dall. 306 (1796), the basic rule in America for the compensation of counsel has been that each party to a judicial proceeding is expected to bear the cost of his own litigation. The Supreme Court ruled in Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. v. Wilderness Society, 421 U.S. 240 (1974), that Federal courts lacked power to create exceptions to this rule by awarding fees to attorneys who undertook to enforce certain important rights. Alyeska makes it clear, however, that Congress may create exceptions to the traditional American rule by statute.

Since 1974 Congress has enacted over 129 fee-shifting statutes. These statutes authorize recovery of attorney fees in cases against State and local governments as well as the Federal Government. Most of these statutes simply grant the court discretion to award reasonable attorneys' fees to the prevailing plaintiff in a suit against a government. These enactments offer little or no guidance as to the limits of judicial discretion, the standards for determining a reasonable fee or the degree of success necessary to satisfy the prevailing requirement. Accordingly, the amount and complexity of litigation to determine the amount of counsel fees under these fee-shifting statutes has increased dramatically. In 1980 alone, the Supreme Court issued nine opinions on the award of attorney fees. That same year, the Fifth Circuit decided over 50 reported cases on counsel fees.

The Supreme Court reacted to this veritable flood of litigation with the comment that "a request for attorneys fees should not result in a second major litigation." Hensley v. Eckerhart, 103 S.Ct. 1933, 1941 (1983). In that same case, Justice Brennan argued that litigation over attorney fees "serves no productive purpose, vindicates no one's civil rights, and exacerbates the myriad problems of crowded appellate dockets." (Id. at 1950.) A hint of the Supreme Court's frustration with the absence of adequate legal standards governing the award of reasonable fees emerges later in Justice Brennan's concurrence: Ultimately—the fee shifting statute's—straightforward command is replaced by a vast body of artificial, judgmade doctrine, with its own arcane procedures, which, like Frankenstein's monster, meanders its well intentioned way through the legal landscape leaving waste and confusion—not to mention circuit splits—in its wake. (Id. at 1951.)

Not only has the absence of standards for the award of attorney fees clogged the courts, it has also led to exorbitant fee awards. A recent request for fees in Massachusetts is an example of this problem. A zoning law was declared unconstitutional after a lengthy series of appeals. The attorney, who is also a full-time law professor, requested $331,441 in fees at an effective hourly rate of $412.50 an hour for his services. The Washington Post issued the following commentary on that case:

> High-priced lawyers are just charging much too much—to the point of caricature—and the folks expected to pay their fees should put an end to the practice. Just because well-heeled private clients dole out huge sums doesn't mean that the public should be equally generous. The "prevailing wage" approach that government uses when it is buying services—which is the essence of Professor Tribe's claim—has a superficial appeal. But on closer inspection it reveals elements of a gigantic rip-off. * * * Lawyers—even civil rights lawyers—need at least as much wage restraint as others when it comes to billing the government.

The Post might also have asked how an hourly rate of $412.50 can be justified alongside the limits of $20 per hour imposed on attorneys relying on the Criminal Justice Act.

In the absence of adequate computation standards, attorney fee awards have also been subject to the criticism that the award is disproportionate to the degree of success achieved in the underlying case. For instance, in Skoda v. Fontani, 646 F.2d 1193 (7th Cir. 1981), the plaintiff was awarded $1 in damages, but the attorney fee award was awarded over $6,000. In Rivera v. City of Riverside, 679 F.2d 795 (9th Cir. 1982), the plaintiff was awarded $33,000 in damages, but the attorney fee award was nearly a quarter of a million dollars. The National Association of Attorneys General recently completed an exhaustive report on the award of attorney fees under the fee-shifting statute most often employed against State and local governments. This report gives a comprehensive overview of the problems created by the lack of adequate standards for the award of attorney fees. I would urge each of my colleagues to read this report.

The overall purpose of this proposal is to provide the courts and Federal agencies with greater guidance in implementing Federal fee-shifting statutes. This bill would not deny fees to prevailing attorneys, but would set standards and procedures to ensure that such fees are "reasonable." An important element of the standards proposed by this legislation is a cap of $75 per hour on attorney fees awarded against the Government in civil judicial or administrative proceedings. This $75 per hour fee cap is the same rate established in the recently enacted Equal Access to Justice Act, 28 U.S.C. 2412(d) and 5 U.S.C. 504(b). The bill would, therefore, allow courts to compensate private attorneys at a level commensurate with, though still higher than, that received by the Government attorneys they oppose.

In the absence of adequate statutory guidance, some courts have used bonuses and multipliers extensively to escalate awards. Multipliers were justified as compensation for litigating a particular complex case, as a reward for high quality work by the attorney, or as an offset for the riskiness or contingency of the case. In the recent Supreme Court case of Blum v. Stetson, — U.S. — (Mar. 21, 1984) (slip op. No. 81-1374), found that these justifications for multipliers "do not withstand examination." (Id. at 9.) The complexity of a case will be reflected in the number of hours expended in preparation. The quality of an attorney's work will be reflected in the customary hourly rate used to compute his award. Contingency is an element of every case brought under these fee-shifting statutes because they require a litigant to prevail in order to qualify for an award. This "prevailing" requirement was enacted by Congress to discourage frivolous or meritless suits. Granting a bonus for risky cases would be at odds with Congress' intent to award fees only for meritorious suits. Thus, where bonuses are used to compensate attorneys who are handling complex or novel cases, the net result is to inflate compensation which has already been adequately provided. Bonuses for contingency defeats a primary purpose of only compensating litigants for meritorious suits. Consistent with the Stetson case, this bill would eliminate the use of multipliers and bonuses in an effort to avoid absurdly high awards.

The bill is intended to apply to all awards of attorney fees against the United States and any State or local government. Its provisions apply to, and modify, all Federal fee-shifting statutes, but do not supersede more restrictive criteria contained in other statutes. This includes awards made under the Equal Access to Justice Act, except certain specified provisions of that act.

Federal fee-shifting statutes generally contain language indicating that such awards are available only to "prevailing parties." Ambiguities have developed concerning when a party has adequately prevailed so as to come within the statutes. For example, Nadeau v. Helgemoe, 581 F.2d 275 (1st Cir. 1978), adopted a standard which held that if a party had succeeded "on any significant issue in litigation which achieves some of the benefit the parties sought in bringing suit, "while Taylor v. Sterrett, 640 F.2d 663 (5th Cir. 1981), held that a party must have been "successful on the central issue as exhibited by the fact that he has acquired the primary relief sought."

The Legal Fees Equity Act, which I am proposing, clarifies this standard by requiring that a party prevail on the merits in order to obtain an award of fees. The bill's standard is neither as lenient as the "some benefit" test nor as strict as the "central issue" test. The relief sought must be "significant," not merely of "some benefit." Moreover an award of attorney fees may not be obtained prior to a final judgment. This latter requirement is not meant to be read so as to preclude interim awards where Congress has authorized them in the various fee-shifting statutes. Neither is the requirement of final disposition intended to preclude recovery of attorney fees where settlement is reached prior to judgment. Such settlements are generally desirable and so long as it can be shown that the party has prevailed on the merits of the relief sought an award of attorneys' fees may still be obtained.

Where a settlement offer is made by government officials and refused by the plaintiff who is unable thereafter to do any better at final judgment, this bill would deny the recovery of attorney fees for services performed subsequent to the refused offer. Such a provision will encourage government officials to make responsible settlement offers and urge complainants to give those offers meaningful consideration. Of course, where refusal is reasonable under the circumstances this provision would not apply.

The bill also provides that the amount of any judgment awarded against the United States, or against a State or local government shall be reduced by the amount of the attorney fees, not to exceed 25 percent of the judgment. This provision ensures that prevailing parties will pay part of their legal expenses from any monetary award. This subsection of the bill is not applicable to specific sections of the Equal Access to Justice Act, to certain tax cases or where it would result in undue hardship to the party.

Due to the protracted nature of some litigation, a claim may be rendered moot by State or Federal legislation enacted prior to judicial resolution of the conflict. Under existing case law such a turn of events would not preclude a recovery of attorneys' fees where a court determined that the case was a catalyst for the legislative change. See, e.g., Maher v. Gagne, 448 U.S. 122 (1980). This judicial doctrine, however, involves the courts in the rather difficult and unpredictable process of determining that a particular court action was the catalyst for a legislative enactment. As my colleagues understand, legislators rarely have the same things in mind when voting for a particular bill. A judicial inquiry into legislative motives is difficult at best. The Legal Fees Equity Act provides a standard for determining when a case provides such a catalyst by requiring that the litigation be a "material factor" in the legislative change. This provision would permit legislators and other State officials to proceed with policy changes without fear of incurring costly litigation expenses because some pending suit peripherally relates to their actions.

Finally, the bill contains several other provisions for timely application and uniform procedures to be followed in seeking recovery of attorney fees. The provisions of this bill would apply to all cases commenced subsequent to enactment as well as to those commenced prior to enactment respecting that amount of the attorney fees and expenses incurred following the date of enactment.

Mr. President, the sparsity of guidance given by the terse language of the myriad fee-shifting statutes is perhaps itself sufficient evidence that some clear standards are necessary to govern the award of attorney fees. Moreover the need to provide greater balance between the attorney fees policies applicable to lawyers representing indigent criminal defendants and those applicable to lawyers who sue governments civilly argues for the Legal Fees Equity Act.

Along with a copy of the Legal Fees Equity Act, I ask that the report of the National Association of Attorneys General, and the Washington Post editorial from December 16, 1983 be included in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Report to Congress—From the National Association of Attorneys General]

CIVIL RIGHTS ATTORNEY'S FEES AWARDS ACT OF 1976

FOREWORD

. . . [O]ne of the least socially productive types of litigation imaginable [is] appeals from awards of attorney's fees . . .

Ultimately, § 1988's straightforward command is replaced by a vast body of artificial, judge-made doctrine, with its own arcane procedures, which like a Frankenstein's monster meanders its well-intentioned way through the legal landscape leaving waste and confusion (not to mention circuit-splits) in its wake.

Hensley v. Eckerhart, 103 S. Ct. 1933, 1944, 1951 (1983) (Brennan, Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

The only truly consistent thread that runs through federal court decisions on attorney's fees is their lack of consistency.

[I]nordinately high fee awards in some cases, and the absence of a coherent rationale for justifiably large awards in other cases, have lent support to the sentiments of the Italian proverb that "a lawsuit is a fruit tree planted in a lawyer's garden."

Berger, Court Awarded Attorney's Fees: What is "Reasonable"?, 126 Pa. L. Rev. 281, 292 (1977).

As the foregoing comments suggest, courts and commentators alike have become critical of attorney's fees litigation. Since passage of the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act of 1976, one constant voice expressing concern has been that of the National Association of Attorneys General, which has continuously monitored the implementation and effect of the Act. On the basis of its collective experience, the Association has become increasingly concerned that the Act, as interpreted and applied by the courts, is operating contrary to its original purpose. Rather than simply facilitating access to the courts for disadvantaged victims of civil rights violations, a purpose that the Association wholeheartedly endorses, the Act has had the unintended effects of encouraging frivolous noncivil rights claims, deterring settlement of meritorious claims, awarding fees to plaintiffs who do not actually prevail, conferring unreasonable "windfall" fees on plaintiffs' counsel, draining public treasuries, and fostering an avalanche of litigation on attorney's fees that threatens to bury the underlying civil rights claims that the Act was intended to vindicate.

In this report, the Association outlines and documents these adverse and unintended applications of the Act and recommends the enactment of statutory standards that would restore the Act to its original purpose, provide needed guidance to the courts and the bar, and mitigate the possibility of abuse. In particular, the Association recommends that the Act be amended to apply solely to true civil rights cases; to define "prevailing party" in a realistic manner; to restore and guide judicial discretion to award or deny fees; to provide workable standards for computing a "reasonable" fee; to impose a ceiling on the hourly rates at which attorneys may be compensated; to prohibit the award of "bonuses" in excess of reasonable compensation for time reasonably spent by prevailing counsel; and to provide additional incentives for settlement.

This report begins with an outline of the Association's findings and recommendations, which is followed by a discussion and analysis of the basis for each finding and recommendation. After documenting the magnitude of the problem created by the lack of coherent and workable standards (Finding and Recommendation No. 1), the report makes specific findings and recommendations concerning the scope of the Act (Finding and Recommendation No. 2), the standard for determining a party's eligibility for fees (Findings and Recommendations Nos. 3, 4, and 5), and the standard for calculating a "reasonable" attorney's fee (Findings and Recommendations Nos. 6, 7, and 8). Finally, the report discusses the adverse impact of the Act on the process of dispute resolution both in and out of court, and recommends how that problem could be alleviated by legislative reform (Finding and Recommendation No. 9).

The various recommendations contained in this report are not intended to discourage or inhibit victims of civil rights violations from redressing their grievances through litigation. Rather, the intent of these recommendations is to turn the focus of civil rights litigation away from fee disputes and return it to the aggrieved parties whose rights the Act was intended to vindicate. This report does not take issue with the Congressional determination that a public entity that violates a person's civil rights should be burdened with having to pay attorney's fees necessary to prove such a violation. However, the process for awarding fees, the amounts of fees awarded, and the underlying claims must be viewed in light of the purposes of the original Act. As indicated by the findings contained in this report, the Act is operating contrary to its original purposes. Legislative action, along the lines recommended in this report, is urgently needed.

RESOLUTION

In plenary session on June 25, 1983, the Association adopted the following resolution:

Whereas, litigation under the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act of 1976, 42 U.S.C. § 1988, is expanding at an alarming rate with further expansion in the future a near certainty; and

Whereas, lack of meaningful standards to determine what is a "reasonable" attorney's fee in any given case consistently results in exorbitant court-ordered fee awards paid from public treasuries of state and local governments and creates additional problems for public defendants; and

Whereas, cases decided under the Fees Act frequently involve the characterization of parties as "prevailing" for purposes of collateral attorney's fees requests when, in fact, they have not prevailed in any meaningful sense on the merits of their claim; and

Whereas, the reported Fees Act opinions so narrowly circumscribe the ability of lower courts to determine when special circumstances exist that justify outright denial of requested fees that the discretion expressly contemplated by the Fees Act itself can rarely be exercised at all; and

Whereas, a special subcommittee chaired by Attorney General Kenneth Eikenberry has studied abuses under 42 U.S.C. § 1988 and has compiled its findings into [this] Report;

Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the National Association of Attorneys General:

1. Urges the Congress to adopt legislation that will eliminate these and other related problems that have resulted from abuses under 42 U.S.C. § 1988;

2. Commends Attorney General Eikenberry and members of the Subcommittee for the diligent work on this matter and adopts the Report as part of the Association's policy position; and

3. Authorizes its General Counsel to transmit these views to the appropriate members of the Administration and Congress.

INTRODUCTION

A. Purpose of the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Award Act

The Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act of 1976 was passed in direct response to the Supreme Court's decision in Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. v. Wilderness Society, 421 U.S. 240 (1975), which held that federal courts do not have the power to award attorney's fees to a prevailing party without express statutory authorization.[1] Prior to Alyeska, federal courts had been awarding attorney's fees to the prevailing party in civil rights cases on the theory that, in bringing such cases, plaintiffs serve in the capacity of "private attorneys general," seeking to vindicate constitutional rights, not for themselves alone, but also for the benefit of others similarly situated. By holding that the federal courts lack authority to award fees under such circumstances, Alyeska "created anomalous gaps in our civil rights laws," which the Act was intended to fill.[2]

The Act was thus intended to remove financial barriers that would otherwise prevent access to the courts by disadvantaged plaintiffs acting in the role of private attorneys general, by affording successful civil rights plaintiffs "the opportunity to recover what it costs them to vindicate these rights in court." [3] Such a measure was viewed as desirable in order to enforce "major civil rights laws," [4] protecting the most "basic" and "fundamental" civil rights.[5]

As a "narrowly drawn" response to Alyeska,[6] the Act was not intended as a wholesale abrogation of the "American Rule" that each party must bear its own litigation costs. Rather, it was viewed by its proponents as "only a first step and a rather limited and cautious one." [7] The proponents of the Act repeatedly emphasized its limited purpose by reiterating that the Act was not intended to "aid [ ] lawyers," [8] encourage meritless litigation,[9] or provide "windfalls" to prevailing counsel.[10] Rather, Congress stressed the Act's relatively moderate approach of authorizing courts, in their discretion, to award a "reasonable" attorney's fee to prevailing parties in certain civil rights cases, in contrast to that of more liberal statutes providing for mandatory fee awards or awards to nonprevailing parties.[11]

B. Good intentions gone away: A need for legislative action

As will be shown in this report, the good intentions of Congress outlined above have not been realized. Rather than simply facilitate the vindication of meritorious civil rights claims, as Congress intended, the Act has operated to foster a flood of litigation on the entitlement to and amount of attorney's fees. Rarely has a federal statute had the immediate and explosive impact on litigation involving state officials as has this Act. Particularly after Maine v. Thiboutot, 488 U.S. 1 (1980),[12] it has become routine for all governmental litigation—from the most complex class actions for institutional reform to the most commonplace complaints for state judicial review of administrative decisions—to include requests for attorney's fees under the Act. Not surprisingly, the soaring number of attorney's fees claims is reflected in the burgeoning amount of litigation engendered by the Act itself.

These developments are both undesirable and unnecessary. One can hardly conceive of a less socially valuable use of resources than fees litigation.[13] State and federal taxpayers are now routinely subjected to the spectacle of publicly-funded counsel making claims for fees to be paid by publicly-funded agencies, defended by publicly-funded attorneys general, and decided by publicly-funded courts. While no single participant in these exercises is exclusively responsible, it is the Association's firm belief that the lack of statutory standards governing the application for and adjudication of fee awards has unnecessarily encouraged unreasonably high requests, stymied settlement efforts, forced these matters into litigation, and permitted inconsistent, excessive, and ever-escalating fee awards. This chain of events has caused an outcry by the bench, the bar, and the tax-paying public for legislative reform.

The Association therefore urges the Congress to enact clear standards of eligibility for and computation of fee awards under the Act, in accordance with the recommendations contained in this report. Provision for such standards would render the application of the Act more consistent and, hence, more reasonable, to the mutual benefit of civil rights plaintiffs, state taxpayers, and the judiciary. Greater certainty would promote settlement, reduce fee litigation, and thereby permit counsel and the courts to devote more attention to substantive matters.

Footnotes at end of article.

The Association wishes to emphasize that it endorses the salutary purpose of the Act and is committed to the Act's concept of reasonable fees to prevailing parties in civil rights cases. The recommendations contained in this report are intended to further the Act's original purpose while eliminating its unintended and undesirable side-effects.

FINDINGS OF THE ASSOCIATION

Finding No. 1: Litigation under the Fees Act is expanding at an alarming rate with further expansion in the future a near certainty.

Finding No. 2: The Act, as interpreted and applied by the courts, makes attorney's fees available not only in civil rights cases but in virtually all cases against state and local governments or officials.

Finding No. 3: Cases decided under the Fees Act frequently involve the characterization of parties as "prevailing" for purposes of attorney's fees awards when, in fact, they have not prevailed, in any meaningful sense, on the merits of their claims.

Finding No. 4: In cases where the requesting party has, in fact, prevailed to some extent, attorney's fees awards under the Act are frequently disproportionate to the degree of success actually achieved.

Finding No. 5: The Fees Act, as interpreted and applied by the courts, makes the award of fees to a prevailing party virtually mandatory, thereby eliminating the "discretion" expressly granted to the courts by the Act.

Finding No. 6: Lack of meaningful standards for determining what constitutes a "reasonable" attorney's fee in any given case results in inconsistent and often excessive fee awards and makes it difficult to settle claims for attorney's fees.

Finding No. 7: Courts routinely make "bonus" awards or apply "multipliers" to the hourly rates set for prevailing counsel, resulting in grossly inflated awards constituting a "windfall" to prevailing counsel.

Finding No. 8: In applying the Fees Act to prevailing parties represented by publicly-funded salaried attorneys, courts normally award fees based on hourly rates charged by private counsel, resulting in windfalls that substantially exceed the actual cost of the litigation.

Finding No. 9: The Fees Act affects the process of legal dispute resolution in a way that is unfair to public defendants and that further burdens the courts by:

A. making it more desirable for plaintiffs to commence litigation, rather than settle disputes informally;

B. making it more advantageous for plaintiffs to continue litigation rather than settle where any meritorious claim is presented;

C. making it less desirable, once litigation is underway, for public defendants to alter challenged laws, administrative regulations, or official positions in any way that favors the plaintiffs;

D. making it less desirable for public defendants to litigate those close issues that should be litigated; and

E. making it difficult for plaintiffs and defendants to settle claims for attorney's fees.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE ASSOCIATION

Recommendation No. 1: The Congress should amend the Act, as specified in the further recommendations enumerated hereunder, to provide clear and precise standards governing eligibility for and computation of attorney's fees awards under the Act.

Recommendation No. 2: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to apply only to civil actions to redress the deprivation, under color of any state law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage, of any right secured by a provision of the Constitution of the United States or an Act of Congress providing for individual civil rights of citizens or of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Recommendation No. 3: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to require that, in order to be eligible for a fee award, a party must clearly and substantially prevail on the merits of each issue or claim as to which fees are being sought.

Recommendation No. 4: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to require that courts apportion the amount of fee awards to the degree of success actually attained by the prevailing party.

Recommendation No. 5: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to provide expressly that a court may deny fees where, in the court's view, denial is appropriate, including, but not limited to, cases in which the court determines:

A. that the defendant's position was substantially justified or advanced in good faith; or

B. that an award of fees would not further the substantive purposes of the Act.

Recommendation No. 6: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to provide that the prevailing party shall not be awarded fees in excess of $75 per hour.

Recommendation No. 7: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to prohibit the award of bonuses or multipliers in excess of compensation at a reasonable hourly rate for the number of hours reasonably spent by prevailing counsel.

Recommendation No. 8: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to provide that, where the prevailing party is represented by a publicly-funded legal services organization, courts should compute a reasonable hourly rate for such counsel based on the actual costs of the litigation to the organization, including the proportion of the attorney's annual salary and of the organization's annual overhead attributable to the number of hours reasonably spent on the case.

Recommendation No. 9: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to provide that the court shall deny attorney's fees to a prevailing party, where it determines:

A. that the lawsuit was brought principally for the purpose of obtaining attorney's fees; or

B. that the prevailing party rejected an offer of judgment made pursuant to Rule 68 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or a cognate state rule of procedure, that was more favorable than the relief ultimately granted by the court, in which case no fees shall be awarded for the services rendered after the date of the offer.

DISCUSSION OF FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Finding No. 1: Litigation under the Fees Act is expanding at an alarming rate with further expansion in the future a near certainty.

Since the inception of the Act in 1976, litigation on eligibility for and computation of attorney's fees has mushroomed. The number of reported cases involving attorney's fees is tremendous. West's annotations to 42 U.S.C. § 1988 now fill 179 closely printed pages.[14] A computer search for cases arising under § 1988 revealed almost 3,000 federal and state decisions as of December 1983. The advance sheets routinely report numerous attorney's fees cases each week; and the Supreme Court decides fee cases every term, while declining to review many more. Indeed, in just one month in 1980, the Court rendered six major attorney's fees decisions.[15]

This explosion of fee litigation has engendered numerous law review articles,[16] and several treatises on the subject,[17] as well as a bi-monthly newsletter designed to keep attorneys apprised of current developments in the area of attorney's fees.[18] As noted by Lloyd Cutler,[19] in his Foreword to a recent three-volume treatise on court-awarded attorney's fees, this Act and other similar fee-shifting statutes "have created a new field of law that has grown so fast and become so complex that it has baffled the efforts of courts and lawyers to comprehend and apply it."

The vast amount of litigation on attorney's fees has led the courts to complain that "the fee proceedings have become the main event rather than the side show" such that "the [attorney's fees] tail is wagging the [civil rights] dogs."[20] The Supreme Court has added its voice to this mournful chorus, recently stating that "a request for attorney's fees should not result in a second major litigation."[21] Other concurring and dissenting justices in the same case characterized fee litigation as "one of the least socially productive types of litigation imaginable" and bemoaned the fact that "[s]uch appeals [from fee awards], which greatly increase the costs to plaintiffs of vindicating their rights, frustrate the purposes of § 1988."[22] Those justices went on to state that:

Congress enacted § 1988 . . . not to spawn litigation, however interesting, over [attorney's fees]. . . . In systemic terms, attorney's fees appeals take up lawyers' and judges' time that could more profitably be devoted to other cases, including the substantive civil rights claims that § 1988 was meant to facilitate.

Ultimately, § 1988's straightforward command is replaced by a vast body of artificial, judge-made doctrine, with its own arcane procedures, which like a Frankenstein's monster meanders its well-intentioned way through the legal landscape leaving waste and confusion (not to mention circuit-splits) in its wake.[23]

As the above quotation indicates, the flood of litigation under § 1988 has done little to resolve the many questions arising from its implementation. Very few hard and fast rules have developed, and conflicts exist not only among circuits but often among the district courts or panels of a single circuit.[24] As a result of this continuing confusion, litigation in this area will undoubtedly continue to expand. For example, as indicated by the numerous lower-court majority and dissenting opinions citing or "explaining" Hensley v. Eckerhart,[25] the Supreme Court's latest "pronouncement" on § 1988, that case, like many of its predecessors, has apparently raised as many questions as it has answered.

Apparently, the confusion over the proper interpretation and application of § 1988 can be resolved only by the Congress. As noted by one commentator,

Because [fee-shifting] is contrary to two hundred years of experience in American federal courts, the cases have been difficult for lawyers and judges alike. Understanding has not been materially helped by Congress which has frequently passed attorney fee provisions with . . . only minimal or inconsistent direction how the measures are to be interpreted and applied.

Derfner & Wolf, supra at ix. Only by setting clear statutory standards for the application of the Act can the rising tide of needless litigation be stemmed.

Recommendation No. 1: The Congress should amend the Act, as specified in the further recommendations enumerated hereunder, to provide clear and precise standards governing eligibility for and computation of attorney's fees awards under the Act.

Finding No. 2: The Act, as interpreted and applied by the courts, makes attorney's fees available not only in civil rights cases but in virtually all cases against state and local governments or officials.

The proponents of § 1988 touted the Act, as its name implies, as a measure designed to protect "basic" and "fundamental" civil rights by encouraging private enforcement of our "major civil rights laws," including § 1983.[26] Although there is strong evidence that Congress viewed § 1988 as a civil rights measure,[27] the Supreme Court subsequently held in Maine v. Thiboutot that fees are available not only in civil rights cases but in any action under § 1983, which the Court construed to include cases arising under any federal statute or constitutional provision.[28] In response to the state's argument that such a construction is contrary to legislative intent, the Court suggested that "[t]hat argument . . . can best be addressed to Congress, which, it is important to note, has remained quiet in the face of our many pronouncements on the scope of § 1983." [29] In his dissenting opinion in Maine v. Thiboutot, Justice Powell predicted that the Court's decision would "dramatically expand the liability of state and local officials and may virtually eliminate the 'American Rule' in suits against those officials." In Justice Powell's prescient view, the [P]ractical effect [of the majority opinion] means that state and local governments, officers and employees now face liability whenever a person believes that he has been injured by the administration of any federal-state cooperative program, whether or not that program is related to equal or civil rights.

. . . [I]ngenious pleaders may find ways to recover attorney's fees in almost any suit against a state defendant.[30]

Even at that time, Justice Powell observed that "[t]here is some evidence that § 1983 claims already are being appended to complaints solely for the purpose of obtaining fees in actions where 'civil rights' of any kind are at best an afterthought." [31]

Unfortunately for state governments and their taxpayers, Justice Powell's prediction has now become a painful and expensive reality. Fees are now routinely sought and awarded in even the most routine state court reviews of administrative agency decisions, having little or no bearing on civil or equal rights. For example, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts ruled that a plaintiff who succeeded in obtaining a reversal of an administrative decision, thereby obtaining $250 toward the purchase of a washing machine, was entitled to attorney's fees under § 1988. The court reasoned that since the plaintiff's complaint contained a claim, not reached by the court, that the regulation in question violated the Equal Protection Clause of the United States Constitution (by discriminating between those who have broken-down washing machines and those who have none), a claim which the court viewed as "substantial," the action was one to enforce the provisions of § 1983, thereby invoking the fee-shifting provisions of § 1988.[32]

The Stratos case illustrates another related problem that has arisen under § 1988. Relying on statements in the legislative history of the Act that, in cases containing both § 1983 and non-§ 1983 claims, if the § 1983 claim meets the "substantiality" test articulated in Hagans v. Lavine, 415 U.S. 528 (1974), then attorney's fees may be allowed even though the court declines to enter judgment for the plaintiff on that claim,[33] courts have often awarded fees where the § 1983 claim is weak, but not "obviously frivolous," "absolutely devoid of merit," or "wholly insubstantial." [34] As noted by Justice Rehnquist in his dissenting opinion in Hagans, the substantially test is met whenever the "plaintiff is able to plead his claim with a straight face." [35] The effect of that test is therefore to stand the concept of federalism on its head by "federalizing" nearly all claims against state or local officials.[36]

The application of the substantiality test to § 1988 means that plaintiffs can recover fees under § 1988, even when they lose on their federal civil rights claims. For example, in Seals v. Quarterly County Court, 562 F.2d 390 (6th Cir. 1977), the district court had ruled in plaintiff's favor on state law grounds but had ruled against him on his § 1983 claim. Nevertheless, the Sixth Circuit held that plaintiff was entitled to fees under § 1988, since his claim under § 1983 was "substantial."

Clearly, in enacting § 1988, Congress did not intend to encourage litigants to pad their meritorious state law complaints with weak or meritless civil rights claims, in order to obtain fees under § 1988. Yet, that is the net effect of the case law discussed above. Congress must therefore act to clarify its original intent that § 1988 be used to enforce our most basic and fundamental civil rights. The Association is concerned that the statute not be revised so as to impair individuals seeking full redress for violations of their civil or equal rights. However, the Association believes that a restoration of the scope of the Act to pre-Thiboutot coverage is necessary.

In so acting, Congress will be able to answer a number of nagging questions concerning the proper scope of the statute: should it apply to cases brought by corporations or other business entities? Should it apply to all cases raising constitutional questions? One case that raises these questions and has already sparked considerable public criticism is Grendel's Den v. Larkin, No. 77-3418-T (D. Mass.). In that case, Harvard Law School Professor Lawrence Tribe is seeking almost $350,000 in attorney's fees and costs for his successful efforts to obtain a liquor license for a restaurant in Harvard Square. Although the Supreme Court's decision on the merits of that case was based on the Due Process and Establishment Clauses of the United States Constitution, it is unlikely that this liquor license matter is the type of case that Congress had in mind when it enacted § 1988 as a means of protecting disadvantaged victims from violations of their most basic human rights.[37]

Recommendation No. 2: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to apply only to civil actions to redress the deprivation, under color of any state law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage, of any right secured by a provision of the Constitution of the United States or an Act of Congress providing for individual civil rights of citizens or of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Finding No. 3: Cases decided under the Fees Act frequently involve the characterization of parties as "prevailing" for purposes of attorney's fees awards when, in fact, they have not prevailed, in any meaningful sense, on the merits of their claims.

Although the Act expressly provides that only a "prevailing" party may be awarded fees, the application of this provision by the courts to cases where parties have not prevailed in any meaningful sense has effectively eliminated the prevailing party requirement, contrary to the express language of the statute and the underlying Congressional intent. In numerous cases where judgment was rendered for the defendant, courts have nevertheless viewed the plaintiff as a prevailing party for purposes of § 1988 fee awards. For example, in NAACP v. Wilmington Medical Center, Inc., 689 F.2d 1161 (3rd Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 1499 (1983), the district court dismissed plaintiffs' claims against the state and federal defendants and, after trial, held that plaintiffs had failed to prove discrimination by the Wilmington Medical Center and accordingly entered judgment for the defendants and denied plaintiffs' request for fees. On appeal, the Third Circuit reversed the denial of fees, stating that "[t]he fact that a judgment was ultimately entered in favor of [the defendant] does not make the plaintiffs any less the prevailing party.[38] The court ruled that plaintiffs had "prevailed" since they had obtained "some of the benefits sought by the litigation," even though the actual "benefits" obtained, by means of an agreement between the state and federal defendants, had been vigorously but unsuccessfully opposed by the plaintiffs in the litigation.[39]

Similarly, in Dayan v. Board of Regents, 620 F.2d 107 (5th Cir. 1980), the Fifth Circuit affirmed the district court's ruling for the defendant on the merits, that the defendant's "rational procedural policy violates neither the First Amendment nor the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution," yet also affirmed an award of fees to the plaintiffs on the ground that they had obtained "substantial voluntary relief as a direct result of their lawsuit."[40] Another example of an award of fees to a losing party appears in Ross v. Horn, 598 F.2d 1312 (3rd Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 448 U.S. 906 (1980), in which the appellate court remanded the case for a redetermination of plaintiffs' eligibility for fees while, at the same time, affirming the district court's holding that the procedures employed by the defendant in processing suspected unemployment fraud cases adequately protected plaintiffs' statutory and constitutional due process rights.

In a number of cases, plaintiffs have been awarded fees where the benefits sought in their complaint were obtained by legislative action before a final judicial decision could be rendered on the merits. For example, in DeMier v. Gondles, 676 F.2d 92 (4th Cir. 1982), plaintiffs who voluntarily dismissed their claim after the state legislature enacted a statute that achieved the object of the suit were awarded fees, even though other complaints may have contributed to the change in policy.[41]

A striking example of the inequities that can result is Institutionalized Juveniles v. Secretary of Public Welfare, 568 F. Supp. 1020 (E.D. Pa. 1983). There, defendants had prevailed in the United States Supreme Court on what the District Court recognized were the central issues of the case. Secretary of Public Welfare v. Institutionalized Juveniles, 442 U.S. 640 (1979). Nonetheless, the District Court awarded almost $90,000 in fees, including a 50 percent multiplier, based on its view that various regulatory and statutory changes during the period of litigation provided some of the plaintiffs with some of the benefits they sought. An appeal is pending.

Although the legislative history of § 1988 indicates that the term "prevailing party" is to be read broadly to include cases that end in a consent decree or out-of-court settlement, "none of the cases cited in the House or Senate Reports involves a fee award in the context of such a remote and extra-judicial resolution of a lawsuit as legislative preemption."[42] Furthermore, even if such a result had been intended by the enactors of § 1988, the problems involved in determining whether and to what extent a particular lawsuit acted as a "catalyst" for legislative change, make the application of the "prevailing party" standard to cases mooted by legislative action judicially unworkable. Since legislators act from multifarious motives, it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine the impact, of a particular lawsuit on a legislative body as a whole.[43] Moreover, as recognized by one court, even attempting to make such a determination "might constitute an impermissible inquiry into legislative motive."[44]

Cases resolved by settlement present similar problems. For example, in Young v. Kenley, 641 F.2d 192 (4th Cir. 1981), the Fourth Circuit reversed a denial of attorney's fees to a plaintiff who alleged discrimination in the denial of a position for which she had never even applied. Once plaintiff applied for the position, after being urged to do so by the defendants and the district court, she passed the required test and was given the position in question, and the case was settled on that basis. Over the strong dissent of Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justice O'Connor, the Supreme Court denied a petition for a writ of certiorari on the prevailing party issue.[45] In his dissent from the denial of certiorari, Justice Rehnquist suggested that an award of fees in such circumstances "seems largely to disregard th[e] central purpose of § 1988 [—] * * * to 'enforce' the civil rights laws or to * * * promote[] their policies for the benefit of the public at large," and indicated that fees should not be awarded "if the discernible benefit was conferred gratuitously by the defendant or was taken simply to avoid further litigation expenses."[46] Nevertheless, on remand, the district court ultimately awarded fees in an amount exceeding $30,000.

Thus although Congress stressed that § 1988, unlike other more liberal fee provisions, was intended to apply only where a party has "prevailed,"[47] that intent has been undercut by subsequent court decisions construing the term "prevailing" so broadly as to include cases where the party awarded fees has actually lost the case on the merits or failed to succeed in any meaningful sense. Congress must therefore reassert its initial intent in a manner that will prevent such perversions of the statute's seemingly straightforward prevailing party requirement.

Recommendation No. 3: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to require that, in order to be eligible for a fee award, a party must clearly and substantially prevail on the merits of each issue or claim as to which fees are being sought.

Finding No. 4: In cases where the requesting party has, in fact, prevailed to some extent, attorney's fees awards under the Act are frequently disproportionate to the degree of success actually achieved.

In many cases, large amounts of fees have been awarded, despite the fact that the plaintiff received only nominal relief on the merits. For example, in Skoda v. Fontani, 646 F.2d 1193, 1194 (7th Cir. 1981), the court held that plaintiffs, who won a jury verdict of only one dollar on their civil rights claim, for which they had claimed $200,000 in damages, were "prevailing parties," contrary to the district court's conclusion. On remand, the district court reluctantly awarded plaintiffs $6,086.12 in fees and costs.[48] Similarly, in Milwe v. Cavuoto, 653 F.2d 80, 83–84 (2d Cir. 1981), the court held that "the one dollar assessed against [the defendant] on plaintiff's constitutional claim would be sufficient to support an award of fees under the Act."

Another case in which the amount of fees awarded was grossly disproportionate to the degree of success on the merits in Rivera v. City of Riverside, 679 F.2d (9th Cir. 1982), in which the Ninth Circuit found no abuse of discretion in the district court's award of $243,343.75 in fees incurred in obtaining a jury verdict of $33,350. An even more extreme example of a court's failure to proportion a fee award to the degree of success obtained is the decision reached in Haygood v. Younger, No. S–75–738LKK (E.D. Cal. 1983), a case in which plaintiff alleged illegal confinement in a state prison. The complaint named sixteen defendants and alleged nineteen separate causes of action. After five years of pre-trial proceedings, eleven defendants were dismissed or granted summary judgment, and seventeen causes of action were dismissed. Three defendants were granted a directed verdict after the plaintiff's case in chief. The jury returned a verdict of $640 against one of the remaining defendants and $1,450 against the other. The plaintiff then sought $75,968.75 in attorney's fees. Included was a demand for $17,831.25 in "paralegal fees" for assistance claimed to have been provided by the plaintiff's inmate advisor. The defedants' request for discovery and for an evidentiary hearing to contest the fee request were both denied by the court. The court then awarded $45,383.17 in attorney's fees, including $9,900 in paralegal fees for the inmate advisor. The award was apparently reduced from the amount originally requested only because counsel's representation had been of poor quality and the hours claimed had been "padded."

The effect of such decisions is to encourage civil rights plaintiffs to pad their complaints with multiple, meritless claims, "secure in the knowledge that any tactic reasonably related to his cause will be compensable."[49] Not only is the "penalty" incurred by the defendant in such cases disproportionate to the jury inflicted, but such results also operate to the disadvantage of plaintiffs (as opposed to their counsel). Plaintiff's counsel, who can expect to be compensated for time spend on all claims, if he prevails to any extent, has no incentive to settle a case in the early stages of litigation, but rather is encouraged to litigate every claim to the maximum extent. Aggrieved plaintiffs are thereby deprived of the benefit of an early settlement, and courts, as well, are subjected to congested dockets.[50]

The Supreme Court's recent decision in Hensley v. Eckerhart, 103 S. Ct. 1933 (1983), directing the lower court to reconsider the amount of its fee award in light of the extent of success achieved by the plaintiffs, is a step in the right direction, but it will not resolve all of the problems discussed above and may raise additional ones. For example, it remains to be seen how the lower courts will resolve the apparent contradiction between the Court's directive that, in cases where plaintiffs only partially succeed, the "results obtained" may warrant a downward adjustment in the amount of fees awarded,[51] with its caveat that "[w]here a plaintiff has obtained excellent results . . . the fee award should not be reduced simply because the plaintiff failed to prevail on every contention raised in the lawsuit."[52] Rather than "clarify the proper relationship of the results obtained to an award of attorney's fees," as the Hensley case purports to do,[53] it will undoubtedly generate further litigation on what constitutes an "unrelated claim" or "excellent results."[54] As stated by Justice Brennan in his concurring and dissenting opinion in Hensley, "Regular appellate scrutiny of issues like those in this case . . . generates a steady stream of opinions, each requiring yet another to harmonize it with the one before or the one after."[55] Indeed, in post-Hensley cases in the lower courts, Hensley is relied upon by fee applicants and opponents alike and is cited in both majority and dissenting opinions,[56] indicating that additional legislative guidance is needed on the propriety of apportioning the amount of fees awarded to the degree of success attained by the prevailing party.

Recommendation No. 4: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to require that courts apportion the amount of fee awards to the degree of success actually attained by the prevailing party.

Finding No. 5: The Fees Act, as interpreted and applied by the courts, makes the award of fees to a prevailing party virtually mandatory, thereby eliminating the "discretion" expressly granted to the courts by the Act.

The proponents of the Fees Act emphasized the discretionary nature of the Act, which expressly provides that "the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party . . . a reasonable attorney's fee" (emphasis added), and contrasted that Act with other statutes requiring that fees be awarded to a prevailing party.[57] However, the Senate Report suggested that, in exercising their discretion, courts should apply the standard articulated by the Supreme Court in Newman v. Piggie Park Enterprises, Inc., 390 U.S. 400, 402 (1968), i.e., that a prevailing party "should ordinarily recover an attorney's fee unless special circumstances would render such an award unjust."

That standard, which has become known as the Newman standard, "was initially used by the courts to explain or justify the mandatory imposition of fees."[58] Application of such a standard is appropriate where the purpose of the fee provision is "to encourage suit or to provide an incentive to litigate,"[59] not where the provision in question was enacted "mainly for the purpose of preventing the cost of litigation from deterring a suit."[60] Since the purpose of § 1988, as articulated by its proponents, was not to encourage litigation, but rather "to insure the high cost of litigation does not bar the federal court to citizens who seek to enforce their rights under our civil rights laws,"[61] the rationale underlying the Newman standard is inapplicable to § 1988.

Despite the incompatibility of the Newman standard with the overall purpose of the Act, and although Congress chose not to use the Newman language in § 1988,[62] most courts, in reliance on the Senate

Report, interpret § 1988 in a manner contrary to its express language.[63]

The practical effect of the application of the Newman standard to § 1988 is to make the award of fees to a prevailing party mandatory, since courts have rejected virtually every "special circumstance" proferred by defendants as a justification for denying fees.[64] Among the special circumstances that have been rejected by appellate courts as rendering an award of fees unjust are defendants' good faith,[65] defendants' reliance on previous court orders or government regulations,[66] that defendants' refusal to expend funds was based on lack of legislative appropriation,[67] that defendants were compelled by law to engage in the challenged conduct,[68] that plaintiff received only nominal damages,[69] that the fee award would be paid by a public entity and would thereby impair that entity's ability to provide further services,[70] that plaintiffs were able to afford counsel,[71] that plaintiffs refused to settle,[72] and that the suit did little or nothing to further civil rights.[73] Even the fact that the plaintiff committed perjury during trial has been rejected as a special circumstance justifying a denial of fees.[74]

As a result, one judge has described the application of the special circumstances exception by the courts as

[R]ender[ing] [the exception] in effect a nullity. This interpretation is reminiscent of the passage wherein Macbeth remarked, "Life is but a walking shadow; . . . a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."[75]

Moreover, where fees are awarded despite the fact that, for example, the defendant acted in good faith, the plaintiff obtained only nominal damages, and the action did nothing to further civil rights, "a question arises as to what goals of the Attorney's Fees Act, if any, are being furthered."[76] In such cases, "the only true victor may be the plaintiff's attorney."[77]

Furthermore, given the prospect of a mandatory fee award if he prevails, plaintiff's counsel has no incentive to enter into a pretrial settlement. The more time he spends on the case, the higher his potential fee award. The motivation to proceed to trial is therefore enhanced, and the incentive to settle, diminished.[78]

Therefore, in order to restore the judicial discretion expressly intended by the Act, but virtually eliminated in its application, Congress should amend the Act to specify circumstances in which the courts' discretion may be exercised to deny fees. Such an amendment would not only further the original purpose of the Act, but would also be consistent with the standard applicable to fee awards against federal defendants under the Equal Access to Justice Act, which expressly provides that fees are not to be awarded when the government has demonstrated a substantial justification for its position.[79] Since the purpose of the Equal Access to Justice Act, as set forth in its legislative history,[80] is parallel to that of the Fees Act, there is no reason why state and local defendants should not share the protection, enjoyed by federal defendants under the Equal Access to Justice Act, from the imposition of unjust awards of attorney's fees.

Recommendation No. 5: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to expressly provide that a court may deny fees where, in the court's view, denial is appropriate, including, but not limited to, cases in which the court determines;

A. that the defendant's position was substantially justified or advanced in good faith; or

B. that an award of fees would not further the substantive purposes of the Act.

Finding No. 6: Lack of meaningful standards for determining what constitutes a "reasonable" attorney's fee in any given case results in inconsistent and often excessive fee awards and makes it difficult to settle claims for attorney's fees.

At the time Congress enacted the Fees Act, the pertinent House and Senate Reports indicated that the appropriate standards for determining what constitutes a reasonable fee are those contained in Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, 488 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1974).[81] Both the House and Senate reports expressed confidence that the application of those standards would "result[] in fees which are adequate to attract competent counsel, but which do not produce windfalls to attorneys."[82]

That hope has not been realized. As early as 1977, one commentator noted that "[t]he only truly consistent thread that runs throughout federal court decisions on attorney's fees is their lack of consistency."[83] The situation is no better today. Some courts, finding the Johnson criteria too subjective and imprecise, have applied different approaches to computing a reasonable fee, most notably the lodestar approach, first articulated in Lindy Brothers Builders, Inc. v. American Radiator & Standard Sanitary Corps., 487 F.2d 161 (3rd Cir. 1973) (Lindy I), in which a reasonable hourly rate is multiplied by the number of hours reasonably spent to produce a lodestar figure, which may then be adjusted upward and downward depending on additional factors not applied in determining reasonable hours and rates.[84] Still other courts have adopted a hybrid approach, combining the lodestar method with the Johnson criteria.[85] With different approaches being applied by different circuits and even by various courts within each circuit, parties litigating cases under § 1988 are subject to different approaches and, hence, different results. Courts disagree on what factors should be applied, how they should be applied, and even what they mean. Opposite holdings have been made on virtually every aspect of fee computation.[86] As a result, in cases decided between 1974 and 1979, hourly rates awarded to civil rights attorneys varied by 685 percent.[87]

As noted by one commentator, the adverse effects of this confusion are several:

First, it inevitably results in unfairness to both attorneys and litigants. . . .

A second consequence of the chaotic state of the law is an excessive amount of litigation concerning the proper fee amount. . . .[88]

A third consequence of the existing state of the law is the arbitrary and haphazard allocation of legal resources . . .

Finally, the high degree of subjectivity involved in most fee decisions is unhealthy for both the legal profession and for the conduct of litigation . . .[89]

Although, "[i]deally, . . . litigants will settle the amount of a fee,"[90] this "ideal" cannot be realized where the parties have no way of estimating how much a court would award in a particular case.

Finally, the most significant adverse effect of the various methods presently employed to calculate the amount of fee awards under the Act is that the awards generated by the application of those methods cannot be characterized as "reasonable," in any conceivable sense of that term. The state of New York, for example, is currently appealing two cases in which the combined fee awards exceed $2 million. The cumulative effect of such awards on public treasuries is devastating. The state of Washington, for example, currently has pending against it over $8 million in attorney's fees claims. The state of Florida paid nearly $2.6 million in court-awarded attorney's fees during 1983 alone, and fee awards in recent years in that state have equalled roughly 80 percent of all substantive civil rights judgments against the state. Although the numbers are smaller, the state of Kansas has paid more in attorney's fees awards during the past three years than it has for all other settlements and judgments of any kind during that same period.

The escalating amount of fee awards has evoked harsh criticism from the judiciary, the press, and the public, as well as from many attorneys. In response to a survey of attorneys and federal judges, conducted by the Federal Judicial Center, 111 of 184 respondents agreed with the statement that "attorneys in class action suits [including civil rights actions] often reap 'windfall profits.'"[91] Judges also agreed, at a ratio of nearly three to one, that "fee abuses are a serious problem."[92] Concluding that "[t]he feeling that attorneys reap exorbitant fees appears to run deep," Professor Arthur Miller noted that "current attempts to reform the fee awards standards may be a logical response to a problem widely thought to exist by the judiciary, and many attorneys, as well as by the press and the public."[93]

Since the courts have thus been unable to arrive at consistent and workable standards for computing a "reasonable" fee under the Act, Congress should amend the statute to eliminate the chaos that is undermining its effective implementation. One partial solution that would eliminate much of the confusion and, at the same time, avoid blatantly excessive fees, would be for Congress to set a maximum hourly rate at which counsel may be compensated, as Congress was careful to do in the Equal Access to Justice Act, where the federal treasury was at risk.[94] In order to avoid disparate treatment for state and local treasuries, Congress should afford them the same protection. Other specific amendments are recommended later in this report.

Recommendaton No. 6: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to provide that the prevailing party shall not be awarded fees in excess of $75 per hour.

Finding No. 7: Courts routinely make "bonus" awards or apply "multipliers" to the hourly rates set for prevailing counsel, resulting in grossly inflated awards constituting a "windfall" to prevailing counsel.

The awarding of "bonuses" over and above the "lodestar" amount (reasonable number of hours spent times reasonable hourly rate) has become commonplace under § 1988.[95] This growing practice has netted spectacular fee awards in many cases, far in excess of the reasonable value of the services rendered. For example, in Bolden v. Pennsylvania State Police, 491 F. Supp. 958 (E.D. Pa. 1980), an employment discrimination case, the court increased the basic fee by 50 percent, converting an $88,450 award into $132,675 (the total award, including $6,685 for law student services and $12,612.50 for preparation and litigation of the fee application, came to over $151,000). Although the court noted that the legal issues in the case were not particularly novel, it awarded the 50 percent bonus on account of the "excellent quality" of the legal work and the case's advancement of civil rights.[96] Similar results were reached in the New York case of Population Services International v. Carey, 476 F. Supp. 4 (S.D.N.Y. 1979), in which a bonus of $23,240 was added to a base award of $46,760, because the attorneys demonstrated a "high degree of skill and comprehensive research." Presumably counsel's research would have already been reflected in the number of hours billed, and the attorneys' skill would be reflected in their hourly rates, making a further bonus superfluous. In Vecchione v. Wohlgemuth, 481 F. Supp. 776 (E.D. Pa. 1979), the court doubled the lodestar amount to account for delay in payment, the quality counsel's work, the case's furtherance of civil rights and defendants' bad faith. The resulting award exceeded $207,000.[97]

The concept of such bonuses or multipliers is nowhere mentioned in the Act. The legislative history, while citing a few cases in which minimal bonuses or multipliers were awarded,[98] fails far short of evincing clear Congressional support for the use of bonuses in computing fee awards. Rather, the concept of bonus awards is entirely a judicial creation, conceived in contexts that are entirely inapposite to the application of § 1988.

The concept originated in antitrust cases resulting in the creation of an equitable fund out of which both plaintiffs and their counsel recover.[99] In awarding fees in such cases, "the court exercises its equitable jurisdiction over the relationship between an attorney and his amorphous client." [100] The rationale for fee awards in such cases is one of quantum meruit—"the members of the [benefited] group should pay 'compensation as was reasonable'. . . to the attorney representing their interests." [101] Under that theory, bonus awards make sense and are easily implemented, particularly where the case has created a large monetary fund out of which the award will be paid.

By contrast, fee awards under § 1988 are paid by the defendant in addition to any other judgment against him. Since the defendant is not the one who benefited from the action, the quantum meruit theory cannot be used to justify inflation awards in such cases. Nor can a bonus in such cases be characterized as part of the defendant's equitable "punishment" for legal wrongs against the plaintiffs, since, under § 1988, unlike in the antitrust cases, fees must be paid in addition to the compensatory relief on the merits, rather than out of it.[102]

An additional significant difference between fee awards in antitrust cases and those in § 1983 actions is that, in the latter, the fee award must be paid by a state or other public entity rather than by a private defendant. The state, unlike a private defendant, is a representative of the public interest; and the taxpayers who ultimately bear the burden of such awards are not guilty of any wrongdoing. Extra caution is therefore warranted in assessing the amount of the award so as not to disrupt state and local governments or unduly reduce the amount of money available for other public purposes. Since the rationales underlying bonus awards have no application in the context of § 1988, the adoption of this mechanism into the calculation of fees under § 1988 is not warranted.

Moreover, bonus awards are entirely inconsistent with the purposes of § 1988. First of all, bonuses are, by definition, "windfalls" to plaintiff's counsel, since bonuses are awarded in addition to "compensation of [Plaintiffs] legal expenses," which is all that Congress intended to provide.[103] As noted by one court, "multiplying the number of hours properly spent times a reasonable hourly rate is sufficient to serve [the] goal" of attracting competent counsel.[104] Anything more than that is simply "unearned personal gain at the public expense[105] or, in other words, "windfall."[106]

Second, even where some rationale is given for awarding a bonus, the amount of the bonus awarded is entirely arbitrary,[107] thus violating Congress's mandate that fee awards be "reasonable." Even courts that have endorsed the use of bonuses have commented on the subjectivity of arriving at a precise amount.[108] As noted by one court, the use of bonuses is an "open-ended device" that "is able to undo in a twinkling . . . all of the careful calculations" involved in setting the lodestar amount.[109] The arbitrary nature of such awards is exacerbated by the fact that a difference between a bonus, of, e.g., 10 percent and one 25 percent can result in a difference of hundreds of thousands of dollars in a protracted case.

The lack of consistency and predictability of bonus awards is directly contrary to Congress's purpose of ensuring uniformity and consisistency in fee awards.[110] Furthermore, as a practical matter, the unpredictability of bonus awards makes it difficult for the parties to settle fee claims, since the prospect of bonus awards makes it impossible to estimate, with any degree of accurancy, the total amount of fees a court would be likely to award in a particular case.[111] Finally, the exorbitant fee awards that result from the use of bonuses certainly cannot be characterized as "reasonable" in amount.[112]

An examination of the justifications offered by courts in support of bonus awards reveals that those justifications are, in fact, fallacious and inconsistent with the overall purposes of the Act. The primary justification used to support bonus awards is that a bonus is necessary to account for the contingent nature of success, often termed the "risk of loss" or the "contingency factor." The roots of this concept can be found in the contingent fee agreements that often obtain between tort plaintiffs and their attorneys. In those circumstances, a contingent fee arrangement has "an economic rationale: it compensates plaintiff's lawyer for his services as an entrepreneur who bears the risks of litigation."[113] By taking a number of cases on a contingency basis, plaintiff's counsel can use the large fees recovered in successful cases to cover the losses he incurs in unsuccessful ones. Such arrangements thus have the purpose and effect of financing not only meritorious but also losing cases.[114]

However, such a purpose and effect are entirely inconsistent with those of Congress in enacting § 1988. Congress intended the Act to encourage and provide compensation only for meritorious cases,[115] certainly not for losing cases,[116] nor even for cases that have a reasonable chance of success but do not ultimately succeed.[117] In fact, Congress intended the Act to deter meritless suits.[118] As the Supreme Court said recently with respect to another fee statute, "One might well imagine the surprise of the legislators who voted for this section as an instrument for deterring meritless suits upon learning that instead it could be employed to fund such suits."[119]

As pointed out by one commentator, ignoring the contingency factor is more consistent with Congressional intent: "Putting the lawyer to the risk in close cases helps weed out meritless claims . . . [and] provide[s] a desirable check on the . . . increase in court docket congestion."[120] Moreover, "[i]f [unsuccessful] litigation is to be subsidized, one may well ask why the subsidy should come from the defendant in another case."[121]

Contingency bonuses have the further untoward effect of rewarding, and hence encouraging, marginal claims to an even greater extent than clearly successful ones, since the amount of a contingency bonus varies inversely with the strength of plaintiff's claim.[122] Awarding bonuses on this basis is patently unfair to defendants, since such award have the converse effect of forcing defendants to pay higher attorney's fees where they had a strong, but ultimately unsuccessful, defense than where violations of plaintffs' rights were clear from the outset.[123] Such awards cannot serve to deter egregious civil rights violations by potential defendants, one of the subsidiary purposes of the Act,[124] since defendants are "penalized" only where it is unclear, prior to litigation, that their conduct is, in fact, illegal.[125]

Finally, to the extent that contingency bonuses are intended to protect plaintiffs' counsel against the risk of nonpayment for their services, such bonuses are particularly inappropriate where plaintiffs are represented by a legal services organization that never receives payment from its clients and whose funding is not contingent on whether it prevails in individual cases. Such attorneys "cannot truly be said to have undertaken a risk of no remuneration." 126 As aptly stated by one commentator:

"If an organization is not permitted to charge its clients for its services . . . what does that organization risk in undertaking representation in one of the few types of cases which permit recovery of a fee? . . . [L]itigation which permits the collection of a fee by a federally funded legal services organization is actually the most lucrative type of litigation available to such organizations.[127]

Nor can contingency bonuses to legal services attorneys be justified on other grounds. Such bonuses cannot operate as an incentive for such groups to take more civil rights cases,[128] since an Internal Revenue Service ruling prohibits public interest law firms seeking tax-exempt status from "us[ing] the likelihood or probability of a fee award as a consideration in its selection of cases." [129] Furthermore, no additional incentive is needed to induce such organizations to take on such cases, since "[t]hese organizations exist to represent groups like the [plaintiff] class, with constitutional claims at the cutting edge of the law." [130] Nor should contingency bonuses be used as an indirect means of funding legal services organizations.[131] This Act was not intended for that general purpose,[132] but rather, only to finance successful civil rights cases, and there is no guarantee that bonuses received by legal services organizations will be used for that limited purpose. Thus, contingency bonuses to legal service attorneys, which serve none of the purposes of § 1988, must be characterized as impermissible windfalls to such organizations.

Other rationales, in addition to contingency, used by the courts to justify bonus awards include the complexity of the case and the quality of the services provided by plaintiffs' counsel. Since the complexity of the case increases the number of hours reasonably spent, and the quality of representation increases the reasonable hourly rate used to compute the lodestar amount, a bonus supplementing the lodestar based on the factors necessarily constitutes a windfall, which should be disallowed.[133]

A bonus based on benefits obtained by the plaintiffs in the underlying case is also contrary to the purposes of the Act and unfair to the defendants. The basic fee award is designed to compensate plaintiffs to whatever extent that they prevail.[134] A party who fully prevails will receive compensation for all time reasonably spent in doing so and, accordingly, will receive a higher fee than one whose success is limited.[135] An additional bonus for success can only constitute a windfall. Moreover, the amount of a bonus based on results is likely to be arbitrary, particularly in nonmonetary cases where the results are difficult to translate into quantitative terms.[136] Finally, a court that has just ruled in plaintiff's favor might be inclined to reemphasize the importance of its ruling by rewarding plaintiff again, by way of a bonus, for his "outstanding" success. Such a bonus is unfair to defendants, since they have already "paid" for the results of their wrongdoing via the relief awarded against them on the merits. To "punish" them again by supplementing the fee award is contrary to the compensatory, nonpunitive purpose of the Act. Eliminating such bonuses would eliminate this subjective element of fee awards.[137]

For all of the reasons discussed above, bonus awards are inconsistent with the purposes of § 1988. Rather than merely compensate plaintiff's counsel for their legal expenses in prosecuting a particular civil rights case, all that the act intended, bonus awards constitute windfalls to plaintiff's counsel, a result that Congress expressly intended to avoid. Therefore, Congress should amend the Act to prohibit the use of bonuses or multipliers in computing a fee award.

Recommendation No. 7: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to prohibit the award of bonuses or multipliers in excess of compensation at a reasonable hourly rate for the number of hours reasonably spent by prevailing counsel.

Finding No. 8: In applying the Fees Act to prevailing parties represented by publicly-funded salaried attorneys, courts normally award fees based on hourly rates charged by private counsel, resulting in windfalls that substantially exceed the actual costs of the litigation.

In computing a "reasonable" attorney's fee for prevailing counsel, most courts have applied the market rates charged by private law firms to their fee-paying clients, even where the attorney seeking fees has not actually incurred the high costs ordinarily associated with private practice. For example, in a case now pending before the District Court of Massachusetts, a law professor employed by Harvard University at an annual salary of $70,000 and having minimal overhead expenses seeks to be compensated at the rate of $275 per hour (plus a bonus of 50 percent), a rate higher than those charged by even the most high-priced private firms in the area.[138]

In Dennis v. Chang, 611 F.2d 1302 (9th Cir. 1980), attorney's fees were awarded in four civil rights actions in which a nonprofit legal aid society, partially funded by the state of Hawaii, represented the prevailing plaintiffs. The Ninth Circuit specifically rejected the argument that the legal aid society should be reimbursed only for its actual costs in litigating the case. Rather, the court concluded that the fee award should be based upon rates charged by private Honolulu attorneys. Similarly, in Stenson v. Blum No. 81-7385 (2d Cir.), cert. granted, 103 S. Ct. 2426 (1983), the Second Circuit affirmed an award of fees to a publicly-funded legal services organization, at the rate of $95 to $105 per hour, "the rate[s] charged for similar work by [private] attorneys of like skill in the area." Those cases are not atypical.[139] However, as a few courts and commentators have recognized, awarding fees to legal services attorneys at "market" rates "constitute[s] a substantial windfall for the organizations involved" and therefore should not be permitted under § 1988.[140]

A proper determination of what constitutes a "reasonable" hourly rate for legal services attorneys must begin with an examination of the language of the Act and its legislative history. The Act itself provides some guidance by authorizing the award of "a reasonable attorney's fee as part of the costs." The legislative history also repeatedly equates attorney's fees with the costs of litigation and emphasizes that the Act is intended to reimburse plaintiff's counsel for the "cost" of vindicating plaintiff's civil rights in court.[141]

The legislative history further indicates that the Act was intended primarily to encourage private attorneys to take civil rights cases,[142] although the House Report indicates, in a footnote, that "a prevailing party is entitled to counsel fees even if represented by an organization."[143] Thus, the legislative history falls far short of mandating that legal services attorneys be compensated at "market" rates. Moreover, even if Congressional endorsement of the market-rate system could be inferred form the legislative history, the escalating rates that have resulted from its application require a reexamination of that system in light of the overall puposes of § 1988.[144]

What the legislative history does unequivocally demonstrate is Congress's intent that, however fees are computed under the Act and to whomever they are awarded, the amount of such fees should not be such as to constitute a windfall to prevailing counsel.[145] A close examination of the market-rate system of computing hourly rates for legal services attorneys reveals that it is contrary to that clear legislative intent.

As a few courts and commentators have recognized, assigning "market" rates to legal services attorneys presents difficult, if not insurmountable, problems. First of all, to state the obvious, there is no true "market" for the services of legal services attorneys, since they receive no fees from their clients. Particularly since minimum fee schedules may no longer be used,[146] rates vary widely within communities and even within individual law firms,[147] depending on factors having no necessary relationship with the value of the services rendered or the experience and skill of the attorneys involved, for example, the attorney's relationship with a particular client, what that client can afford to pay, the firm's overhead expenses, and how much profit the firm desires to make.[148] Since such factors are unrelated to the value of a legal services attorney's services in a particular case, assigning such an attorney a rate based on these factors is patently unreasonable and inconsistent with the legislative purpose of compensating civil rights attorneys only for the value of their services in a particular case.

More significant, in light of Congress' clear intent to avoid windfalls, is the fact that rates determined in this manner are likely to far exceed the legal service organizations' actual costs, since such rates are computed on the basis of the high overhead expenses and profit margins of private firms, which are not shared by legal services organizations.[149] Any such excess is obviously a windfall to such organizations.[150] Particularly where the party paying the fee is a state government, "the difference, if any, between the 'market value' fee and the 'compensation' fee would be better spent in remedying [the civil rights violation that gave rise to the action]."[151]

Although the market-rate system may have been adopted in order to avoid treating legal services organizations any differently from private attorneys,[152] that system, in effect, gives such publicly-funded counsel an unfair advantage over their private counterparts. As noted by one commentator:

"Requiring district courts to award identical gross fees to private and organizational counsel, notwithstanding the greater litigation expenses incurred by private counsel, would effectively award a higher return of profit to organizational counsel. Such a rule would lead a court to arbitrarily increase an otherwise reasonable award of attorney's fees simply because plaintiff's counsel happened to be employed by a legal services organization."[153]

Such disparate treatment is not only unfair to the litigants on both sides of civil rights cases, but is also directly contrary to "the spirit of 'reasonableness' which is the heart of section 1988. * * * Legal services organizations, along with their counterparts in private practice, are not entitled to anything more than a reasonable fee under section 1988."[154]

In order to avoid windfalls to legal services attorneys, a few lower courts have adopted an alternative method of computing hourly rates for legal services organizations, based on the actual litigation expenses of such organizations. Rather than arbitrarily assigning "market" rates to such attorneys, hourly rates are computed according to the hourly wages of the attorneys involved plus the percentage of the annual overhead of the organization attributable to the number of hours reasonably spent by the organization's attorneys on the case.[155]

This cost-based method has the advantages of more accurately reflecting the actual costs of vindicating a plaintiff's rights in a particular case, without compensating plaintiff's counsel for overhead and other expenses not actually incurred.[156] Such a system is consistent with the factors enumerated in Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express and endorsed by the Congress. An individual attorney's salary presumably reflects his relative skill and experience within the organization.[157] Other pertinent factors, such as the novelty and complexity of the case, would still be reflected in the court's consideration of the number of hours reasonably spent. Moreover, it must be remembered that the Johnson criteria were intended only as guidelines and were not meant to be applied so as "to make the prevailing counsel rich."[158]

In addition, a cost-based system is actually easier to administer than the more subjective and essentially arbitrary market-rate system.[159] The information needed to compute rates on this basis, i.e., attorneys' salaries and organizational overhead, is readily available, since legal services organizations are required under the Legal Services Corporation Act [160] to report such information as a condition to their receipt of federal funding. By contrast, under the market-rate system, prevailing counsel have the substantial burden of producing detailed and case-specific affidavits from community lawyers of similar experience and other expert testimony in order to establish an appropriate market rate for their services.[161] Furthermore, the objectivity of such information will facilitate settlement of fee claims by such organizations.

In sum, a cost-based system for determining reasonable hourly rates for legal services attorneys is consistent with the language and intent of the Act and is certainly preferable to the subjective and inflationary market-rate analysis currently applied by most courts. Under a cost-based system, legal services attorneys would receive full compensation for the cost of vindicating their clients' rights. They should not and cannot reasonably expect to receive more. Accordingly, Congress should amend the Act to provide that fee awards to salaried publicly-funded attorneys be computed on the basis of their actual costs.

Recommendation No. 8: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to provide that, where the prevailing party is represented by a publicly-funded legal services organization, courts should compute a reasonable hourly rate for such counsel based on the actual costs of the litigation to the organization, including the proportion of the attorney's annual salary and of the organization's annual overhead attributable to the number of hours reasonably spent on the case.

Finding No. 9: The Fees Act affects the process of legal dispute resolution in a way that is unfair to public defendants and that further burdens the courts by:

A. making it more desirable for plaintiffs to commence litigation, rather than settle disputes informally;

B. making it more advantageous for plaintiffs to continue litigation rather than settle where any meritorious claim is presented;

C. making it less desirable, once litigation is underway, for public defendants to alter challenged laws, administrative regulations, or official positions in any way that favors the plaintiffs;

D. making it less desirable for public defendants to litigate those close issues that should be litigated; and

E. making it difficult for plaintiffs and defendants to settle claims for attorney's fees.

Throughout this report, a recurring theme has been the adverse effect of various aspects of the Fees Act, as interpreted and applied by the courts, on the process of settling disputes. Because of the courts' liberal construction of "prevailing party" combined with their rejection of virtually all circumstances justifying the denial of fees, plaintiffs with any colorable claim are encouraged to commence suits, rather than attempt to resolve disputes informally, and to continue to litigate every claim, secure in the prospect of a substantial fee award as long as they prevail on any issue or succeed in obtaining some benefit after the commencement of litigation. Moreover, the longer the litigation continues, the higher the award the plaintiffs can expect to receive.

Conversely, defendants are discouraged from informally resolving disputes for fear that their actions will confer prevailing party status on the plaintiffs, virtually guaranteeing liability for fees. Public defendants are discouraged, however, from litigating cases where they have a strong defense, since in such cases, if plaintiffs ultimately prevail, defendants are forced to pay for both sides of the litigation plus a "contingency bonus" based on plaintiffs' high risk of loss.

Furthermore, because of the absence of uniform standards for calculating a "reasonable" fee award, plaintiffs and defendants have difficulty settling fee claims without litigation. Plaintiffs are further encouraged to litigate their claims for fees, since the cost of fee litigation is also charged to the defendants.

The net result of these incentives and disincentives is to deter plaintiffs from settling meritorious cases but to encourage defendants to settle close cases where they have a strong, but possibly unsuccessful, defense. Many of the foregoing recommendations, if adopted by the Congress, would partially alleviate these skewed and undesirable effects of the Act. However, in order to further encourage settlement, where appropriate, and thereby reduce unnecessary litigation, to the mutual benefit of all parties and the courts, additional reforms are necessary.

In order to encourage pre-litigation settlement, plaintiffs should be precluded from receiving fees where it can be shown that the litigation was commenced primarily for the purpose of obtaining attorney's fees.[162] Such a denial would be warranted where, for example, plaintiffs made no attempt to resolve the dispute informally prior to litigation or filed suit despite defendants' willingness to settle the matter informally.

Once litigation is commenced, settlement could be encouraged by precluding an award of fees to plaintiffs who reject an offer of judgment made pursuant to Rule 68 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and subsequently obtain a less favorable judgment from the court. Although some courts have construed Rule 68 to require the denial of attorney's fees in such circumstances,[163] other courts have disagreed.[164]

The denial of fees incurred after the rejection of a settlement offer that turns out to be more favorable than the relief eventually obtained from litigation would "work to further the legitimate concerns of judicial economy and efficiency without discouraging attorneys from pursuing civil rights litigation." [165]

Recommendation No. 9: The Congress should amend the Fees Act to provide that the court deny attorney's fees to a prevailing party, where it determines:

A. that the lawsuit was brought principally for the purpose of obtaining attorney's fees; or

B. that the prevailing party rejected an offer of judgment made pursuant to Rule 68 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or a cognate state rule of procedure, that was more favorable than the relief ultimately granted by the court, in which case no fees shall be awarded for the services rendered after the date of the offer.

CONCLUSION

The Association's recommendations are designed to further the original purposes of the Fees Act while eliminating some of the serious problems that have arisen from its application. In general terms, the major problem with the Act, as presently implemented by the courts, is the lack of uniform and easily applied standards of determining eligibility for fees and for computing the amount of a reasonable fee in particular cases. Absent such standards, state and local governments are faced not only with high and occasionally exorbitant fee awards, but also with the burden and expense of opposing excessive and unjustified claims for fees. Without clear standards, such opposition inevitably takes the form of complex and protracted litigation over fees, which further saps the resources of state and local governments, to the detriment of all parties, the courts, and ultimately, the public, the Act's intended beneficiaries. Legislative reform, along the lines recommended by the Association, is therefore urgently needed.

ABOUT THE ASSOCIATION

The National Association of Attorneys General was founded in 1907 for the purpose of fostering communication of legal developments and cooperative legal actions among the states' chief legal officers and their staff attorneys.

The Association staff compiles and disseminates information on legislative, agency, and judicial developments that have an impact on state legal affairs, and provides research and technical assistance to the offices of Attorneys General. The Association handles hundreds of information requests each month from the offices of Attorneys General, members of Congress, officials of the federal government, and the public. Information clearinghouses are maintained in ten substantive areas: antitrust, commerce, consumer protection, charitable trusts and solicitations, bankruptcy, criminal justice, corrections, and institutional confinement, energy, environment, and medicaid fraud. In addition, the Association has been fortunate to obtain under the Intergovernmental Personnel Act (IPA), the services of two senior attorneys from the Department of Justice to assist state Attorneys General in the areas of management and information systems, and Supreme Court advocacy.

The Association operates an extensive continuing legal education program in numerous substantive law areas attended by Attorneys General, Assistant Attorneys General, and other state and local govenment officials.

The Association publishes five monthly reports of significant state and federal legal developments and legislative activities, as well as A-G Report, which focuses on the activities and responsibilities of Attorneys General. These publications are available to the bar and the public.

The full Association meets twice yearly, in June and in December, at which time it receives recommendations from the committees and subcommittees, and thereafter debates and decides what action the Association shall take on litigation, legislation and policy issues. The autonomy of each Attorney General is carefully protected and the influence of the Attorneys General working within the Association is targeted at those issues on which there is unanimous or nearly support.

The Associations's staff works with numerous committees and subcommittees of the Congress in implementing the Association's policy positions by coordinating testimony of Attorneys General and providing such committees with the views of the Association on particular issues. In addition, we work closely with numerous state, local, and other associations on national issues of mutual concern.

Each spring, Attorneys General meet in Washington, D.C., with the President, Vice President, U.S. Attorney General, and chiefs of the antitrust, civil rights, criminal, and lands and natural resources divisions of the Department of Justice, the Chief Justice of the United States, House and Senate Judiciary Committee chairmen, and other key members of the Administration and Congress.

There are seven former Attorneys General who now serve in the Congress. Senator Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) was elected in November 1982 and joins Senators Slade Gorton (R-Wash.), Warren Rudman (R-N.H.), John Danforth (R-Mo.), Thomas Eagleton (D-Mo.), and Robert Stafford (R-Vt.), as well as Rep. Jim Jeffords (R-Vt.).

There are 10 Governors who are former Attorneys General: Governors Richard Bryan (D-Nev.), George Deukmejian (R-Calif.), Toney Anaya (D-N.M.), Mark White (D-Tex.), and Bill Clinton (D.-Ark.), William Allain (D-Miss.), William Brennan (R-Me.), Bruce Babbit (D-Ariz.), Alan Olson (R-N.D.), and William Janklow (R.-S.D.).

ATTORNEY'S FEES

Professor Laurence Tribe of Harvard Law School won a big constitutional case against the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and is therefore, by federal statute, allowed to collect "reasonable" attorney's fees from the loser. But the state is refusing to pay his $332,000 bill, which is based in part on an hourly rate of $275. No wonder. That's a pretty hefty fee for a moonlighting academic who wins a liquor license case. Yes, a liquor license.

Prof. Tribe, with two assistants, represented a restaurant in challenging a state statute that granted churches and schools a veto power over liquor license applications by nearby businesses. After three years he won decisively in the Supreme Court, arguing that this delegation of a governmental licensing decision to a private party, particularly a religious organization, violated due process and the establishment clause of the First Amendment. Under a 1976 federal statute, attorneys who win constitutional and civil rights cases against governments can request the court to make the losing defendant pay "reasonable" attorney's fees. The purpose is to promote vindication of those rights.

Prof. Tribe can command high fees from his paying clients (many are not) because he is an eminent constitutional scholar and a highly creative and successful advocate. Billing $275 per hour, he argues, is consistent with top wages in Boston law firms, is much less than in the priciest New York or Washington firms, and is much less than he himself has charged some affluent clients. Prof. Tribe also argues that the 50 percent "tip" he applied to the itemized bill is both legal and perfectly reasonable given the complexity of the constitutional theories involved, the risk of losing and the time he's waited to receive any compensation at all.

That's beside the point. High-priced lawyers are just charging much too much—to the point of caricature—and the folks expected to pay their fees should put an end to the practice. Just because well-heeled private clients dole out huge sums doesn't mean that the public should be equally generous. The "prevailing wage" approach that government uses when it is buying services—which is the essence of Prof. Tribe's claim—has a superficial appeal. But on closer inspection it reveals elements of a gigantic rip-off.

Public works cost too much in part because the Davis-Bacon Act effectively requires union-scale wages. Medical costs soar in part because doctors have dominated service and price decisions. There's news every week of some windfall for a government consultant or defense contractor. For all these groups, government should refuse to bolster inflated wages and profits. Sorry, Prof. Tribe. Lawyers—even civil rights lawyers—need at least as much wage restraint as others when it comes to billing the government.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague, Mr. THURMOND as a cosponsor of the Legal Fees Equity Act. The bill would establish standards and procedures for awards of attorneys' fees in civil judicial and administrative proceedings against the United States, States, and local governments in cases where Federal statutes allow such awards, and eliminates excessive awards in such cases. This bill specifically includes fee awards to subjects of investigations under the Independent Counsel Statute, 28 U.S.C. 593(g), and also expands the authority of the Attorney General over the hiring of outside counsel by Federal agencies for litigation. The intent of the bill is to achieve a more equitable balance in compensation among the various attorneys litigating for or against the government and private attorneys receiving fees under civil fee-shifting statutes.

Mr. President, a number of Federal statutes provide that parties to civil suits and administrative proceedings against the United States, States, or local governments may, under appropriate circumstances, recover "reasonable attorneys' fees" from the government defendants. These statutes have, however, placed a great burden on the courts due to the lack of congressional guidance as to when an award of attorneys' fees is appropriate, or as to what constitutes a reasonable award. As a result, courts have reached conflicting interpretations of the civil fee-shifting statutes. In some cases the courts have used "multipliers" and "bonuses" to double, and even triple, the normal hourly rates of the prevailing party's attorney. Attorneys' fee in excess of $100 an hour are common, with some requests exceeding $400 an hour.

The Legal Fees Equilty Act will provide the much-needed guidance to the courts and Federal agencies for the award of attorneys' fees pursuant to Federal statutes thereby reducing the current uncertainties and disparities reflected in present decisions.

Specifically, the bill will:

Set a $75 per hour maxmum rate for attorney's fees awarded, and eliminate the use of bonuses and multipliers to escalate fee awards. This will compensate "private attorneys' general" at a level commensurate with—but still significantly higher than—that of their government counterparts, but provide a reasonable incentive sufficient to attract competent counsel;

Allow recovery of attorney's fees only when a party has prevailed on the merits of its complaint, or where the suit is concluded by a favorable settlement agreement;

Allow recovery of attorneys' fees only for work performed on issues on which the party prevailed;

Permit the reduction or denial of the amount of fee awards, for example, where a party has unreasonably protracted the litigation; where the services provided were excessive with regard to the nature of the controversy; or where the fee award would unreasonably exceed the hourly salary of a salaried attorney;

Provide that monetary judgments be reduced—but not more than 25 percent—by the amount of the attorneys' fees allowed in the proceeding. Exceptions are allowed for suits under certain provisions of the Equal Access to Justice Act, suits for recovery of disputed taxes, or in cases of undue hardship;

Establish certain procedural requirements for attorneys' fee applications, including a 30-day time limit after final judgment for submitting fee applications, and require courts and agencies to develop additional guidelines;

Clarify the circumstances in which attorneys' fees may be awarded when a claim becomes moot or the party refuses to accept a reasonable settlement offer;

Amend the Independent Counsel Statute (28 U.S.C. 593(g)), to impose the same $75 per hour limitation upon any fee awarded to a subject of an investigation under the statute; and Impose a $75 per hour limit upon the amounts payable to outside private counsel retained by any Federal agency for litigation where the taxpayer must foot the bill.

Mr. President, I welcome the guidance and reform which the Legal Fees Equity Act offers. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring the bill.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself and Mr. MATHIAS) (by request):

S. 1581. A bill to amend section 3006A of title 18, United States Code, to improve the delivery of legal services in the criminal justice system to those persons financially unable to obtain adequate representation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT REVISION

● Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the proposed "Criminal Justice Act Revision of 1985" at the request of the Judicial Conference of the United States.

During the last two Congresses, the Judicial Conference has proposed legislation to amend the Criminal Justice Act [CJA] to increase the compensation available to attorneys and other persons providing representation under the act, and to update and streamline its operation. Although Congress did include the long overdue increase in CJA compensation in the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 (Public Law 98-473), enacted on October 12, 1984, Congress has not addressed several of the important issues which have been raised by the Judicial Conference.

In seeking to address those issues, the bill I am introducing today would, in part, provide for:

Variation of the hourly rates among districts and circuits to account for differences in economic conditions.

Elimination of the compensation rate differential for in-court and out-of-court hours.

Future increases in the hourly rates based upon cost-of-living salary adjustments given to Federal employees.

Further increases in the case compensation maximums and modification of the standard for waiving the maximums;

Increases in compensation limits pertaining to investigative, expert, and other services, with and without prior authorization, and provision for nunc pro tunc authorization in appropriate circumstances;

Authority to appoint counsel for financially eligible persons charged with a petty offense, where confinement is authorized and representation is determined to be in the interest of justice;

Mandatory appointment of counsel for financially eligible material witnesses in custody;

Professional liability protection for Federal defenders;

Funding for the continuing education and training of persons providing representational services under the act; and Authorization for the establishment of a Federal defender organization for the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, I believe that these proposals, and other issues addressed by this legislation are important ones which merit the serious consideration of Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD, along with the letter of transmittal from the Judicial Conference of the United States and accompanying section-by-section analysis.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1581

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Criminal Justice Act Revision of 1985."

SEC. 2. (a) Section 3006A of title 18, United States Code, is amended as follows:

(1) Subsection (a) is amended by striking out "(1) who is" and all that follows through "subsection (h)." and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "in accordance with this section. Representation under each plan shall include counsel and investigative, expert, and other services necessary for adequate representation. Each plan shall provide the following:

"(1) Representation shall be provided for any financially eligible person who—

"(A) is charged with a felony or misdemeanor (other than a petty offense as defined in section 1 of this title);

"(B) is a juvenile alleged to have committed an act of juvenile delinquency as defined in section 5031 of this title;

"(C) is charged with a violation of probation;

"(D) is under arrest, when such representation is required by law;

"(E) is entitled to appointment of counsel in parole proceedings under chapter 311 of this title;

"(F) is subject to a mental competency hearing under chapter 313 of this title;

"(G) is in custody as a material witness;

"(H) is entitled to appointment of counsel under the Sixth amendment to the Constitution; or

"(I) faces loss of liberty in a case, and Federal law requires the appointment of counsel.

"(2) Whenever the United States magistrate or the court determines that the interests of justice so require, representation may be provided for any financially eligible person who—

"(A) is charged with a petty offense for which a sentence to confinement is authorized; or

"(B) is seeking relief under section 2241, 2254, or 2255 of title 28.

"(3) Private attorneys shall be appointed in a substantial proportion of the cases. Each plan may include, in addition to the provisions for private attorneys, either of the following or both:

"(A) attorneys furnished by a bar association or a legal aid agency.

"(B) Attorneys furnished by a defender organization established in accordance with the provisions of subsection (g).".

(2) Subsection (b) is amended—

(A) in the second sentence—

(i) by striking out "In every criminal case" and all that follows through "violation of probation and" and inserting in lieu thereof "In every case in which a person entitled to representation under a plan approved under subsection (a)"; and

(ii) by striking out "defendant"; and inserting in lieu thereof "person";

(B) in the third sentence by striking out "defendant" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "person"; and

(C) in the fifth sentence by striking out "defendants" and inserting in lieu thereof "persons."

(3)(A) Subsection (d)(1) is amended by striking out "not exceeding $60" and all that follows through "Such attorney" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "not in excess of $50 per hour, unless the Judicial Conference determines that a higher rate of not in excess of $75 per hour is justified for a circuit or for particular districts within a circuits, for time expended in court or before a United States magistrate and for time expended out of court. The Judicial Conference may develop guidelines for determining the maximum hourly rates for each circuit in accordance with the preceding sentence, with variations by district, where appropriate, taking into account such factors as the minimum range of the prevailing hourly rates for qualified attorneys in the district in which the representation is provided and the recommendations of the judicial councils of the circuits. Not less than three years after the effective date of the Criminal Justice Act Revision of 1985, the Judicial Conference is authorized to raise the maximum hourly rates specified in this paragraph up to the aggregate of the overall average percentages of the adjustments in the rates of pay under the General Schedule made pursuant to section 5305 of title 5, United States Code, on or after such effective date. After the rates are raised under the preceding sentence, such maximum hourly rates may be raised at intervals of not less than one year each, up to the aggregate of the overall average percentages of such adjustments made since the last raise was made under this paragraph. Attorneys".

(B) Subsection (d)(2) is amended—

(i) in the first sentence—

(I) by striking out "$2,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000"; and

(II) by striking out "$800" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,500";

(ii) in the second sentence by striking out "$2,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,000"; and

(iii) by striking out the third sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "For any other representation required or authorized by this section, the compensation shall not exceed $1,000 for each attorney in each proceeding.".

(C) Subsection (d)(3) is amended by striking out "for extended or complex representation".

(D) Subsection (d)(4) is amended in the first sentence by striking out "represented the defendant" and inserting in lieu thereof "provided representation to the person involved".

(4)(A) Subsection (e)(1) is amended in the first sentence by striking out "an adequate defense" and inserting in lieu thereof "adequate representations".

(B) Subsection (e)(2) is amended to read as follows:

"(2) WITHOUT PRIOR REQUEST.—(A) Counsel appointed under this section may obtain, subject to later review, investigative, expert, and other services without prior authorization if necessary for adequate representation. Except as provided in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, the total cost of services obtained without for prior authorization may not exceed $300 and expenses reasonably incurred.

"(B) The court, or the United States magistrate, if the services were rendered in a case disposed of entirely before the United States magistrate, may, in the interest of justice, and upon the finding that timely procurement of necessary services could not await prior authorization, approve payment for such services after they have been obtained, even where the cost of such services exceeds $300.".

(C) Subsection (e)(3) is amended by striking out "$300" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,000".

(5)(A) Subsection (h)(2)(A) is amended by striking out "similarly as under title 38, United States Code, section 605, and subject to the conditions of that section" and inserting in lieu thereof "in accordance with section 605 of title 28".

(B) Subsection (h)(2)(B) is amended in the third sentence by striking out "coming" and inserting in lieu thereof "next fiscal".

(C) Subsection (h) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(3) MALPRACTICE AND NEGLIGENCE SUITS.—The Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts shall, to the extent the Director considers appropriate, provide representation for and hold harmless, or provide liability insurance for, any person who is an officer or employee of a Federal Public Defender Organization, or a Community Defender Organization receiving periodic sustaining grants, established under this subsection, for money damages for injury, loss of property, or personal injury or death arising from malpractice or negligence of any such officer or employee in furnishing representational services under this section while acting within the scope of that person's office or employment.".

(6) Subsection (j) is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end of the first sentence the following: ", including funds for the continuing education and training of persons providing representational services under this section".

(7) Subsection (l) is amended—

(A) by striking out ", other than subsection (h) of section 1,"; and

(B) by striking out "Act" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "section".

(b)(1) Section 3006A of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by striking out subsection (g) and redesignating subsections (h) through (l) as subsections (g) through (k), respectively.

(2) Subsection (j), as redesignated by paragraph (1), is amended to read as follows:

"(j) DISTRICTS INCLUDED.—As used in this section, the term 'district court' means each district court of the United States created by chapter 5 of title 28, the District Court of the Virgin Islands, the District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands, and the District Court of Guam.".

SEC. 3. Section 223(e) of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, title II, Public Law 98-473, 98 Stat. 1837, October 12, 1984, is amended to read as follows:

"Section 3006A(a) is amended

(1) in paragraph (1)(A) by deleting "misdemeanor (other than a petty offense as defined in Section 1 of this title)" and substituting "Class A misdemeanor"; and

(2) in paragraph (1) by deleting subparagraph (E) and by redesignating subparagraphs (F) through (I) as (E) through (H), respectively; and

(3) in paragraph (2)(A) by deleting "petty offense" and substituting "Class B or C misdemeanor or an infraction."

SEC. 4. Section 1825 of title 28, United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"1825. Payment of fees

"(a) In any case in which the United States or an officer or agency of the United States is a party, the United States marshal for the district shall pay all fees of witnesses on the certificate of the United States attorney or assistant United States attorney, and in the proceedings before a United States magistrate, on the certificate of such magistrate, except that any fees of defense witnesses, other than experts, appearing pursuant to subpoenas issued upon approval of the court, shall be paid by the United States marshal for the district—

"(1) on the certificate of a Federal public defender or assistant Federal public defender, in a criminal case in which the defendant is represented by such Federal public defender or assistant Federal public defender, and

"(2) on the certificate of the clerk of the court upon the affidavit of such witnesses' attendance given by other counsel appointed pursuant to section 3006A of title 18, in a criminal case in which a defendant is represented by such other counsel.

"(b) In proceedings in forma pauperis for a writ of habeas corpus, and in proceedings in forma pauperis under section 2255 of this title, the United States marshal for the district shall pay, on the certificate of the district judge, all fees of witnesses for the party authorized to proceed in forma pauperis, except that any fees of witnesses for such party, other than experts, appearing pursuant to subpoenas issued upon approval of the court, shall be paid by the United States marshal for the district—

"(1) on the certificate of a Federal public defender or assistant Federal public defender, in any such proceedings in which a party is represented by such Federal public defender or assistant Federal public defender, and

"(2) on the certificate of the clerk of the court upon the affidavit of such witnesses' attendance given by other counsel appointed pursuant to section 3006A of title 18, in any such proceedings in which a party is represented by such other counsel.

"(c) Fees and mileage need not be tendered to a witness upon service of a subpoena issued on behalf of the United States or an officer or agency of the United States, upon service of a subpoena issued on behalf of a defendant represented by a Federal public defender, assistant Federal public defender, or other attorney appointed pursuant to section 3006A of title 18, or upon service of a subpoena issued on behalf of a party authorized to proceed in forma pauperis, where the payment of such fees and mileage is to be made by the United States marshal under this section.".

SEC. 5. This Act and the amendments made by sections 2, 3 and 4 of the Act shall take effect on October 1, 1985, or 120 days after enactment, whichever is later.

ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE U.S. COURTS,
Washington, DC, April 18, 1985.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Judicial Conference of the United States transmitted to the last two Congresses draft legislation to amend the Criminal Justice Act (CJA), 18 U.S.C. § 3006A. The purpose of the proposed amendments was to increase the compensation available to attorneys and other persons providing representation under the CJA as well as to update and streamline its operation. CJA revision bills embodying the Judicial Conference proposals were introduced in both the 97th (H.R. 5190) and 98th (S. 2420, H.R. 4307) Congresses. Although H.R. 4307 was passed by the House of Representatives, none of these bills was enacted into law.

A partial increase in CJA compensation was enacted, however, as "The Criminal Justice Act Revision of 1984," Chapter XIX of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 (P.L. 98-473, 98 Stat. 1837, October 12, 1984). The Judicial Conference welcomes this adjustment, which doubled the hourly rates for attorney compensation by raising the limits to $60 per hour for in-court time and $40 per hour for out-of-court time. Also doubled by the CJA Revision of 1984 were the case compensation maximums. While we are hopeful that this compensation increase—the first in fourteen years—will encourage more qualified and experienced attorneys to accept appointments under the CJA, and thereby serve to improve the quality of representation, we note that the CJA Revision of 1984 did not address several of the very important issues that would have been resolved by the bills supported by the Judicial Conference. Among the most significant of these are provisions for:

1. Variation of the hourly rates among districts and circuits to account for differences in economic conditions;

2. Elimination of the compensation rate differential for in-court and out-of-court hours;

3. Future increases in the hourly rates based upon cost-of-living salary adjustments given to federal employees;

4. Further increases in the case compensation maximums and modification of the standard for waiving the maximums;

5. Increases in compensation limits pertaining to investigative, expert and other services, with and without prior authorization, and provision for nunc pro tunc authorization in appropriate circumstances;

6. Authority to appoint counsel for financially eligible persons charged with a petty offense, where confinement is authorized and representation is determined to be in the interest of justice;

7. Mandatory appointment of counsel for financially eligible material witnesses in custody;

8. Professional liability protection for federal defenders;

9. Funding for the continuing education and training of persons providing representational services under the persons providing representational services under the Act; and

10. Authorization for the establishment of a federal defender organization for the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

Accordingly, on behalf of the Judicial Conference, I am once again transmitting for Congressional consideration a draft bill to revise the CJA. The draft bill incorporates, with minor technical revisions, each of the provisions of H.R. 4307. In addition, Section 4 of the bill would amend Section 1825 of title 28, United States Code, to authorize federal public defenders and other counsel appointed under the CJA to certify the payment of defense fact witness fees in federal criminal cases. Currently this certification is performed by U.S. attorneys and assistant U.S. attorneys, thus posing the potential for conflict of interest and also creating an administrative burden for prosecutors.

The language of the witness fee provision is identical to H.R. 5189 (97th Congress) which was introduced by Congressman Kastenmeier upon request of the Judicial Conference. While the concept embodied in H.R. 5189 has had the support of the Department of Justice through the last two Administrations as well as the support of the judiciary, no action was taken on it by the 97th Congress.

For your information, I have enclosed, along with the draft bill (1) a comparative text reflecting changes in existing law, (2) a section-by-section analysis and (3) a chart comparing the provisions of the draft bill with the CJA Revision of 1984.

Representatives of the Judicial Conference and Administrative Office personnel will, of course, provide whatever assistance the Congress may request in reviewing this proposal.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.,
Deputy Director.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1 provides that the Act may be cited as "the Criminal Justice Act Revision of 1985".

Section 2 amends 18 U.S.C. 3006A in the following manner:

(a) Adequate Representation of Defendants

Subsection (a) has been restructured for purposes of clarity and to incorporate changes in the law since the last comprehensive revision of the Criminal Justice Act (hereinafter referred to as "CJA") in 1970. Mandatory appointments are listed in paragraph (a)(1) and discretionary appointments (previously found in subsection (g)) are now located directly below in paragraph (a)(2).

Paragraph (a)(1) has been amended to provide separately for mandatory representation of those charged with juvenile delinquency, a probation violation, or a felony or misdemeanor. Thus, subparagraph (a)(1)(A) provides for mandatory representation when a felony or misdemeanor is charged, subparagraph (a)(1)(B) provides for the mandatory representation of those charged with juvenile delinquency, and subparagraph (a)(1)(C) provides for mandatory representation of those alleged to have violated probation. The language of subparagraph (a)(1)(B) has also been changed slightly to conform with the provisions of chapter 403 of title 18, United States Code,—"Juvenile Delinquency."

Subparagraph (a)(1)(E) conforms the language of the CJA to that of the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act of 1976. The new language makes it clear that appointment of counsel under the CJA is mandatory in parole matters when so provided in the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act. (See comments below relating to Section 3 of the bill which further amends the CJA to eliminate references to parole in accordance with the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 (CCCA), title II, P.L. 98-473, 98 Stat. 1837, October 12, 1984).

Subparagraph (a)(1)(G) makes appointment of counsel mandatory for a material witness who is in custody, and not discretionary as currently provided in subsection (g). The Bail Reform Act of 1984, enacted as chapter I of the CCCA, provided for mandatory representation by appointed counsel at a detention hearing for a financially eligible person arrested as a material witness (See Sections 3144 and 3142(f) of title 18, United States Code). This requirement is incorporated into the CJA through the operation of current paragraph (a)(2) of the CJA which provides for the furnishing of representation to a person "who is under arrest when such representation is required by law," as well as current paragraph (a)(5) which provides for the representation of a person "for whom, in a case in which he faces loss of liberty, any Federal law requires the appointment of counsel." However, subsection (g) continues to provide discretionary authority for the appointment of counsel to represent a material witness in custody and, presumably, encompasses representation at every stage of such proceedings including the giving of a deposition by the material witness. Since the mandatory appointment provision of the Bail Reform Act of 1984 only refers to representation at the detention hearing, it is unclear whether the appointment of counsel to assist material witnesses in custody at depositions remains within the discretion of the presiding judge or magistrate. Amending the CJA to require the appointment of counsel for material witnesses will (1) eliminate any questions concerning the entitlement to representation throughout the material witness proceedings, (2) be consistent with what already is the general practice in a number of districts, and (3) reflect the view of the Judicial Conference that any person held in custody against his or her will, whether as a defendant or one designated by a party as a material witness, should have the assistance of an attorney in exercising all rights provided by law.

Subparagraphs (a)(1)(H) and (a)(1)(I) make no substantive change, but merely separate into two subparagraphs the provision appearing in current paragraph (a)(5).

Paragraph (a)(2) replaces current subsection (g) and lists those cases in which appointment of counsel is discretionary.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) is new and permits the appointment of counsel, as a matter of discretion, in petty offense cases where a sentence of confinement is authorized. At present, the language of the CJA excludes apointment of counsel in petty offense cases. However, as a result of two Supreme Court decisions, there are some petty offense cases and situations in which appointment of counsel is now required. In the first decision, Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 24 (1972), the Court held that under the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution an indigent defendant is entitled to appointment of counsel if there is a likelihood of imprisonment. The Court expressly reserved the question of the right to counsel in cases where incarceration is authorized but will not be imposed. Later, in Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367 (1979), the Supreme Court held that there is no constitutional right to appointed counsel unless imprisonment is actually imposed. In view of the Argersinger and Scott decisions, attorneys are presently being appointed in petty offense cases where there is a likelihood of imprisonment, and compensation is being provided under the authority of paragraph (a)(5) of the Criminal Justice Act, which extends the coverage of the Act to all cases where the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution requires the appointment of counsel.

There remains a practical difficulty however, since a judge or magistrate must predict at the commencement of proceedings whether or not a term of confinement is likely to be imposed. Generally, comparatively little information concerning the facts of the case, aggravating or mitigating circumstances, or the character of the defendant is available to the judicial officer at that time. A decision not to appoint counsel at the preliminary stages of proceedings serves to foreclose incarceration as a sentencing option of the court. Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) would eliminate this problem by permitting judges and magistrates to appoint counsel in petty offense cases where incarceration is authorized by statute and they determine that the interests of justice require it. The final decision concerning imposition of a term of confinement could then be reserved until the conclusion of the proceedings. Accordingly, maximum sentencing flexibility would be preserved. (See comments below relating to Section 3 of the bill which further amends the CJA to reflect the new offense classifications created by the CCCA.)

The language of paragraph (a)(3) contains no substantive changes, although it now comprises a separate subparagraph, with stylistic improvements.

(b) Appointment of Counsel

The second sentence is made less cumbersome by the omission of individual references to the category of cases for which a person may be entitled to appointed counsel. The word "person" has been substituted for the word "defendant" in this subsection, and elsewhere in the CJA, to reflect the fact that counsel may be appointed for habeas petitioners and material witnesses as well as for persons charged with a crime.

(d) Payment for Representation

(d)(1) Hourly Rate

(d)(2) Maximmum Amounts

The CJA, as enacted in 1964, provided for compensation of appointed counsel at a rate not to exceed $15 per hour for time expended in court, and $10 per hour for time expended out of court. The CJA also provided maximum compensation limits of $500 for felony cases and $300 for misdemeanor cases. The 1970 amendments increased the hourly rate maximums to $30 per hour for time expended in court, and $20 per hour for time expended out of court. Maximum compensation limits were increased to $1,000 for felony cases, and $400 for misdemeanor cases. In addition, new maximums were established—$1,000 for representation provided on appeal, and $250 for appointment under subsection (g), probation revocation cases, and post-trial motions made after entry of judgment.

The rates and maximums remained at the levels set in 1970 for nearly fourteen years, until the passage of the CJA Revision of 1984 which was enacted as chapter XIX of the CCCA. The CJA Revision of 1984 doubled the hourly rates of attorney compensation by raising the limits to their current levels of $60 per hour for in-court time, and $40 per hour for out-of-court time. In addition, the CJA Revision of 1984 doubled the case compensation maximums.

These compensation increases will provide the courts with, at least, partial relief from the difficulties they have been encountering in recent years in recruiting and retaining qualified private attorneys to serve on their CJA panels. There are, however, serious concerns that (1) in at least some high-cost districts, the new compensation levels continue to be inadequate, and (2) in those districts where the present compensation limits are sufficient, changes in economic conditions in the ensuing years will erode the value of these limits and render them inadequate long before Congress legislates additional increases.

Congressional action to increase compensation followed, by seven years, the determination by the Judicial Conference Committee to Implement the CJA that the rate and case compensation maximums had become inadequate and its recommendation that they be increased. It was this delay factor that led to the compensation CJA revision bill which was introduced in the 98th Congress and passed the House of Representatives, but not the Senate.

The compensation scheme of H.R. 4307 is retained in the new draft bill. It amends paragraph (d)(1) of the CJA to establish a maximum hourly compensation rate of $50, thus eliminating the in-court and out-of-court hourly rate differential and the administrative burdens and expenses associated with it, While the $50 rate represents a decrease from the $60 rate currently applicable to in-court hours, the change is expected to result in a moderate increase in their total amount of compensation available in most cases, since approximately 75% of all hours expended by CJA counsel are for services performed out of court and thus are subject to the $40 per hour limit. On the other hand, the elimination of the need to administer two rates should produce savings.

In addition, the Judicial Conference would be authorized to set a higher maximum hourly rate not to exceed $75, for a particular circuit or district within a circuit, if the Conference determines that circumstances existing in such circuit or district warrant an exception from the general maximum. Further, the Judicial Conference would be authorized to develop guidelines for determining such maximum hourly rates, taking into account such factors as (1) the minimum range of the prevailing rate for qualified attorneys in individuals districts, and (2) the recommendation of the judicial councils of the circuits

The provision for setting an alternate hourly rate would restore at least some of the flexibility and viability which the Congress created when, in 1970, it amended paragraph (d)(1) of the CJA to authorize judicial councils to set alternate hourly rates for districts, "not to exceed the minimum hourly scale established by a bar association for similar services rendered in the district." This goal was subsequently frustrated by the abolishment of minimum bar fee schedules following the decision of the Supreme Court in Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 733 (1975), which held that a minimum fee schedule promulgated and enforced by a bar association constitutes unlawful price-fixing in violation of the Sherman Act. The Goldfarb decision thus resulted in a collateral deactivation of the adjustment authority conferred by Congress in the Circuit Councils. In Mills v. United States, 713 F. 2d 1249, (7th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 104 S.Ct. 974 (1984)), the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that, in the absence of a local bar association minimum fee schedule, the Judicial Council for the Seventh Circuit lacked authority to increase the hourly rates payable to attorneys accepting appointments under the CJA above the $20 and $30 maximums. While the CJA Revision of 1984 removed the 1970 language authorizing judicial councils to set alternate hourly rates, it made no provision to replace this mechanism for affording flexibility to the CJA compensation scheme.

In addition the draft bill would authorize, but not require, the Judicial Conference to annually increase the $50 and $75 maximums up to the federal pay comparability raises, if any, given to federal employees. Thus, the CJA would include a limited mechanism for administrative adjustment of the compensation rates to provide for fair and reasonable compensation to counsel in light of future changes in economic conditions. This authority would not become operative until three years after the effective date of the proposed legislation.

Finally, in view of the increase in hourly rates, proposed paragraph (d)(2) would increase the overall per-case compensation maximums to $5,000 for felonies, $1,500 for misdemeanors, $3,000 for appeals and $1,000 for any other representation provided under the CJA. Cases falling within subsection (g) of the current law would be included in the new "other representation" category. Also included would be cases brought within the scope of the CJA under subparagraph (a)(1)(I) (current paragraph (a)(5)), as a result of judicial decisions or new Federal statutes which may require the appointment of counsel. The need for this provision was most recently demonstrated by the enactment of the Insanity Defense Reform Act of 1984 (Chapter IV of the CCCA) which amended the CJA to provide for representation at certain mental competency proceedings but failed to include a case compensation maximum for such appointments.

(d)(3) Waiving Maximum Amounts

While amendments to paragraph (d)(2) made by the draft bill allow for some variation among the districts with respect to the maximum hourly rate, and also contain a limited mechanism to permit raises to the hourly maximum to reflect increases in the cost of living, the case compensation maximums established by the new paragraph (d)(2) are limits to be applied in every district and circuit and may not be increased by the Judicial Conference. Thus, attorneys in districts where a higher hourly rate has been established under paragraph (d)(2) may reach the case compensation limit after expending fewer hours than attorneys in districts where the lower hourly rate is in effect. In order to avoid an erosion of the flexibility intended in the compensation scheme set forth in paragraph (d)(2), the standard for waiving the maximum amount has been broadened—the judicial officers' authority to certify compensation in excess of the maximum would no longer be limited to those cases which are "extended and complex". Under the new standard, the maximum could be waived by the chief judge of the court of appeals upon the certification of the presiding judicial officer that excess payment is necessary to provide "fair compensation".

The case compensation ceilings would also be effectively lowered if the Judicial Conference approved higher hourly rates based upon federal pay comparability increases. The proposed waiver standard will permit the full realization of the benefits of such adjustments.

(d)(4) Filing Claims

The word "person" has been substituted for "defendant."

(e) Services Other Than Counsel

(e)(1) Upon Request

The phrase "adequate representation" has been inserted in lieu of "an adequate defense".

(e)(2) Without Prior Request

The modest increase from $150 to $300 as the amount which may be incurred for expert services without prior authorization takes into account the dramatic increase in the cost of these services which has occurred since this limit was established in 1970. In addition, paragraph (e)(2) has been split into subparagraphs (A) and (B). Subparagraph (A) is substantially identical to current paragraph (e)(2), the exception being the substitution of "representation" for "defense", the increased dollar limitation, and the reference to subparagraph (B). Subparagraph (B) is a new provision which allows the judge or magistrate to approve a claim for investigative, expert, or other services obtained by appointed counsel, even though prior authorization has not been secured and the amount of the claim exceeds the new limit established by subparagraph (A). However, subparagraph (B) would limit the discretion of judicial officers to provide this ratification to those circumstances where "timely procurement of the necessary services could not await prior authorization".

(e)(3) Maximum Amounts

The $300 limit contained in the present Act has not been changed since the CJA was enacted in 1964. The proposed bill raises the limit to $1,000, a more realistic figure in view of the increase in fees charged by investigators and experts during the nearly twenty-one years since the current limit was established.

(g) Discretionary Appointments (Deleted); Redesignations

Current subsection (g) has been deleted and is found in new paragraph (a)(2), and current subsections (h) through (1) have been redesignated as subsection (g) through (k), respectively.

(g) Defender Organization (currently subsection (h))

(g)(2) Types of Defender Organization

This paragraph contains two minor stylistic revisions.

(g)(3) Malpractice and Negligence Suits (new)

This paragraph is intended to provide protection for employees of federal public and community defender organizations who face lawsuits alleging legal malpractice and negligence arising out of their performance of representational services within the scope of their employment. Since the Supreme Court's decision in Ferri v. Ackerman, 444 U.S. 193 (1979), there has been serious concern about the impact on the federal defender program of the potential exposure of employees of federal defender organizations to personal liability for legal malpractice claims. Paragraphs (g)(3) would give the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts explicit statutory authority to either provide representation and indemnification, or liability insurance for employees of federal public and community defender organizations. The language of this provision is similar to current statutory authorities for insulating personnel against personal liability for medical malpractice. See 10 U.S.C. Sec. 1089; 38 U.S.C. Sec. 4116; and 42 U.S.C Sec.233.

(i) Appropriations (currently subsection (j))

At the present, the training and education of federal public defenders is provided through the Federal Judicial Center as part of its general training program for all members and employees of the Federal Judiciary. The amendment to this subsection is intended to specifically designate funds through the defender budgetary process for the continuing education and training of federal defenders and their staffs as well as for private counsel on the CJA panels. It will permit separate, flexible, and long-term planning for defender training which is more comparable to that provided United States attorneys. This amendment will further enhance cooperation between federal defenders and the private bar and facilitate their continuing efforts to improve the quality of representation in the federal courts. At present, Federal Judicial Center training programs for federal defenders are generally not open to CJA panel attorneys and there is no other federally sponsored program for training panel attorneys. This amendment would not preclude an interagency agreement with the Federal Judicial Center to take advantage of efficiencies and economies in the administration of these educational programs.

The training of CJA panel attorneys as well as federal defenders is of paramount importance in light of the need for the improvement of advocacy in the federal courts recognized in the report of the Committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States to Consider Standards for Admission to Practice in the Federal Courts. It is believed that making training funds available in this manner will provide the needed flexibility in the area of training and continuing education to increase the overall effectiveness of federal defenders and CJA lawyers.

(j) Districts Included (Currently Subsection (k))

This subsection has been amended to expressly provide that the District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands is a district court within the meaning of the CJA. A parallel provision currently appears in 48 U.S.C. 1694c(b), thus the change is merely a conforming revision. In addition, the subsection has been reworded for purposes of style.

(k) Applicability in the District of Columbia (Currently Subsection (1))

This subsection would give the United States District Court for the District of Columbia the option of establishing a federal defender organization.

Section 3 provides conforming amendments which will be required when the major part of the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 (chapter II, Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984) becomes effective on November 1, 1986. These include technical amendments to reflect changes in offense classifications as well as the elimination of parole.

Section 4 amends 28 U.S.C. Section 1825 to authorize federal public defenders and other counsel appointed under the CJA to certify the payment of defense fact witness fees in federal criminal cases. The current language of this section provides that in any case in which the United States is a party (which includes all federal criminal cases) the United States attorney, or an assistant United States attorney, must certify the claims of witnesses for the payment of fees. This requirement applies to witnesses whether they are appearing on behalf of the government, or on behalf of a defendant or petitioner for whom CJA services are authorized.

The practice of having prosecutors certify the payment of defense witness fees posts the potential for conflicts of interest for the U.S. attorneys, as well as additional administrative burdens.

The amendment to the witness fee certification statute will authorize federal public defenders and their assistants to certify the payment of defense fact witness fees in those cases where representation is provided by federal public defenders or their assistants. In those cases where representation is furnished by other counsel appointed under the CJA—private panel attorneys or attorneys furnished by a community defender organization—defense fact witness fees would be certified by the court upon the affidavit of the witnesses' attendance by the appointed attorney. In each case, the appearance of the defense witness would be pursuant to a subpoena issued upon approval of the court.

The proposed revision of the procedures for certifying defense fact witness fees has had the support of the Department of Justice in the past two Administrations.

Section 5 provides that the Act and amendments made by sections 2, 3, and 4 of the Act shall take effect on October 1, 1985, or 120 days after enactment, whichever is later.●

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND, to introduce the Criminal Justice Act Revision of 1985. This legislation, which is being brought before the Congress at the request of the Judicial Conference of the United States, will make needed changes in the Criminal Justice Act [CJA] of 1964, in order to improve the delivery of legal services to indigent defendants in the Federal courts. Introduction of this bill marks another important step in the process of revitalizing our national response to the commands of the sixth amendment to the Constitution, which guarantees those accused of crime the effective assistance of counsel.

The Judicial Conference bill is substantially similar to the Criminal Justice Act Amendments of 1984, which I introduced on March 13, 1984. Legislation identical to my bill was passed by the House of Representatives in May 1984. Unfortunately, the Senate did not act upon these bills before the adjournment of the 98th Congress.

However, the Senate did take one important step last year to address a critical problem plaguing the administration of the CJA. The fees authorized to be paid to attorneys appointed to represent indigent criminal defendants in Federal court had not been adjusted since 1970. In the waning hours of the 98th Congress, the Senate adopted an amendment that doubled these hourly rates and case compensation maxima. This increase should ameliorate the problem of inducing competent counsel to accept CJA appointments. But more remains to be done before we can rest assured that indigent defendants benefit from the substance, not just the form, of the sixth amendment guarantee.

The bill we introduce today seeks to give us that assurance. It includes further improvements in the mechanisms for compensating court-appointed defense counsel; expansion of CJA coverage of investigative and expert services, and of representation of indigent material witnesses in custody; and authorization for professional liability insurance, and for improved continuing legal education and training, for Federal defenders. It also relieves the Federal courts in the District of Columbia of an outdated ban on the establishment of a Federal Defender Program in Washington.

Enactment of legislation addressing these issues will reaffirm our dedication to a Federal criminal justice system that is effective, efficient, and fair. I look forward to working with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and my other colleagues toward that end.●

By Mr. MURKOWSKI:

S. 1582. A bill to amend the Securities Exchange Act of 1934; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

SHAREHOLDERS VOTING RIGHTS ACT

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today to bring fairness and equity to shareholders who are too often the victims of the chaotic process of hostile corporate takeovers. This bill gives the shareholders of a target corporation the ability to decide collectively the future of their company in a reasonable manner, similar to the way they would make other fundamental decisions regarding their company.

I am alarmed by the systematic weakening of the American economy caused by the threat of hostile takeovers. Increasingly, either in anticipation of an attack or as part of repelling an onslaught or in the aftermath of a takeover, corporation are compelled to gravely weaken their capital structures. They substitute huge loads of equity for debt—debt often bearing interest rates and other provisions that create a real danger of liquidation or insolvency in the future.

The Shareholders Voting Rights Act, without preempting existing laws, would add provisions to the Williams Act to assure that the takeover process is fair and evenhanded.

With the relatively simple changes that I am proposing, I believe the current system will improve dramatically. Those who are in the game today simply to make a quick profit through the receipt of greenmail or through the temporary upsurge in market value created by the possibility of a takeover, would no longer find the takeover game attractive for such speculation. And shareholders, armed with information of the pros and cons of the offer, would have the last say on whether the offer was in the corporation's best interests.

This proposal includes the following:

Requires any person who seeks to acquire more than 15 percent of a target corporation to make a single offer to all shareholders for the remaining outstanding shares at an identical price.

Restores the role of the board of directors in the process by requiring that any takeover bid be made first to the directors of the company, who would have 10 days in which to consider it, negotiate if appropriate, and then accept or reject the offer.

Provides that if the board of directors rejects the takeover bid, the offeror may submit the bid to the entire shareholder body in a proxy contest. Only those persons who were shareholders at the time that the takeover bid was first made and who continue to maintain their interest will be permitted to vote on the offer.

Prevents the officers of a company whose shareholders have approved a takeover bid from taking any further defensive tactics to frustrate the takeover other than legal action based on a bona fide claim that the bid is in violation of law.

Provides for a 3 year "sunset" of this law.

Eliminating the questionable practice of two-tier offers, this bill allows shareholders to consider a tender offer without the fear of being "squeezed out."

Second, in allowing directors 10 days in which to study and then accept or reject the offer, the bill gives corporate officials time to make an informed decision.

There are many reasons why a board of directors should be directly involved in a takeover decision. In addition to the problems created for shareholders under the present system, current employees, retired pensioners, suppliers, creditors and entire communities may have their financial futures endangered by a hostile takeover bid. Under the present system, the board of directors, the body which traditionally concerns itself about these constituencies, can be entirely bypassed.

Increasingly, courts, investors, the Securities and Exchange Commission and others have relied upon the directors to protect the interests of the corporation, with its many constituencies. But more and more, shareholders are denied the insight and the judgment of the directors when making the most vital decision of corporate ownership.

The recent wave of hostile takeovers has not been directed solely against companies with bad managers; and many of the companies that have been victims of takeover attempts have good short-term or long-term earning potential. However, let me be clear that this bill is not meant to protect or entrench bad corporate management.

In a dramatic illustration of the detrimental impact of a recent hostile takeover attempt, the chairman of Unocal's testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Securities illustrated the dangerous increase in debt loads created by hostile takeovers. He said:

> Before the proposed merger (with Mesa Petroleum), Unocal's equity was $5.7 billion, and our long-term debt, $1.3 billion. After the merger, the combined companies would have had . . . nearly $11 billion in debt, $10 million of Newco common stock!

Incidentally, Unocal acquired approximately another $4.5 billion in debt to stave off this takeover attempt.

I favor Government regulation of private business only when it is necessary to protect a vital interest of our country. This bill embodies the principles set forth by the Business Roundtable, a distinguished group of the leaders of 200 of the Nation's largest corporations, which also shares my concern about Government regulation. These principles recognize that mergers and acquisitions which are conducted in an orderly fashion are in the long-term best interest of both the shareholders and the economy as a whole.

My bill restores orderliness in the takeover or merger process, and I ask my colleagues to support this measure.●

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mrs. HAWKINS, and Mr. ABDNOR):

S. 1583. A bill to provide additional funding for comprehensive drug law enforcement, prevention, and treatment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMPREHENSIVE DRUG LAW ENFORCEMENT, PREVENTION, AND TREATMENT ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce the Comprehensive Drug Law Enforcement, Prevention, and Treatment Act, enactment of which will turn the great wealth of the drug kingpins into the weapons that will destroy their drug empires. This approach was recently recommended by the American Bar Association.

Last year alone, an estimated $360 million in drug money and property was seized. As we make full use of recent changes in our drug forfeiture laws, there is no reason why, in the next few years, we cannot seize $1 billion or more per year of the $100 billion a year narcotics industry's illegal income.

Last year, in the Comprehensive Crime Control Act, we established a Department of Justice Forfeiture Fund. This Fund consists of amounts received from the forfeiture of property under the laws enforced by the Department of Justice that remain after expenses for the forfeiture and sale of that property. Under this new law, however, money may be appropriated from this fund for only six specific purposes: First, payment of expenses necessary to inventory, safeguard, maintain, advertise, and sell forfeited property; second, payment for information leading to a forfeiture; third, compromise and payment of valid liens against forfeited property; fourth, disbursement in connection with the remission and mitigation of forfeitures; fifth, purchase of equipment for forfeited conveyances retained for official use; and sixth, purchase of evidence.

Last year, we also created the Customs Forfeiture Fund. This Fund consists of the proceeds of the sale of property forfeited under the customs laws. Money may be appropriated from this Fund only for: First, the payment of expenses necessary to inventory, safeguard, maintain, advertise, and sell forfeited property; and second, payment of awards to informants.

These were important, but limited, steps forward. Even this limited program is set to expire in fiscal year 1987. The law enforcement purposes of the Justice Fund, the more expansive of the two, are narrowly defined. Drug education and treatment are not even mentioned as possible purposes for these new funds. Not only are the purposes of the Customs Fund more restricted than those of the Justice Fund, but the amounts to be appropriated are quite small: No more than $20 million in fiscal years 1986 and 1987.

The Comprehensive Drug Law Enforcement, Prevention, and Treatment Act that I am introducing today, however, would expand our drug forfeiture program in three important ways:

First. It directs that the Justice and Customs Forfeiture Funds shall be used entirely for drug law enforcement, prevention, and treatment purposes; second, it provides that each of these purposes shall share equally in the two Funds; and third, it makes the Funds a permanent part of our drug abuse control strategy.

The bill I am introducing today does nothing to weaken our support for the law enforcement and asset maintenance purposes already established by law. It merely provides that the amounts remaining after these purposes are paid for will be available for additional drug law enforcement purposes, as well as for drug prevention and treatment.

The Department of Justice and Customs Service will distribute the additional law enforcement money. The Secretary of Health and Human Services will distribute the drug abuse prevention and treatment money. It will be used to assist public and private nonprofit entities in providing drug abuse prevention and clinical training programs, and drug abuse treatment services.

When our forfeiture efforts attain their full potential, the provisions of this bill would enable us to hire a thousand new DEA, Customs, and other drug law enforcement agents, inspectors, investigators, and prosecutors. It would enable these agencies to modernize their communications and investigative equipment, to expand their money laundering and financial investigations against drug kingpins, to mount a truly effective campaign against designer drugs and other dangerous synthetics such as PCP, and tend to a host of other law enforcement needs that are not now being adequately met.

With the money for an effective education and prevention program, we could reach milions of school children to teach them to say no to drugs while in the earliest grades when they are still reachable, and we can counter the peer pressure to use drugs and with the examples of positive role models.

We cannot ignore the long waiting lists of those already abusing drugs who now seek treatment. I urge my colleagues to support a national campaign to help these people recover, otherwise they will commit hundreds of thousands of crimes to pay for their habits.

51-059 O-86-35 (Pt. 16)

Drug and alcohol abuse constitutes a $200 billion a year drain on the American economy. In the workplace, it causes massive absenteeism, safety hazards, and losses in productivity. The health care costs it imposes on our economy are staggering. In the schools, drug and alcohol abuse make it impossible for teachers to teach and for students to learn. This epidemic is responsible for more than half of all crimes committed today.

Mr. President, we need massive reinforcements of people and resources to win the war on drugs. My bill can provide these reinforcements. At no additional cost to the taxpayer, it can help make our homes, streets, schools, and workplaces safe again. It can help remove from the American economy the hundreds of billions of dollars in costs under which it is now straining. I encourage my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation and to give it their full support.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1583

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

Any funds appropriated under clause (3) shall be divided into thirds and distributed on a basis of one-third for the purposes provided in subclause (A), one-third for the purposes provided in subclause (B), and one-third for purposes provided in subclause (C). Disbursements to the Secretary of Health and Human Services under clause (3) shall be made in accordance with written requests of the Secretary of Health and Human Services.".

(b) Subsection (d) of section 613a is amended by inserting after "under this section" the following: ", except that the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall prepare, for transmittal by the Attorney General, the portion of the report relating to expenditures under clause (3) of subsection (a).●

By Mr. HEINZ:

S. 1584. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow a taxpayer to expense the costs of plant and equipment destroyed in whole or in part in a natural disaster; to the Committee on Finance.

DEDUCTION FOR REPLACEMENT COSTS INCURRED IN CONNECTION WITH A NATURAL DISASTER

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today, I am introducing a bill which will allow companies or businesses that have had property destroyed by natural disaster to write off immediately the cost of rebuilding their facilities, provided the facility is rebuilt in the same locality.

The purpose of this bill is to encourage companies to rebuild their plants or businesses in the same locality rather than move to another area. Currently if there is a natural disaster, such as a flood, tornado, hurricane, or earthquake, companies are entitled to SBA disaster loans at a lower interest rate. The purpose of these loans is to allow the company to rebuild its facilities, but there are no restrictions requiring that the facilities be rebuilt in the same location.

The Tax Code allows the companies to collect the insurance and rebuild without paying taxes on amounts they receive in excess of their basis in the property. Again, there is no restriction on where they have to rebuild.

My bill is very simple, it would allow taxpayers to deduct currently the cost of repairing or replacing the facility. These are the costs that would normally have to be depreciated over a period of years. However, the special tax break is only available if the company or business rebuilds in the same locality. This provision, is fair for several reasons: When a company is destroyed, either in whole or in part, they have a choice of rebuilding or taking the insurance money, and closing up their business. If they choose to rebuild, they have to borrow additional funds, and now have a large debt to pay off. This is an expense that they were not counting on, and will only reduce their profits. They didn't choose what was going to happen to them, it was an act of God, but they have to pay for it. By allowing them to expense the unanticipated additional cost of rebuilding or repairing their facility, it puts them closer to the financial position they were in prior to the disaster.

The requirement that they rebuild in the same locality is a protection for the residents of that area. They depend on the factory or business for their livelihood. The Tax Code should allow the company to recoup its losses, but not at the expense of the residents in the area.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this legislation, and work for its swift passage. I further ask that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1584

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) part VI of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to itemized deductions for individuals and corporations) is amended by adding at the end thereof the folloing new section:

"SEC. 197. DEDUCTION FOR REPLACEMENT COSTS INCURRED IN CONNECTION WITH A NATURAL DIASTER.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—A taxpayer may elect to treat qualified disaster replacement costs which are paid or incurred by the taxpayer during the taxable year as expenses which are not chargeable to capital account. The expenditures so treated shall be allowed as a deduction.

"(b) QUALIFIED DISASTER REPLACEMENT COSTS DEFINED.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'qualified disaster replacement costs' means any amount which (but for this section) would be included in the basis of any property which—

"(A) replaces property used in connection with a trade or business which was destroyed in whole or in part in connection with a disaster occurring in an area subsequently determined by the President of the United States to warrant the assistance by the Federal Government under the Disaster Relief Act of 1974,

"(B) is used, or to be used, in the same trade or business in which the property which it is replacing was used,

"(C) is of a character subject to an allowance for depreciation (or amortization in lieu thereof), and

"(D) is located in the locality in which the property which it is replacing is located.

"(2) NO SUBSTANTIAL EXPANSION.—The term 'qualified disaster replacement costs' shall not include any amount to the extent such amount is attributable to a significant expansion of the property which it is replacing.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for part VI of subchapter B of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Sec. 197. Deduction for replacement costs incurred in connection with a natural disaster.".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to amounts paid or incurred in taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984, with respect to disasters occurring after such date. ●

S. 1585. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code in order to clarify the right of cooperatives to net earnings and losses among patronage allocation units, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

NET EARNINGS AND LOSSES AMONG COOPERATIVES

● Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, the topic which this bill addresses is of great importance to the nearly 2 million members of our Nation's farmer-owned cooperatives. I might add that this issue is of some urgency to several co-ops which are in imminent danger of being told by the Internal Revenue Service that they must go back into past years and pay taxes, penalties and interest because they utilized the practice of "netting" their gains and losses among their several areas of cooperative business activity for the purpose of determining their taxable income.

This practice of offsetting profits made in one area of business activity against losses incurred in another area of activity conducted by the same organization is not an exception to the rule—indeed, it is a practice available to all types of business enterprises whether they be sole proprietorships, partnerships, or corporations. The U.S. Tax Court has distinctly found that farmer-owned cooperatives are also eligible to employ this same practice of netting gains and losses among their several divisions for tax purposes.

Despite the clear and unambigious language used by the Tax Court in overturning the IRS position against co-op netting, we find ourselves today faced with yet another attempt by the service to change the law by administrative fiat. Their cavalier attitude has obviously raised the concern of at least 32 of our Senate colleagues who have either addressed their complaint to Secretary Baker or who signed on as cosponsors of the amendment which I had earlier intended to introduce to the imputed interest bill.

Mr. President, the bill introduced today and cosponsored by 22 of our colleagues does not make any substantive changes in existing law as expressed in the Internal Revenue Code. It does not alter previous decisions of the U.S. Tax Court in cases involving netting of gains and losses among divisions by cooperatives. It only attempts to reaffirm existing law and effectuate the Tax Court rulings which the IRS has apparently chosen to ignore.

We are also aware of the concerns expressed by Secretary Block over the IRS actions. He too has expressed his feelings on this issue in letters to both Secretary Baker and to the Senate Finance Committee. USDA has studied this issue under several administrations, and Secretary Block's letters of support are based on the results of intensive studies conducted over the years.

As I have indicated in my earlier statements on this issue, we are here today to simply seek fairness and equity for our farmer-owned cooperatives in the application of the Tax Code. We do not ask that the statute be changed, only that language be added which makes perfectly clear to the IRS what the Tax Court has tried to tell them on three different occasions * * * that farm co-ops are entitled to use netting procedures in determining patronage dividends for tax purposes. One would think that such legislative action would be unnecessary given the rather blunt language found in the court decisions. Unfortunately, the service seems rather prone to selective deafness when anyone tells them something they don't want to hear.

The language which we have submitted today is only a minor modification of the amendment language which many of us had earlier offered to the imputed interest bill in an attempt to address this issue. At that time, the esteemed chairman of the Finance Committee quite correctly objected to our nongermane amendment and requested that we withhold pending a hearing before the committee. Such a hearing was expeditiously held on July 15, by Senator CHAFEE, chairman of the Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Collection. We have since worked with committee staff in an effort to satisfactorily modify the bill language.

We have come a long way toward a meeting of the minds in drafting the bill, sufficiently far enough that we are offering the measure today. I know that over the coming recess period staff and other interested parties will continue to meet if there remain any unresolved, minor concerns which should be addressed before the committee takes up the measure in business session following our recess. Obviously, the sponsors of the bill would like to resolve any outstanding concerns in a spirit of cooperation and understanding. I feel confident that such will be the case and that we can expect a speedy consideration of this matter upon our return.

We urge the assistance of our colleagues in this effort to put an end to what the court referred to in one decision as the IRS's "* * * unwarranted tinkering with the tax structure applicable to cooperatives."●

S. 1587. A bill to establish a commission to review contract payments by departments and agencies of the Federal Government and to take appropriate action to recapture profits on those contracts which the commission determines to be excessive; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

FEDERAL CONTRACT FAIR PRICE COMMISSION ACT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, we have read numerous accounts in the press of contractor overcharges and overpriced spare parts. Also, recent information available from the U.S. Census Bureau indicates that profits are healthy in the defense industry. For example, profits as a percent of equity or resources contributed for 10 large military contractors in 1984 averaged 25 percent whereas commercial manufacturing, mining, and trade corporations averaged 12.8 percent. This and other information from the Inspectors

General, the General Accounting Office, and the media provide growing evidence that some defense contractors are reaping unearned and exorbitant profits.

Mr. President, I believe we must strengthen our defenses and that contractors should realize fair and reasonable profits for performing Government contracts. However, the many disclosures of abuses by defense contractors have made the taxpayer suspicious of all Government procurement operations and Government contractors.

Government procurement regulations provide guidelines to be used in establishing the estimated initial contract profit levels; however, there are essentially no limits on final profit levels on Government contracts. I believe contractors should receive appropriate profits but those profits should be commensurate with the resources contributed by the contractor.

These press accounts of contractor profits suggests that action is needed to protect the Government's interest. One approach is to reactivate the Renegotiation Board although the Board has had a controversial history. While the concept of renegotiation may have caused controversy in the past, the revelations in the press suggests that the concept is worthy of reconsideration.

Mr. President, to encourage this reexamination, today Senators METZENBAUM, FORD, PROXMIRE, and I are introducing legislation designed to establish a commission to review contract payments by departments and agencies of the Federal Government and to take appropriate action to recapture profits on those contracts which the Commission determines to be excessive. Our bill, the Federal Contract Fair Price Commission Act of 1985, grew out of one section of earlier legislation, S. 940, that I introduced to prevent excess profits in the defense industry.

Mr. President, the Commission is similar to the Renegotiation Board which expired in 1979. While the Board existed it found excess profits of $1.3 billion on defense contracts. The Board could have found more but it was hampered in several ways. Our bill will correct the shortcomings of the Board and apply the revised principles to all Government contracts.

The Commission will be concerned with contractors or subcontractors who receive over $5 million in Federal contracts during any year. This should encourage the Commission to focus on larger firms rather than small businesses as generally happened under the old Renegotiation Board. Also profit levels will be determined by product line, preventing firms from averaging profitable with unprofitable work to obscure high profits on specific products.

The Defense Contract Audit Agency will be used for audit support to the Commission and subpoena power is added to assist the Agency if needed. This provides the Commission with immediate, experienced audit support by staffs who are already at many contractor plants.

To ensure compliance criminal and civil penalties are stipulated for contractors who fail or refuse to file the proper information or furnish false or misleading information. The Commission will not only recover excessive profits but will levy interest charges on those profits and can recover the moneys directly or indirectly from the contractor.

We offer this legislation to further the debate on measures to protect the taxpayer from paying excessive profits to Federal contractors.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL CONTRACT FAIR PRICE COMMISSION ACT OF 1985—A BRIEF SUMMARY

The bill establishes a commission to review contract payments by departments and agencies of the Federal Government and recapture excessive profits on those contracts. Guidelines currently exist in agency regulations to establish initial profit levels, however, there are essentially no limits on final Government contractor profit levels.

The commission is similar to the Renegotiation Board which went out of existence when its legislative authorization was allowed to lapse on September 30, 1976. However, the commission will apply to all government contracts and includes several new provisions. The primary provisions of the bill are as follows:

The profit levels will be determined by product line within a contractor or subcontractor organization, preventing firms from averaging profitable with unprofitable product lines to obscure high profits.

The Act shall apply to any contractor or subcontractor who received over $5,000,000 in Federal contract funds during any fiscal year. This is to encourage the commission to focus on larger firms rather than small businesses as generally happened with the old Renegotiation Board.

The commission will be composed of five members who after the first appointment will serve a term of five years with staggered expiration dates.

The Defense Contract Audit Agency with its contract audit expertise will be given subpena power and designated to make reviews of contractor reports and records in support of the commission.

Criminal and civil punishments are stipulated for failure or refusal to file the proper information or furnishing false or misleading information.

The commission may recover excessive profits by offsetting the amount against other payments due a contractor, or by directing other agencies to withhold the amount of the excess profits from their payments to the offending contractor.

Contractors will not only be required to repay excess profits but will be charged interest on the overpayment.

Contractors may seek relief from a commission determination, however, the court may not overturn a determination unless it was arbitrary, capricious, or not supported by substantial evidence.

The commission shall report annually to the Congress on its activities.●

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee, Senator ROTH, as well as Senators FORD and PROXMIRE in introducing the Federal Contract Fair Pricing Act of 1985. This bill, which is designed to recover excess profits derived from Federal contracts, creates a mechanism that has the potential to impose discipline upon our chaotic and scandalously wasteful Federal procurement process.

There can be no argument about the urgency of our need to reform that process. Nor, Mr. President, is there any question about the deep frustration in Congress and among the public at large over the apparent inability of our Government to put its own house in order.

We have tried—and for the most part, without notable success—to require competition in Federal procurement.

We have tried to tell procurement officials VIA legislation to do what they should be doing in the normal course of business—things like using "should cost" analysis, seeking second sources, dealing severely with contractors who defraud the Government.

I have strongly supported efforts to force change in the procurement process.

I will continue to do so.

But, Mr. President, I believe that until the day comes—if it ever does—on which Congress and the administration are prepared to overhaul procurement from the ground up, contractors will continue to find ways around every requirement we write.

That is why the bill we are introducing today is in my judgment so very important.

This bill, Mr. President, establishes a commission that will have full authority to review all Federal contracts.

This is a commission with teeth.

It will have at its disposal the auditing capabilities of the Defense Contract Audit Agency.

It will have the power to gather information from contractors and to move against—with very substantial sanctions—those who fail to comply with filing requirements or who furnish false or misleading information.

The commission will have access to appropriate Government and corporate records—by subpoena, if necessary.

And above all, this commission will have the power to recover—with interest—on behalf of the taxpayers, contractor profits deemed to be excessive.

This commission, Mr. President, is a mechanism through which we can expect to recover very large amounts of money.

How much?

It is impossible to say, but we do know that hardly a day goes by without some new story surfacing about this or that contractor's efforts to bilk the Federal Treasury.

And we can also be reasonably sure that what we hear about is the tip of the iceberg—that if major, blue chip firms are playing fast and loose with defense and other contracts, then others may well be doing the same.

This bill makes good business sense.

It gives us the opportunity to correct mistakes and to save Federal dollars that would otherwise be lost forever.

And, the existence of a strong Federal fair price commission will say to contractors and to Federal procurement officials something that desperately needs saying—that someone is watching.

The Federal Fair Price Commission is intended to be a literal watchdog of the Treasury.

It is something we need.

And I hope, Mr. President, that we can and will move expeditiously to put it in place.●

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 1589. A bill to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1971 to require institutions of the Farm Credit System to make available to the general public a list of the names of the members and stockholders of such institutions; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

LIST OF MEMBERS AND STOCKHOLDERS OF INSTITUTIONS OF THE FARM CREDIT SYSTEM

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation aimed at helping maintain the control of the Farm Credit System by its farmer borrowers. Simply, this legislation gives members and stockholders of the Farm Credit System the right to obtain, upon request, a list of other members and stockholders within the requester's lending association.

The Farm Credit System was created in order to give farmers a financial vehicle with which they could meet their borrowing needs. The system was set up to be owned and operated by farmers who actually borrow from the various lending associations which make up the Farm Credit System.

It is important to note that much, if not all, of the congressional support for this system has been based upon this unique charactistic as a farmer owned and operated self-help tool. Consequently, it should not be difficult to conclude that movement away from farmer control and away from the primary mission of helping farmers could seriously jeopardize support for this system, not only from Congress but also from farmers and the general public.

Unfortunately, recent decisions made that have a dramatic effect upon farmer borrowers of the Farm Credit System have raised serious questions as to who really controls the system. Farmers have had little or no say in decisions to freeze PCA stock, or to raise Federal Land Bank interest rates. In short, major action and decisions are being made that affect the Farm Credit System yet none of the farmers are being asked beforehand whether or not they approve.

How can we say this is a farmer owned and operated system when farmers are being left out of the decision process?

What is just as alarming is the fact that the farmers who make up the membership and own the stock of their local farm credit lending association or bank, are unable to obtain a list of the other member/stockholders of their association. How can mutual decisions be made when the decisionmakers are barred from communicating with each other? And how can you communicate with each other if you don't even know who the other member/stockholders are?

How many of my colleagues in the Senate would work under those conditions? What if you were expected to vote on legislation, but were not allowed to learn who the sponsors were, or who supported it or opposed it? Without this simple, basic knowledge, how could there exist a free flow of reliable information from which you make your decisions.

There is no legitimate excuse for the present obstructive policies which bar stockholders from learning who their colleagues are. We are not asking for sensitive financial information from the members. The purpose of making names available is simply to enhance the flow of information among those who are suppose to share the responsibility in making decisions affecting the policy and direction of their cooperative as well as the individual member/stockholder. If someone does not want their name made available, then arrangements can be made to accommodate those concerns.

Mr. President, the Farm Credit System is facing very trying times today that will require careful decisions to be made based upon the best possible information and under conditions which maximize communication. I urge my colleagues in joining me in this legislation that will serve as a good first step in that direction.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 1590. A bill to amend the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 to encourage resident management and ownership of public housing; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

RESIDENT MANAGEMENT AND OWNERSHIP OF PUBLIC HOUSING

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, there's no telling what people can accomplish when they don't listen to the experts.

For the last quarter-century or so, the poverty experts have concentrated on failure. Sociologists, psychologists, urban studies directors, criminologists, and others have emphasized losing. Their work—and our public policies—have focused on inability, not ability.

We have started from negative axions; and not surprisingly, we have wound up with negative bottom lines. Why can't poor children learn as well as others? Why do the urban poor have such high crime rates? Why do low-income people in urban areas slide downward into greater dependency?

To answer these questions, we have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in research and experimentation. To implement our purported solutions, we have spent tens of billions of dollars. And to our amazement, we have made very little difference in dealing with the pathology of poverty.

The real poverty experts are those poor people who are finding ways to break out of the cycle of dependency. Instead of asking why poor kids cannot learn, they are showing us that their children, from Newark to Chicago to Los Angeles, can excel when taught with determination, ingenuity, and dedication. So far, the Congress has refused to bring Federal education progams into line with the reality of academic achievement by poor children. This indicates that there is, indeed, a learning problem; but it is right here in Washington, not in poor neighborhoods.

The same is true with regard to low-income housing. The projects, as they are known in every part of the Nation, have been an economic disaster, a political boondoggle, and a social disgrace. They have become symbols of everything wrong with Government's paternalistic approach to the poor: an approach that assumes helplessness, discourages initiative, and fosters dependency. In the process, it wastes staggering amounts of money.

Clearly it is time for some basic reform, for the sake of budget savings and, more important, to achieve practical improvements in the lives of the people who live in Federal housing projects. Having learned a lot from some of them, I am today proposing legislation based on their experience and in line with their aspirations. My bill is designed to facilitate resident management of federally assisted housing projects.

That is not a radical proposal, only a modest innovation. But I would rather take a few solid steps in the right direction than run a mile down a dead-end alley. And that is an apt metaphor for the current direction of our housing programs.

First, let me give credit where due. This legislation embodies not my ideas but the proven accomplishments of those actually living in public housing projects who have demonstrated that resident management of those properties does work. It isn't theory; it's an operational fact.

Almost within sight of the Capitol Building in which I speak, the residents of Kenilworth/Parkside, a 464 unit, inner city complex in Northeast Washington, have shown what a difference they could make when given a chance. From information given to me, I am told resident management at Kenilworth/Parkside has increased rent collections 179 percent by taking charge of finances themselves. That is only one of many improvements. Three years ago, 76 percent of the almost 3,000 residents were getting public assistance. Now less than 50 percent are on welfare. People have reason to work; young people aspire to more education; the facilities are better maintained because the residents are in charge of them. In other words, low-income people are behaving just like everyone else.

That should not be in the least surprising. What is remarkable is that, for so long, Government assumed that the poor either would not or could not make that adaptation. But they are making it in the Bromley-Heath development in Jamaica Plains, MA; in the Cochran project in St. Louis, MO; in the B.W. Cooper project in New Orleans; in the Iroquois Homes development in Louisville, and elsewhere.

This legislation is intended to give them a hand and, even more important, to extend the same chance to residents in other low-income housing projects. It would enable resident management corporations to contract directly with the Department of Housing and Urban Development to secure, on a project basis, their share of the operating subsidy the HUD currently gives to the public housing agency.

For the first 3 years of resident management, that operating subsidy would not be reduced if the residents succeed in increasing the housing project's income by holding down costs and increasing rents. After all, if the residents show they can do a better job, financially, than the public housing agency had been doing, they should not be penalized for their efficiency by losing their operating subsidy. Least of all should that operating subsidy simply be transferred back to the public housing agency, to be spent on poorly managed projects where rents are not collected and operating costs keep going up and up.

If the resident management corporation accrues funds in excess of operating and projects costs during its first 3 years, the money could be retained by the corporation for these purposes: improving maintenance and operation of the housing project, acquiring additional units of low-income housing, or acquiring ownership of the project if that becomes economically—and legally—possible.

This legislaton will provide resident management corporations with flexibility concerning Federal rules and regulations which unnecessarily increase costs. This provision has been included at the advice of tenants themselves, who object to the diversion of tax dollars from urgently needed repairs to redtape and bureaucratic requirements.

Anyone familiar with Federal housing projects know that our modernization efforts have been far less than successful. Here's the problem: When we target the most rundown, neglected, defaced projects for modernization funds, so that new appliances or screendoors or linoleum can be put in, we do nothing to permanently alter the conditions that made those projects the most abused. So in no time at all, the modernized project is back where it started, with the new appliances stolen or broken, the security locks destroyed, the windows smashed.

Conversely, when resident management improves a project, when the tenants themselves improve things and prevent deterioration, their commendable efforts put them farther down on the list for modernization. Because they are trying to keep up the property, they are not considered urgently in need of modernization grants, And so, we penalize desirable conduct and reward negative behavior.

To remedy that, this legislation would require HUD to give priority consideration to resident managed projects in awarding comprehensive modernization funds. It does not guarantee such funding for those projects; they would still have to demonstrate justification for their application. But it would push to the top of the waiting list, so to speak, those housing projects where the residents are most likely to protect the investment of modernization money.

There is much to learn from the resident management corporations that are already in operation. Their participants understand the need for sound training in all aspects of property management. They understand the need for strong bonding requirements and for procedures to make sure that the corporation is run democratically and for the benefit of all residents. They do not want their own success to be undermined by poorly planned enterprises elsewhere. And that is why this legislation specifies in some detail the procedures for setting up a resident management corporation, for training, for insurance, for contracts, and bookkeeping. These are stiff requirements, but they have already been met by those who are making resident management work; and in order to replicate their success elsewhere, we must maintain the high standards they have met for the protection of all involved.

It is equally important to be clear about what this legislation would not do. It does not take the Federal Government out of the housing business. Whatever we may think about the wisdom of current programs, resident management does not terminate any of HUD's activities or eliminate any of its programs.

This bill would not reduce Federal housing expenditures. Whether we want to spend more or less, resident management does not commit us either way.

My proposal does not transfer ownership of any properties away from HUD or from local public housing agencies, though it would permit resident management corporations to use excess revenues, if they should be able to accumulate any, for acquisition of additional units of low-income housing. Personally, I see no reason why qualified residents who aspire to home ownership should not be given every opportunity to fulfill that dream. Time will tell if it is feasible; and at some future time, after assessing the record of resident management, the Congress may want to address the potential for resident ownership. But that issue is apart from the purpose of this bill, which is to assist low-income residents to enter the mainstream of American life.

This bill does not usurp the local role in managing public housing. I frankly think this bill may help public housing authorities to achieve what ultimately is their main objective: to provide well-managed, decent, affordable housing for low-income tenants. In fact, a number of public housing officials have wanted to rid themselves of unnecessary Federal rules and regulations to improve project management. This bill can help achieve this goal.

My proposal would not require resident management in all public housing. That is not practicable in many places. It would not open the door to takeovers of low-income projects; for it provides safeguards by way of training, bonding, and oversight.

This bill is not intended to repudiate the role of public housing agencies within present HUD programs. Some may argue that that role will diminish if more and more subsidized housing is managed by its residents. If tenants learn to deal with community problems, collect more rent than the housing agencies, make their projects cleaner and safer, reduce the need for rehabilitation funds, protect the taxpayers' investment, create project-based self-help groups, train and employ residents for maintenance and repair, generate economic development out of former slums, and move on up the opportunity ladder, then perhaps the role of housing agencies will change. But if resident management does produce those results, then perhaps the role of those agencies should have changed a long time ago.

It is important to keep in mind that the Federal Government pays almost all of the costs of public housing projects. We have an obligation to protect the taxpayer's multibillion dollar investment in those pojects. That is why the Federal Government has always set certain standards, operating conditions, and procedures for the housing agencies that wish to receive these tremendous amounts of Federal money. This legislation sets the condition that they must allow resident management wherever the circumstances clearly warrant it.

If ever there was a grassroots initiative, this is it. And it springs from grassroots that have been trodden upon for a long time. I want to pay tribute to those who, faced with challenges that would have daunted most of us in Congress, have persisted, insisted, and beat the odds against them. Kimi Gray and Gladys Roy at the Kenilworth Courts here in Washington, their counterparts in other parts of the country, and the residents who are helping them reshape life in the housing projects have overcome formidable obstacles. We should learn their example. If they can so greatly improve the operation of federal housing programs, so can the Congress, if we put our minds to it.

Finally, credit should be given to the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise, its president, Bob Woodson, and staff. They have provided a forum for the poor people who, rich in energy and determination, are making resident management work. They have focused national attention, not so much upon the problems of low-income housing, as upon their solutions. They have studied success, not failure. Where others saw a dispossessed proletariat, they have looked for winners, doers, changers, darers. And they have found them, right where they always were: in America, waiting for a chance.

This bill gives them a chance. I ask unanimous consent that its text be printed in the RECORD, along with two newspaper articles explaining the background of this proposal and the successful implementation of resident management in Federal housing.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1590

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States Housing Act of 1937 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"RESIDENT MANAGEMENT

"SEC. 20. (a) The purpose of this section is to encourage increased resident management of public housing projects by providing for projects which are managed by residents increased flexibility by (1) waiving certain statutory and regulatory requirements, (2) giving such projects a priority for comprehensive improvement assistance, and (3) permitting the retention and use for certain purposes of any excess of revenues over operating and project costs.

"(b) The Secretary may not enter into or renew a contract with a public housing agency unless the Secretary finds that the public housing agency is making all reasonable efforts to encourage the assumption of project management responsibilities by resident management corporations established in accordance with this section. For the purpose of making the finding in the preceding sentence, the Secretary shall require public housing agencies to give residents of public housing projects an opportunity to submit comments prior to entering into a contract with respect to those projects.

"(c)(1) As a condition of entering into a resident management program, a majority of the adult residents of a public housing project must approve the establishment of a residents council to determine the feasibility of establishing a resident management corporation to manage the project.

"(2) The residents council and the public housing agency shall jointly select a qualified and certified management specialist to assist in determining the feasibility of, and to help establish, a resident manager corporation.

"(3) Prior to assuming any management responsibilities for a public housing project, the resident management corporation must provide fidelity bonding and insurance, or equivalent protection, in accordance with regulations by the Secretary and the public housing agency. Such bonding and insurance, or its equivalent, shall be adequate to protect the Secretary and the public housing agency against loss, theft, embezzlement, or fraudlent acts on the part of the resident management corporation or its employees.

"(4) A resident management corporation which has qualified and supplied insurance and bonding or equivalent protection sufficient to the Secretary and the public housing agency may enter into a contract with the public housing agency establishing respective management rights and responsibilities of the corporation and the agency, including specific terms governing management personnel, access to project records, submission of and adherence to budgets, rent collection procedures, tenant income verification, tenant eligibility determinations, tenant eviction, the acquisition of supplies and materials, and such other matters as may be appropriate. For the purpose of this paragraph, the Secretary is authorized to develop and encourage the use of a model contract.

"(5) The books and records of a resident management corporation operating a public housing project shall be audited annually by a certified public accountant and a written report of such audit shall be forwarded to the public housing agency and the Secretary.

"(d)(1) The Secretary is authorized to publish a list of those Federal requirements which unnecessarily increase project costs or restrict project income, and which, at the option of the resident management corporation, may be waived with respect to the public housing project managed by that resident management corporation. The list of requirements which may be waived shall include the applicability of section 12 of this Act to the project, of minimum property standards prescribed by the Secretary (but only if local property standards are followed), and of such other operating and managerial requirements as the Secretary may specify.

"(2) Notwithstanding any provision of section 9 or any rule or regulation thereunder, the operating subsidy for a project managed by a resident management corporation shall be determined on an individual project basis and on the basis of statistical information from the two years preceding the year in which the subsidy is being determined. The subsidy amount so established for such a project may not be reduced during the first three years of management by the resident management corporation.

"(3) Any excess of project revenues over operating costs and project costs of a public housing project managed by a resident management corporation may be retained by the resident management corporation for the purposes of—

"(A) improving the maintenance and operation of the project;

"(B) acquiring ownership of the project; and

"(C) acquiring additional units of housing for lower income persons.

"(e) Public housing projects managed by resident management corporations shall be given a priority in the allocation of assistance under section 14.".

[From the Washington Times, May 17, 1985]

A SUCCESSFUL TEST OF THE AGENDA IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

(By Richard Vigilante)

It is no surprise that the future of American public housing policy is being decided inside Washington, D.C. But it might be a surprise that in an important sense it's being decided just barely inside Washington, D.C. not downtown, where the politicans meet the policy pros, but in a questionable neighborhood one step from the Maryland border, where sits a public housing project that three years ago was known as one of the worst in the city.

The project is called Kenilworth-Parkside, and it is already famous in the policy community. Though there are others like it around the country, its phenomenal success and fortunate location have made it Exhibit A of the "housing radicals."

This merry band, mostly think-tankers and Hill staffers is convinced the solution to the disastrous state of public housing is to turn the projects over to the experts—the residents, most of whom are on welfare and some of whom have never held regular jobs or acquired marketable skills or even decent work habits. And odd choice of personnel to run, and eventually own, a multimillion-dollar piece of real estate. If Kenilworth-Parkside is a fair example, it works.

Three years ago, Kenilworth-Parkside was everything the phrase "the projects" has come to mean; Considered simply as housing, it was a disaster. Heat and hot water were the exception, not the rule. The most routine maintenance was neglected, and vandalism and tenant abuse made maintenance pointless, anyway. Rents were neither willingly paid nor vigorously collected and the project lost hordes of money.

As a community it was even worse; overrun by drugs, crime, despair, and fear; 85 percent of the residents relied chiefly on government largess for their income, 30 percent were totally dependent, teen-age pregnancies were frequent.

In 1982, the residents of the project decided that living conditions had crossed into the intolerable zone. They formed their own management corporation, elected a board of directors from among the residents, and convinced the city to let them run the place.

Within two years they radically improved living conditions; restored regular heat and hot water, patched up leaky roofs and other gross physical defects, cut operating costs 60 percent, and raised rent receipts 13 percent.

So much anyone who understand incentives might have predicted since the managers live in the project, they suffer when the heat goes off. But in those two years crime also dropped 75 percent, resident income rose substantially, and welfare dependency and teen-age pregnancies were reduced by half though essentially the same people were living there as in 1982.

The evidence indicates that over these broad social changes are directly attributable to the resident takeover.

The story of the transformational Kenilworth-Parkside could fill a book, though as told by Kimi Gray, the Kenilworth resident who heads the board of directors, it would be a novel, not a doctoral thesis. The theme would be straightforward—the end of childhood.

Current public housing programs, along with most welfare programs, assume their clients are part of an "underclass," not merely poor, but socially deranged members of a culture that attaches, as one theorist put it "no value to work, sacrifice, self-improvement, or service to family, friends, or community." But a similar description might be made of very young children—notoriously, though innocently, selfish because everything is done for them.

The Kenilworth experience suggests the "underclass" theorists who design welfare programs have it backwards. Residents of public housing and other government dependence behave irresponsibly because all responsibility has been taken from them.

According to Kimi Gray, Kenilworth residents behave responsibly because they have responsibility: they are self-governing, making their own rules and enforcing them.

Break a window? Pay a fine, enforced by the residents. Poor people can't afford to pay fines? "Wrong," says Kimi, "Poor people can't afford to break windows." Don't cut your grass? Management will cut it and send you a bill. Let your kids "hang out" all day causing trouble instead of going to school? You'll be reported to the authorities and if you don't straighten out your kid you'll be evicted. There have only been two evictions.

This is not totalitarianism—middle-class people live under similar restraints. Indeed at Kenilworth the rules are so cherished by the community they work more like the status restraints of middle-class neighborhoods than like citations from a lawbook.

One reason welfare dependency has declined is that all the work of the projects from running the furnaces to fixing the roofs, is done by resident employees. More importantly, self management has created a community, and in that community "watching soap operas all day and collecting welfare" is not acceptable behavior. Crime has dropped 75 percent because the community defends itself—one of the principal social activities at Kenilworth seems to be watching the street and calling the police.

The next step, the residents hope, will be the ultimate responsibility, ownership, first by management collectively and then by those residents who wish and, with subsidies, could afford to buy their units co-op style.

Public policy analyst Cicero Wilson, who has studied Kenilworth-Parkside closely for the American Enterprise Institute, points out that as tenants, public housing residents are encouraged to be irresponsible.

As their incomes rise, their rents rise, discouraging work. Indeed, income increases can eventually force them out of their homes. The current system guarantees that the most responsible residents of the community will be punished or forced to leave.

With ownership as a goal, tenants would have an incentive to raise their incomes and protect their homes—like adults in the real world, not children sentenced to the welfare nursery.

Ownership is the ultimate goal of the housing radicals. Rumor has it that mild-manner HUD Secretary Sam Pierce has radical blood in his veins. Let's hope.

CARVING A PLANK

(By D. W. Nauss)

Two decades ago, when he was leading civil rights marches in West Chester, Pa., Robert Woodson never thought that someday he would be contributing to the Republican Party's platform.

But Woodson's ideas on self-help incentives leading to home ownership for public housing residents were incorporated this week into the party's plank by the Subcommittee on Community and Neighborhood Resources.

"It's very heartwarming," said Woodson, president of the non-profit National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise in Washington, D.C. "I hope this will become part of the national political debate."

Woodson, 47, has gained some national attention as a black conservative and for endorsing the belief that the way to help minorities and the poor is through self-sufficiency and less federal control of poverty programs.

Although he is vague on how low-income residents would buy public housing projects, he suggested a voucher system could be used in which assistance payments could be applied as mortgage payments.

His views make most Republicans smile.

"What he expounded was historical Republican philosophy—government helping people gain their economic independence," said Susan Auld, a delegate from Vermont.

"I am enthusiastic about this," said South Carolina delegate Elmer Rumminger, referring to Woodson's public housing proposal. "This could be one of the most dramatic things to come out of this convention."

Rumminger was so impressed that he invited Woodson to lunch with a dozen other delegates after Woodson testified before the community resources subcommitee. The luncheon resulted in an invitation for Woodson to draft a proposal for the GOP plank.

Woodson, who calls himself a conservative independent, said Democratic poverty programs have been a failure despite the infusion of billions of dollars. Republicans have adopted a "low-budget Great Society" program using the same ideas but less money, he said.

"The real answer to poverty is not some welfare dependency program," he said. "It's a ladder to help us walk out of the canyons of despair."

Woodson, who holds a master's degree in sociology from the University of Pennsylvania, said past poverty programs depended on massive expenditures. Professional social workers or social scientists decided how the money would be spent, not the poor people affected, he said.

But in several housing projects around the country, poor people have demonstrated they can improve their living conditions if given the opportunity to make major management decisions, Woodson said.

The next step is to provide residents of public housing projects an opportunity to buy the units where they live.

Woodson's journey to the Dallas Convention Center completes an ideological trip from the far left 20 years ago to the conservative right today.

Active in the civil rights movement of the early 1960s, he broke with mainstream black leaders over the issue of housing, which he opposed. He also worked several years as a social worker in Boston.

Today, he calls himself a "reconstructed social worker" and criticizes their role in the poverty cycle.

"The big hypocrisy is being played out by the poverty industry, consisting of professional social workers and scientists," he said. "They engage in a bait-and-switch games, using the condition of the poor to obtain money and then consume most of the money themselves."

HOUSING TENANTS EXPERIMENT WITH SELF-GOVERNMENT

(By Arthur S. Brisbane)

Every weekday morning about 7:30 Gladys Roy leaves her apartment at the Kenilworth Courts public housing project and walks to work, keeping an eye out for unmowed front yards in the sprawling complex. An unkempt lawn means she'll fine the tenant.

Crossing Quarles Street, where the junkies will hang out later in the day, Roy enters the offices of the Kenilworth-Parkside Resident Management Corp, and gets a whiff of the strong cleanser her staff uses to scour away the dirty residue of neglect.

She takes her seat behind the manager's desk. For two decades, the 52-year-old mother of nine was just one of the many welfare recipients living at Kenilworth. Now she runs the project and makes $17,000 a year doing it.

She and her staff have not converted Kenilworth Courts and its smaller sister project, Parkside, into anything like paradise. But they are making a case that tenants can fight poverty and perhaps run government housing better than the government can.

They are part of the District's first experiment in tenant management, in which the residents are managing and running their 25-year-old public housing complex. They appear to have halted somewhat the marked deterioration of their homes and, in so doing, have brought jobs to the project and income to its residents.

One of fewer than 10 such operations in the country, the resident management program at Kenilworth, begun in 1982, receives mostly favorable reviews from some housing experts and federal Housing and Urban Development officials. District housing officials and some Kenilworth residents are more restrained in their assessment, however, and they suggest that claims made by the resident managers and their supporters may be overstated.

"I think it is one of the most successful in the country, in my experience of going around the country and looking at seven or eight of them," said Robert Woodson, president of the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise, an organization that studies housing and other issues.

"Our general view is that it is working," said Ken Beirne, general deputy assistant secretary for HUD's policy development and research department. "The question of all the reasons why it is working I don't think has been resolved yet."

The District's Housing and Community Development department, which gave the management contract to tenants, appears to have adopted a wait-and-see attitude toward resident management.

"It's a concept that we do support, and it's one we do want to work with residents to expand," said Madeline M. Petty, department director." . . . On the surface it appears that it is something that we want to do."

Directed by a board of residents, the Kenilworth-Parkside managers head a staff of 30 residents hired to prepare the budget, collect the rent and perform the maintenance on the 464 units where 2,500 persons live in the far Northeast section of the District.

Through stricter enforcement, the resident managers have increased rent collections 179 percent, according to a report the American Enterprise Institute is compiling on the resident-management experiment.

On-site administrative costs have dropped 60 percent, the report says, and expenditures for routine maintenance have declined 20 percent since March 1982, when the residents took over from Central City Property Management Co., a private firm under contract with the city to run Kenilworth.

Yet even as the residents win battles, they discover new enemies. A recent increase in drug dealers and users, rousted by police from other areas of the city, demonstrates the affinity between public housing and some of society's most intractable ills.

And inside the project, not every resident is enamored of the new management headed by Kimi Gray, the 40-year-old spark plug and board chairman of the Kenilworth-Parkside Resident Management Corp.

Some residents, such as Jacqueline Robinson, think Kenilworth is much improved. "You could say it has picked up since the tenants took over," she said. But, then, her brother Garcia Robinson got a job with the resident management corporation.

Willie Mae James, who lives in a five-bedroom unit with 12 relatives, said, "I think it has gotten a little better but not too much. When they fix things, they don't stay fixed."

Her daughter, Neicy James, added, "They are too strict. They check on you. They see who's living here. They put your rent up, if you make more money. . . . If they see trash in your yard, they fine you for it—even if it's not yours."

Some tenants give the management good marks for maintenance but say they are frustrated by the crime problem. "No, they don't need those people [resident managers]," said Eleanor Farley. "They need somebody to do something about the drugs in the street."

Fred Thomas, deputy police chief for the 6th District, said his officers arrested 50 to 60 persons on drug charges last month at Kenilworth. Most of them were not residents. "They just come there to ply their trade," he said.

Thomas credits the residents with helping police discourage drug traffickers, who are attracted to the wooded areas and the sanctuary afforded by the nearby Maryland state line.

"If we didn't have help from them," he said, "it would be a heck of a lot worse situation."

Meanwhile officials at the city's housing department question whether the experiment is as successful as it is portrayed by Gray and the American Enterprise Institute.

Petty expressed doubt that the numbers cited by Gray and the institute are accurate and said her department was compiling its own statistics. She declined to release any data on rent collection, maintainance and administrative costs at Kenilworth-Parkside.

In similar experiments elsewhere, experts have reported tensions between tenant management groups and public housing authorities.

"There are some housing authorities that in fact have fear that they will lose control if they give residents more say in what's going on," said Clyde McHenry, a housing consultant who helped train the Kenilworth managers.

McHenry headed the New Orleans public housing authority and was later named an assistant secretary at HUD for public housing during the Carter administration.

Phil Abrams, a former HUD undersecretary, recalled that District housing officials in 1983 chose not to seek funds actively to completely renovate tenant-managed Kenilworth Courts. Abrams, the official responsible for doing out those funds, bypassed the city's list of priorities and designated $13.2 million for Kenilworth-Parkside.

"Mayor Barry had always been supportive [of resident management]," said Abrams, now a real estate developer in Denver, "but the bureaucracy in the housing authority was somewhat reticent and, I think, somewhat threatened by the success of tenant management. So they made the judgment, in applying for modernization funds, that there were other projects that were in worse shape than Kenilworth."

HUD has not released the funds for the modernization project, which was announced in October 1983. "The money is supposed to go to Kenilworth," a HUD spokesman said.

"But we are waiting to put in place a series of meetings that need to happen before decisions can be made."

When the rehabilitation project starts, the resident management corporation will become a partner with Gilbane/Smoot, a contractor and construction management corporation formed by the Gilbane Building Co. Gilbane/Smoot and the tenants will oversee the construction work.

The city's Housing and Community Development Department will retain the power to let contracts for the project, but Gray believes that the joint partnership will provide more jobs to Kenilworth residents.

Opened 25 years ago, Kenilworth was built to provide housing for some of the District residents displaced by the urban renewal of Southwest.

Parkside, a 42-unit housing project erected in 1940, was merged with Kenilworth Courts at the time of Kenilworth's opening.

In the years that followed, Kenilworth shared the fate of many big city public housing projects. Many welfare-dependent residents did not pay their rent regularly. The city failed to maintain the property properly, and it became run down. According to residents, there was little, if any, heat and hot water during 1979, 1980 and 1981. Rats were everywhere.

Meanwhile, Kimi Gray and her supporters were taking note of tenant groups in cities such as St. Louis, Boston and New Orleans that were experimenting in the 1970s with resident management of public housing.

Resident management, Gray came to believe, "gives residents back the responsibility of taking care of their community. It provides jobs. Maintenance calls are answered within 24 hours. The engineer lives on the grounds. When the heat goes out, he becomes cold, too."●

By Mr. LEVIN (for himself and Mr. RIEGLE):

S. 1591. A bill to recognize the organization known as the American Philatelic Society; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMERICAN PHILATELIC SOCIETY

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, with Senator RIEGLE, to grant a Federal charter to the American Philatelic Society, a nonprofit corporation headquartered in State College, PA. Identical legislation, House Joint Resolution 2097, has already been introduced by Representative MORRISON.

The American Philatelic Society is the largest organization of stamp collecters in the United States. The society currently has 53,000 members who collect post and revenue stamps, first-day covers, and participate in other philatelic activities. Next year, the American Philatelic Society will observe its centennial. This is therefore a particularly appropriate time for the Congress to grant the society a Federal charter.

Mr. President, as one who has long enjoyed the hobby of stamp collecting, I am pleased to sponsor this resolution and I urge my colleagues to support it.●

By Mr. BINGAMAN:

S. 1592. A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to require that petitioners may elect whether price or constructed value is used in determining the foreign market value of merchandise imported from foreign state-controlled economies; to the Committee on Finance.

TARIFF ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today to improve the administration of the antidumping duty laws dealing with imports from nonmarket economy countries. The level of imports from these countries is substantial—$5.2 billion in 1984—often undercutting the more vulnerable industries in the United States, and significantly contributing to the decline in our competitive position. Only by improving our trade remedy laws can we insure that our industries have a fair trade climate in which to compete. Before I describe the legislation, let me explain why it is necessary.

BACKGROUND

One of the U.S. industries severely affected by imports from nonmarket economy countries has been the potash industry centered in Carlsbad, NM. The industry is in trouble. Employment has dropped by one-third in just over 3 years. The industry's decline has been caused by several factors, including the recession, the PIK program, and increased competition from Canadian producers. However, one of the most serious causes of injury to the industry is subsidized and dumped potash entering the declining American market from the U.S.S.R. and East Germany and priced at a steep discount off the prevailing price. It is clear that the industry is suffering heavily from the effects on prices of these unfairly priced imports. There have not only been lost sales, but the unfairly priced imports have lowered prices along the coast and on the Mississippi and caused serious financial setbacks. Recent inadequate actions by the Department of Commerce and the International Trade Commission in response to this problem make it clear that remedial legislation is needed to improve our trade laws.

The domestic potash industry filed antidumping petitions against both the Soviet Union and East Germany. To determine if potash is being sold at less than fair value, the statute says the Department must establish the "normal value" of the Russian and East German potash in their internal markets "on the basis of normal costs, expenses and profits." The Department was correct in trying to use West German internal prices to establish that normal value in the Soviet Union and East Germany. Unfortunately, the West German producer, having agreed to cooperate, at the last minute refused to supply the necessary data. The Department of Commerce then drifted to more unsatisfactory and irrelevant alternatives—France, England—and ended up in the closing hours of the case using realizations from a Canadian export sales combine. The Canadian export prices are far less relevant than West German prices or any of the other alternatives recommended by the industry. These alternatives—constructed costs or price data from customers in West Germany—would have come closer to meeting the intent of the statute. Further, the domestic industry was not given an opportunity to point out obvious problems and calculation errors in the Department's analysis, before the statutory deadline.

The final result seems ludicrous: Preliminary determinations made last September showed dumping margins at 187 percent for the Soviet Union and 112 percent for East Germany. With a change in data based on availability, not relevance, the Department of Commerce concluded that there was no dumping by East Germany and an extraordinarily low margin of only 1.77 percent by the Soviet Union. The margin is the foreign market value minus the U.S. price received for foreign imports.

In the case of the Soviet Union, the Department's final determination means that Soviet potash exports could be assessed only a 1.77-percent duty upon entering the United States, and no duty could be assessed for East Germany. It is not surprising that the ITC ruled that no injury existed from either country. Something about our trade remedy laws is clearly not working.

Additional examples from other industries can be cited where the same problem of having to rely on unreliable data from nonsimilar economies exists. These include the classic case of golf carts from Poland. The Department of Commerce first was led to Canadian data and then had to create a fictional factory in Spain to determine what the normal value was of Polish golf carts in the Polish economy. We also have seen the economy of Paraguay used as a surrogate for the economy of China in a menthol case. In a case involving shop towels from China, Commerce pursued pricing leads in Pakistan, Malaysia, Hong Kong, the Dominican Republic, and Colombia and finally used import prices into the United States, 48 hours before the statutory deadline. Clearly, none of these comparisons were satisfactory.

The procedures, actual practices, and the final results of this process force me to conclude that our present laws and system of trade remedies are simply not being reasonably enforced by the Department. Perhaps, to be fair, these laws cannot be enforced in a completely satisfactory way. The legislation I offer today would arm the Commerce Department with the statutory authority to more fairly evaluate petitions against nonmarket or controlled economies and give it greater latitude to use the best information available.

LEGISLATION

The Department of Commerce has taken the position that the countervailing duty law does not apply to nonmarket economy countries. Therefore the antidumping duty law is the sole unfair trade law that the Department is prepared to enforce against the nonmarket economy countries. The question of whether the countervailing duty law effectively applies to these countries has been under review by the Court of International Trade (Continental Steel et. al. v. U.S.; AMAX et. al. v. U.S., CIT No. 84-05-00728). The court has just decided that the countervailing duty law does apply to nonmarket economies. The Government will appeal to the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, in all probability, with a request that further administrative proceedings be stayed pending that appellate decision. I believe, as the Court of International Trade does, that the countervailing duty law is absolutely comprehensive in coverage, both as to countries and government practices that may induce exports. But domestic industries are presently faced with the unfortunate situation in which there is only one remedy, the antidumping duty law, to evaluate the fairness of pricing from the nonmarket economies. And that statute does not work very effectively.

I have designed this bill to use acceptable existing practices to a large extent, without attempting to develop an entirely new concept for measuring the fairness of export pricing by centrally planned economies. Wholesale revision of the existing concepts was unsuccessfully attempted in the omnibus legislation that became the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984. My bill preserves the present Commerce Department goal of identifying a comparable market economy, or surrogate economy, to establish foreign market value.

However, the bill requires that the Department, at an early stage in the investigation, decide which market economy will be used for, first, home market price analysis; second, export price analysis, and third, constructed value. The Commerce Department would have to choose the best surrogate economy for each of these possible lines of analysis and justify its choice. Once the choice is made by the Department of Commerce, the petitioners have the right to elect which line of analysis will be used in the investigation. That would end the Department of Commerce practice of choosing a laundry list of countries and not deciding which country's data to use until late in the proceedings—to the detriment of the accuracy, fairness, and completeness of the investigation. The petitioners would also be able to decide, based on their knowledge of the foreign industry, whether constructed values or prices more fairly reflect the "normal costs, expenses and profits" associated with production in the nonmarket economy.

Sometimes petitioners know there are distortions in the home market or in the export markets of a surrogate market economy country. But they have limited means and time to prove to the Commerce Department, in a series of mini cases within an investigation, that these prices do not reflect the normal situation the statute seeks to establish. Therefore, in my bill, the petitioners are given the right to elect conceptually how the investigation will proceed.

The Commerce Department has never decided what the hierarchy of economic criteria is in choosing a surrogate country. And the statute is silent. That gap is filled in my bill by making comparability of economies the primary factor in the choice of surrogate market economy. Only if it is necessary to decide between quite similar market economies may the Department compare sectors or analogs in actual manufacturing facilities. The bill seeks to end choices reached primarily on the technical similarity of production—the supply side of the overall analysis—because such claims tend to ignore entirely the demand side. They ignore, for example, the local demand for the commodity, and whether the countries are export oriented or insulated from the forces of the international economy. Also, the focus by the Department of Commerce from time to time on the technical similarity of production ignores the fact that costs of inputs are as important as the physical use of inputs.

Finally, the bill directs the Department of Commerce to use verifiable information, if possible, once a surrogate country and line of analysis have been selected, but as an alternative, to use the best information available. It ends the tail-wagging-the-dog situation that has come to exist, in which the Department draws up extensive lists of possible surrogate countries and descends far down the list and far from true economic comparability in an effort to secure verifiable data. Administrative experience at the Department of Commerce has been that foreign manufacturers not directly involved in antidumping proceedings have little interest in making their confidential costs and price data available. Indeed, if they do, they may expose themselves to the risk of trade action against them. It is poor practice to give predominant importance to the acquisition of verifiable information over the comparability of the surrogate economy. The bill avoids those situations where the availability or nonavailability of particular information has become critical to the outcome of the case—as was the situation of West German data in the potash cases. And it avoids interference with the investigation process by a party suppressing price or cost information.

CONCLUSION

As the international trade environment becomes more complex and competitive, it is imperative to apply effective remedies to deal with unfair competition from nonmarket economies. We have an existing set of remedies for dealing with unfair trade practices by market-oriented economies. It is only fair to have a similar system for nonmarket economies. I believe my legislation brings more equity to the trade remedy process, and I encourage my colleagues to support the bill.●

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself and Mr. BRADLEY):

S. 1593. A bill to direct the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to conduct a national assessment of the extent to which radon gas formed from naturally occurring deposits of uranium is a threat to public health, to authorize a demonstration program to test methods of eliminating the threat to public health from radon gas, and to authorize disaster relief assistance for releases of radon gas; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

RADON ASSESSMENT AND REDUCTION ACT

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Radon Assessment and Reduction Act of 1985. A companion bill is being introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman EDGAR. I am pleased to be joined by Senator BRADLEY as cosponsor.

Radon is just now being recognized as one of the major threats to public health facing us today. Environmental Protection Agency figures estimate that the number of lung cancer deaths annually due to radon exposure could be as high as 20,000. The Committee on Indoor Air Quality, an interagency research group including representatives of the EPA, Department of Energy, Department of Housing and Urban Development, Tennessee Valley Authority, and National Bureau of Standards, has put this figure as high as 30,000. This would place radon among the top 10 causes of death in the country.

Radon is a gas naturally emitted from uranium and radium found in hard rock and granite. It can travel for miles underground, and reaches the surface through fissures and porous soils. Radon can also reach the surface through ground water supplies. When emitted into the atmosphere, radon dissipates, and causes no health hazard to humans. However, when radon enters a home, due to restricted ventilation, it concentrates, reaching levels which can be a serious hazard to health. Efforts to improve insulation and conserve energy serve to increase radon concentration.

A geologic formation known as the Reading Prong has been found to emit high levels of radon. The Reading Prong extends from eastern Pennsylvania through northern New Jersey into western New York State. Some 20,000 homes located over the Reading Prong in Pennsylvania have been found to be at high risk of radon contamination. It is estimated that at least 80,000 homes in New Jersey face a similar risk.

Fortunately, the means of alleviating radon contamination are relatively simple. However, the costs of retrofitting a home to eliminate hazardous radon contamination can be quite high, with estimates beginning at $1,000. A home in Pennsylvania, found to have the highest radon concentration ever detected in a home in the United States, was retrofitted at a cost of over $30,000.

At present, such substantial costs would have to be borne in whole by the homeowner. Insurance would not provide coverage, and there is no existing mechanism for assistance on the Federal level.

This bill would provide relief to eligible homeowners incurring the costs associated with radon-reduction measures. By classifying radon and radon daughters as natural disasters under the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, it would make homeowners eligible for direct Federal assistance through the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA]. Under FEMA programs, homeowners and businesses would be eligible to receive low interest loans for repairs instituted to eliminate radon exposure. Temporary housing could also be provided to affected residents. This relief would come out of existing FEMA funds, and would not require additional appropriation for radon mitigation measures.

The bill would also direct the EPA to conduct a national assessment of the extent of the hazards posed nationally by naturally occurring radon. The Agency would have to report back to Congress its findings within 1 year of enactment of the bill.

Mr. President, this bill also authorizes a $4 million demonstration program in EPA to test methods of eliminating radon gas from homes over the next 3 fiscal years. This demonstration program, to be conducted within the Reading Prong and any other sites deemed suitable by the EPA, directs the EPA to assess existing mitigation technologies in place, and develop new technologies based on this assessment. Through prompt implementation of the demonstration program, we would begin alleviation of this deadly hazard for those persons found to be at the greatest risk. Annual reports to Congress would be required detailing the progress of the demonstration program. The first of these reports is due in September 1986.

Mr. President, the extent of the radon problem throughout our country is just now being realized. Based upon very limited studies, it is estimated that at least 1 million homes nationwide may be afflicted with hazardous radon contamination.

Radon contamination is a problem that could inflict not only serious health problems, but also considerable financial hardship. Millions of citizens throughout the country could be afflicted with the hardships of radon contamination. Many will be unable to afford the repairs necessary to reduce exposure to carcinogenic radon, and will be forced to continue living in a highly dangerous indoor atmosphere. This bill will take positive, immediate steps to alleviate radon exposure, and will provide the financial assistance to enable citizens to safeguard themselves from continued exposure to the hazardous gas.

Mr. President, the Radon Assessment and Reduction Act of 1985 addresses a matter of serious and growing concern throughout our country, and I urge my colleagues to support the bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and recent articles from newspapers in New Jersey be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1593

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Radon Assessment and Reduction Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. NATIONAL ASSESSMENT OF RADON GAS.

(a) NATIONAL ASSESSMENT.—The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Administrator") shall—

(1) identify the locations in populated areas in the United States where radon gas and radon daughters are forming from naturally occurring deposits of uranium and are collecting in residences and other structures;

(2) assess for each location identified under paragraph (1) the amounts of radon gas and radon daughters that are forming and the amounts that are present in residences and other structures; and

(3) determine the level of radon gas and radon daughters which poses a threat to human health and assess for each location identified under paragraph (1) the extent of the threat to human health.

(b) REPORT.—The Administrator shall submit a report to Congress on the results of the assessment conducted under subsection (a) not later than one year after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 3. DEMONSTRATION PROGRAM.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Administrator shall conduct a demonstration program to test methods of reducing or eliminating the threat to public health of radon gas and radon daughters. Such methods shall include venting of residences and other structures and any other methods the Administrator determines may be effective in reducing or eliminating such threat. The demonstration program under this section shall be conducted at the Reading Prong, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and at such other sites as the Administrator considers appropriate.

(b) REPORT.—The Administrator shall submit interim reports not later than September 30, 1986, and September 30, 1987, on the status of the demonstration program carried out under this section. The Administrator shall submit a final report on the results of such program not later than December 31, 1988.

(c) AUTHORIZATION.—There is authorized to be appropriated for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 a total of $4,000,000 to carry out this section.

SEC. 4. INCLUSION WITHIN DISASTER RELIEF PROGRAM.

Section 102 of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 (42 U.S.C. 5122) is amended by inserting "release of radon gas and radon daughters," after "explosion," in paragraphs (1) and (2).

RADON TESTS DUE IN N.J. WITHIN YEAR

(By Janny Scott)

It is likely to be a year before New Jersey begins systematic testing of radiation levels in houses on the Reading Prong, the three-state rock formation that has prompted Pennsylvania to begin a sampling of 21,000 homes.

New Jersey environmental officials have rejected the kind of "random sampling" being done in Pennsylvania, where officials say nearly half the homes tested so far have levels of cancer-causing radon that should be reduced.

"An area as large as you're talking about has to be narrowed down in scope," George Klenk, a state environmental spokesman, said yesterday. "You can't just go out and start sampling."

The Reading Prong extends from Reading, Pa., through northern New Jersey and into New York State. It passes through parts of seven counties, including most of Passaic and Morris, and a small section of Bergen.

The formation contains extensive uranium deposits. Pennsylvania officials believe the deposits are responsible for the elevated levels of radon, a radioactive gas that can cause lung cancer after long exposure.

Pennsylvania officials discovered the first, and worst, case last December: In a house near Reading they found levels 675 times higher than the level at which they recommend remedial action.

Since then, the Department of Environmental Resources (DER) has tested 1,600 homes in the Pennsylvania portion of the Prong. Officials figure the program will take up to 18 months to complete.

STRATEGY TO BE DEVELOPED

Klenk said New Jersey will hire a consultant to study the geology of the area and develop "a scientific strategy for a nonrandom sampling of radon in the area."

The Department of Environmental Protection hopes to invite bids by the end of the month. Consultants will have a month to bid, then the state will have a month to choose. The study is likely to take nine months, Klenk said.

"Random sampling has already been shown to be not as accurate as it should be," Klenk said. He pointed out that Pennsylvania has found that houses right next to each other have had widely divergent radon levels.

In the meantime, authorities in the newly discovered and little-understood field of indoor air pollution yesterday described several steps people can take to check their houses.

They said radon levels can usually be lowered through relatively small and inexpensive alterations, such as improving ventilation inside and under the house, and sealing cracks in the the basement.

Private testing costs about $50 and can take up to three months for a reliable reading. While consultants said repairs cost several thousand dollars at most, a state official said they can go as high as $20,000.

"The main point is it's almost always possible to fix the house and bring the levels down to an acceptable point," said Dr. Joel J. Nobel, MD, of the National Indoor Environmental Institute in Plymouth Meeting, Pa., a group of consultants that advises homeowners on how to reduce radon levels.

In Pennsylvania and New Jersey, officials are referring interested homeowners to Terradex Corporation of Walnut Creek, Calif., believed to be the only private company offering radon testing and analysis.

The company will send homeowners one or more pillbox-sized detectors to station in their basements and living quarters for one to three months, H. Ward Alter, the president of Terradex, said yesterday.

The radon gas leaves tiny tracks on a plastic chip in each detector, Alter said. Homeowners return the detectors to the company, which counts the tracks under a microscope and estimates the average concentrations in the house.

With concentrations above a certain level, Alter said his firm refers homeowners to contractors capable of recommending modifications in the house. The testing and analysis cost $50 for one detector and $80 for two.

The margin of error is 20 percent, said Alter, a physical chemist previously employed by General Electric. The device, developed by General Electric, has been used in environmental testing for about six years.

Nobel said his institute recommends people make changes within their home if they find radon levels of four to five picocuries per liter of air—though authorities differ on what levels necessitate action, and there are no standards for safe exposures in the home.

He said one common technique involves subsurface ventilation—installing blowers to enable the subterranean gas to escape from under the house and dissipate in the outdoor air rather than seep into the house.

He and others also recommended increasing household ventilation through such simple methods as opening windows, and sealing cracks in foundations, drains and sumps.

According to officials, randon can be found in most houses. A naturally occuring product of the decay of uranium, it moves easily through small spaces such as those between particles of soil and rock.

In older houses, with cracks and drafts, the radon and the dangerous byproducts of its composition do not collect in the house. But weatherization and the airtight construction of an energy-conscious era have made the houses built in the past 10 to 15 years radon traps.

There are no standards for dangerous levels in homes. The federal government and some states recommend action at certain levels, but they are drawn from standards for miners, who work under very different conditions.

The risk estimates, too, are based on the experience of miners. Studies have found high rates of lung cancer among uranium miners. But there are no data on the effects of long-term household exposures.

Yesterday, officials stressed that a location on a rock foundation like the Reading Prong does not necessarily mean a house will have high radon levels.

The construction of the house, the type of soil beneath it, the distance from a uranium deposit, and the life style of the residents are among the factors that can affect radon levels.

"One can have a house with low levels immediately adjuacent to a house with high levels," said Nobel.

In Pennsylvania, the state has distributed booklets showing how to reduce radon levels in 24 types of houses, and is trying to arrange for courses at local vocational and technical high schools, said Bruce Dallas of the DER.

"We're telling them that there's not an immediate health risk," Dallas said. He said short-term exposure is not believed to pose a threat, "but a long-term exposure really raises the likelihood of lung cancer."

One scientist widely considered an expert in radon said he found high levels in his house. Instead of moving out, he said he has been "studying it for a year and a half" and "treating it as a lab."

Suggesting that the media may have exaggerated the risks of low-level radiation, he said he is not concerned about his health. However, he asked not to be identified because his wife does not like people to know.

But Nobel, who found high levels in his house and has taken steps to bring them down, said, "Since the problem is relativley easy to get rid of, it would seem foolish to wait 20 to 25 years for castastrophic data."

WORRIED HOMEOWNERS CAN PURCHASE DETECTOR TO TEST FOR DEADLY RADON

(By Sarah Strohmeyer)

Homeowners who are concerned about the presence of radon in their homes can conduct their own tests for the lethal gas before the state begins testing in at least five central and northern New Jersey counties this summer.

The state Department of Environmental Protection was flooded with phone calls yesterday about the threat of radon gas and its division of air quality assigned a group of staff scientists to answer the inquiries, a spokemsan said.

A Calfornia company manufactures the only commercially available radon gas detector. The devise, which is used by the federal Envrionmental Protection Agency, is available to indivdiual homeowners for $50.

Dr. H. Ward Alter, president of Terradex Corp. Of Walnut Creek, Calif., said his company submitted a $500,000 bid May 15 to the DEP to use the devise in testing a random number of homes in all 21 New Jersey counties.

The concern about radon surfaced earlier this month when federal and state officials discovered that a geological formation, running across the northern half of New Jersey from Pennsylvania to New York state, contains uranium deposits that emit the gas.

Homes in northern Somerset County along the edge of the gological formation—the Reading Prog—which mainly runs through Morris, Passaic, Hunterdon and Warren counties.

Approximately 5,000 to 20,000 people die each year because of radiation from the gas, which causes lung cancer after long exposure at high levels, said Terry McLaughlin, position chief of environmental standards for the federal EPA.

Although the state has never tested homes for natural radon gas exposure, "hundreds to thousands of homes may contain higher than normal levels" of the gas, said Dr. Curtis E. Cummings, chief of the occupational environmental health clinic for the state Department of Health.

"Radon is everywhere all the time," said McLaughlin. "It's a matter of levels."

A "working level" of radon gas in the home is .02 (4 pico-Curries per liter), he said. If a home has a level of .04 (8 pico-Curries per liter) or more, the home should be ventilated.

"A high level of radon is relatively inexpensive to correct," said McLaughlin. Radon gas reaches high levels in homes that are poorly ventilated where it cannot escape to outside air. By improving the ventilation of crawl spaces, installing slab ventilation beneath the house or simply adding an air cleaner, the levels of radon can be drastically reduced, he said.

McLaughlin said he knew of no home that had to be permanently abandoned because it showed high levels of the gas.

Radon actually travels from miles below the earth's surface into the basement of many homes where it becomes trapped and lodged in dust. But clearing away the dust is not enough to remove the gas, said Alter.

"To filter the air is not enough, you have to get rid of the radon," Alter. He said the detector—called a Tractch—is a small cylinder that is set up in a basement for one to three months and then sent to Terradex for interpretation. When the homeowner is informed of the results of the radon test, the company then makes suggestions on how to clear the gas, depending on the house's design, he said.

Alter said federal and state environmental agencies have chosen to ignore naturally emitted radon gas in homes. Most testing has been done in western states where tailings from uranium minds have spread the gas.

"Radon gas is a natural hazard and the government has not informed the public about it," said Alter whose company has been making the testing device for 11 years. "We've been testing homes for six to seven years but the EPA has quietly swept the problem under the rug for the past five."

"Radon gas gets addressed when it shows up in high levels," said Cummings. He said routine radon testing of homes is too expensive for the state.

"Nobody anywhere has ever done routine testing," Cummings said.

But testing for radon gas should be done routinely, especially in newly built homes that are of tighter constructions, Alter said. He said Washington state is presently considering a bill to make radon testing a requirement for building permits.

New Jersey has tested for randon gas in the past. In 1983, 43 homes in the Essex County communities of West Orange, and Glen Ridge were found to have high levels of radon gas.

At that time, state environmental officials suggested the radon was linked to the former U.S. Radium Corp. plant in Orange that refined ore into radium and used the luminescent substance on watch faces. The DEP spent $8 million testing 339 homes with cleanup costing about $40 million.

TESTS FOR LETHAL RADON GAS SET FOR NORTHERN SOMERSET

(By Sarah Strohmeyer)

Some homes in the hills of northern Somerset County will be tested this summer for lethal radon gas seeping from radioactive uranium deposits located miles under the earth's surface, a state environmental official said yesterday.

"We expect very few houses will show radon," said Jim Staples, a Department of Environmental Protection spokesman. He said the DEP plans to start testing in "problem houses" by July.

A geological formation running across the northern half of the state, from Pennsylvania to New York, was recently found by federal and state officials to be emitting radon gas in some homes in the Reading, Pa. area.

Dubbed the "Reading Prong," the band of rock is located mainly in Morris, Passaic, Warren and Hunterdon counties. The top half of Somerset lies on the edge of the geological formation.

Staples said the DEP has received "hundreds of calls' about radon since the discovery was announced earlier this week.

Radon gas is a biproduct of disintegrating uranium, a radioactive metal usually found in types of granite. Long exposure increases the chance of getting lung cancer.

So far the state Health Department has proved no correlation between people living along the Reading Prong and reported cases of lung cancer, according to state officials.

Somerset County Administrator Bjorn E. Firing said he was not notified of radon gas testing.

The testing of the Somerset County homes will be the first time the state has ever searched for naturally emitted radon, Staples said. In 1983 radon was found in 43 homes in Essex County that were believed to contain uranium because of the former U.S. Radium Corp. plant in Orange.

At high risk are homes that are poorly ventilated, usually heavily winterized, that do not allow the gas to escape out of the house, Staples said. In the open air, radon presents no health threat. But gas that seeps into houses where it cannot escape is inhaled by occupants, doing great damage to lungs.

But homes that show a high presence of radon are not safe if they are just ventilated, according to Harvey Sachs, a radon expert. "If there is a level of radon 10 to 20 percent higher than normal, how can you ventilate a house that much and still pay the heating bills," he asked.

A former member of the Princeton University faculty who studied radon levels in Pennsylvania homes bordering the Reading Prong in 1980, Sachs said the state knew about the high levels of radon in that area three years ago.

"I have no basis to make a statement that the same levels are in New Jersey," said Sachs. He said thousands of people die each year because of radon.

Homeowners can buy commercial monitors that measure levels of radon in their homes, Sachs said. The monitors are then mailed back to the producing company which interprets the results, he said.

Sachs echoed opinions of other area geologists who said radon levels in new homes should be routinely measured and that local building codes should be changed in areas of high radon levels.●

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. GORE, Mr. PELL, and Mr. METZENBAUM):

S. 1594. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to increase the availability of educational and informational television programs for children; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

CHILDREN'S TELEVISION EDUCATION ACT

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Children's Television Education Act of 1985. The legislation is intended to ensure that the Nation's children enjoy the educational and informational benefits that television can offer.

I am pleased that Senators ROCKEFELLER, GORE, PELL, and METZENBAUM join as cosponsors, and that Representative WIRTH, who has been a leading voice on this issue, is today introducing identical legislation in the House of Representatives.

There should be no question that television is still the most pervasive mass medium in our society. By the time the average student graduates from high school, that child has spent more time watching television than in the classroom.

Television can have a major impact in educating and informing children and exciting their curiosity about the world around them. Television can impart values and skills. Its role in the educational development of our children is all the more important, in light of findings that America's educational system must work harder and harder to prepare our children to compete effectively in an international economy.

Broadcasters must seek to fulfill television's potential to educate and inform. That is their legal obligation. They are granted use of the public's airwaves, a scarce but valuable resource. They are, in short, public trustees, obliged to serve the public interest. That is the basic principle of the Communications Act. And an important part of the public broadcasters are obliged to serve is children.

In general, commercial television broadcasters have failed the children of this Nation. Broadcasters air precious little programming directed toward children, even less of some educational or informational value. Notwithstanding the Federal Communications Commission declaration back in 1974 that broadcasters have a special responsibility to children, broadcasters have not responded. The amount of educational and age specific programming has remained static. Although children mostly watch television during the week, almost half of children's progamming is aired on weekends.

From a market perspective, the broadcasters' performance is no surprise. Broadcasters sell commercial time to advertisers who want to reach people who spend money. Children simply are not the most valuable audience. Left to their own devices, broadcasters will sell children short. Indeed, broadcasters who want to serve children, do so at their commerical peril.

This is a situation that justified regulation. But, just as broadcasters have failed the children, the Federal Communications Commission has failed the public. In December 1983, the Commission, by a 4 to 1 vote, closed the book on a 13-year proceeding on children's television and abdicated its regulatory responsibility. The Commission reasoned, in part, that children had access to information from other sources—like cable television and video cassette recorders.

As Commissioner Henry Rivera stated, in an eloquent dissent:

> At a time when the educational training and fitness of children are subject to increasing criticism, this indifference is unfortunate, if not outrageous.

More recently, the Commission rejected petitions to even inquire as to the growing commercialization of children's programming. In too many cases, the cartoons children watch are nothing more than program-length commercials, featuring the toy characters that sponsors want to sell. Marketing is done not just in 30-second spots, but in 30-minute program slots.

It is time for the Congress to step in. The legislation we introduce today would set up a clear but not inflexible standard for broadcasters to meet. The bill prescribes a guideline of 7 hours a week of educational and informational programming, 5 hours of which shall occur Monday through Friday.

If a broadcaster fails to meet that guideline, an interested party may file a petition before the Commission against the broadcaster when it comes time for license renewal. The Commission is required to hold a hearing. At that hearing, the broadcaster would have the burden to show that, notwithstanding its failue to meet the guideline, it has fulfilled its obligation to serve the child audience.

The bill makes clear that the obligation to serve children is a real one. The obligation is independent of considerations about the contribution, if any, of other media or electronic technologies. Broadcasters alone utilize scarce spectrum space. Their licenses are worth millions and millions of dollars. They have an obligation, in return for the use of the public's airwaves, to serve the public.

Mr. President, there is precedent for this kind of regulation. The FCC for many years imposed guidelines, setting a limit on the air time for commercials, and a minimum on the air time for public affairs and news and local programming. If a broadcaster failed to meet that guideline, his application for license renewal would be subject to review by the full Commission.

The FCC repealed those guidelines last year. It argued that marketplace forces compelled Broadcasters to limit commercials. Viewers would turn to other stations. Marketplace forces compelled broadcasters to provide news—because the viewers want it. However, the marketplace does not compel broadcasters to serve children. So, Congress, in the absence of FCC action, must step in.

The bill also addresses the problem of program-length commercials. It requires the Commission to commence an inquiry and to report its findings within 9 months. The problem is a serious one, and the Commission should not ignore it.

Mr. President, in the last Congress, Representative WIRTH introduced legislation in the House, and I introduced identical legislation in the Senate, mandating simply an hour a day of educational or information programming. The legislation we introduce today, I think, is an improvement. It sets a guideline that is clear, but not without flexibility. It states clearly the consequences of a broadcaster's failure to serve the needs of children.

Representative WIRTH and I have benefited from the active participation and support of Action for Children's Television, the National PTA, the National Education Association, and the American Academy of Pediatrics.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

I also ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of my remarks, a recent editorial from Business Week be printed in the RECORD. It is worth noting that even while championing the deregulation of the Commission, the editorial draws a distinction with children's television, and criticizes the Commission for allowing its overcommercialization.

And finally, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed the policy statement of the American Academy of Pediatrics on children's television, a number of recent articles, and the full text of the dissent of Commissioner Rivera to the FCC's children's television ruling. The dissent lays out clearly the factual and legal basis for legislating in this area.

Mr. President, I intend to actively pursue this matter in the Senate in the coming weeks and months. Our children should not be shortchanged.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1594

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Children's Television Education Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

(1) a series of expert commissions have documented serious shortcomings in our Nation's educational system which will profoundly affect both the opportunities available to our Nation's children, and the ability of the United States to compete effectively in an international economy;

(2) by the time the average student graduates from high school, that child has spent more time watching television than the classroom;

(3) the potential of commercial television programming for making a major positive impact in improving the education of children has been largely unrealized;

(4) it has been clearly demonstrated that television can assist children in learning important information, skills, values, and behavior, while entertaining them and exciting their curiosity to learn about the world around them;

(5) commercial television is the most effective and pervasive mass medium;

(6) as public trustees, commercial television station operators have a legal obligation to serve children, regardless of the contribution that may be made by public television, cable television, video cassettes, or other new or traditional communications media;

(7) commercial television has generally failed to meet its obligation to provide educational and informational programming to children as part of its obligation to serve the public interest; and

(8) the Federal Communications Commission, in concluding its proceeding on children's television, has declined to take effective steps to increase educational and informational programming designed for children on commercial television and has instead rendered broadcaster's obligations to serve children vague and unenforceable.

SEC. 3. CHILDREN'S TELEVISION PROGRAMMING.

Part I of title III of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended by redesignating the last section as section 333 and by inserting before such section the following:

"CHILDREN'S TELEVISION PROGRAMMING OBLIGATION

"SEC. 332. (a) The purposes of this section are—

"(1) to further use the potential of television for the positive educational and informational benefit of our Nation's children;

"(2) to encourage expanded development of programming specifically designed to meet the educational and informational needs of children;

"(3) to enforce the obligation of broadcasters to meet the educational and informational needs of the child audience; and

"(4) to establish a presumptive quantitative guideline for serving the child audience, which broadcasters must meet or establish good cause for not doing so.

"(b) In exercising its obligation to serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity under this title, each television broadcasting station shall broadcast a substantial amount of programming—

"(1) which serves the educational and informational needs of children who are 12 years of age or younger through programming that is specially designed to meet such needs;

"(2) which is reasonably scheduled throughout the week; and

"(3) which is directed to specific age groups of children.

"(c) The Commission shall prescribe such regulations as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. Such regulations shall be initially prescribed not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of the Children's Television Education Act of 1985.

"(d)(1) The Commission shall designate for hearing under section 309(e) any application for renewal of a license by a television station, if a petition for denial is filed under section 309(d)(1) that contains specific allegations of fact claiming that the applicant has failed to broadcast a minimum of 7 hours a week, 5 hours of which shall occur Monday through Friday, of programming that is described in subsection (b)(1), (2), and (3).

"(2) In a hearing held pursuant to this subsection, the burden of proceeding with the introduction of evidence and the burden of proof shall be upon the applicant with respect to its fulfillment of its obligation to serve the child audience.

"(3) Notwithstanding section 309(d)(2), the Commission may dismiss any petition to deny an application for renewal only if it determines that the petition is frivolous.".

SEC. 4. REPORT.

Section 5(g) of the Communication Act of 1934 is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (3);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (4) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(5) list those television broadcast station licensees whose licenses were renewed, notwithstanding failure to meet the level of programming set forth in section 332(c)(1), and describe in detail the reasons for the renewal; and

"(6) describe the implementation by the Commission of section 332, and its impact on television programming designed to meet the educational and informational needs of children.".

SEC. 5. PROGRAM LENGTH COMMERCIALS.

(a). INQUIRY.—The Federal Communications Commission shall conduct an inquiry into program length commercials for which the primary audience is children who are 12 years of age or younger. As part of such inquiry, the Commission shall assess whether, and to what extent, the broadcasting of such commercials breaches the obligations of a commercial broadcast station licensee to serve the needs of children.

(b) REPORT.—Within 9 months after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Federal Communications Commission shall complete the inquiry under this section and send a report to the Congress on its findings.

(c) PROGRAM LENGTH COMMERCIAL.—The term "program length commercial" means programming—

(1) which is intended as the primary element of a program or programming segment of 20 minutes or longer; and

(2) which is designed, in whole or in part, to promote the purchase of one or more specific products by—

(A) the theme of the programming, and

(B)(i) the identification of the product by name in the title of the programming, or

(ii) the reference or display of the product in the content of program in a manner of to the extent that readily permits the identification of the particular product brand.

SEC. 6. EFFECTIVE DATE.

This Act shall take effect 60 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

THE FCC IS ON THE RIGHT TRACK

Starting about 1980, exploding technology and burgeoning competition in the U.S. telecommunications and broadcasting industries began shaking the Federal Communications Commission out of its comfortable rut. The agency could have responded to the ensuing period of dramatic change by throwing a regulatory net over every new product and service that dared show its head. Instead, under its colorful chairman, Mark S. Fowler, who took over in May, 1981, the FCC has become a high-gear engine for deregulating the industries it was created to oversee.

The task of opening up two large and complex industries is bound to generate conflict. By pushing hard for marketplace solutions, Fowler has upset entrenched interests that prospered under the benign protection of regulation. Fowler has also made his share of mistakes. He has been brash, especially in dealing with powerful congressional committees, and he has exposed himself to some valid criticism, such as assertions that he has permitted the over-commercialization of some children's television programs.

But the most important point is that under Fowler the FCC has encouraged rather than slowed competition and innovation in services and products that were once the domain of government-sanctioned monopolies. He is on the right track.

[From the Business Week, Mar. 25, 1985]

ARE THE PROGRAMS YOUR KIDS WATCH SIMPLY COMMERCIALS?

On the distant planet of Eternia, Prince Adam changes into He-Man and does daily battle against the evil Skeletor and his legion of dastardly villains. At stake in He-Man and The Masters of the Universe, a syndicated television program for children, are Castle Grayskull and the secrets of the universe. But all the warfare in children's TV isn't fought on the screen. Battle lines are being drawn between broadcasters, toy manufacturers, children's advocates, and regulators. At issue: whether children's TV shows are becoming little more than feature-length commercials for new lines of toys.

Masters of the Universe is representative. Adam, Skeletor, and the others began their existence not as the brainchildren of cartoonists but as toys created by Mattel Inc. Then, in a joint effort with Filmation Studios, the company developed a TV show based on the characters as part of a coordinated package to promote and sell the toys.

Product licensing has been around since Mickey Mouse. But selling a program and a toy as a package is new. The trend has grown with the recent deregulation of television, and the practice angers many parents and children's advocates. "This is the worst kind of exploitation," says Frank W. Orme, the 79-year-old president of the Los Angeles-based National Association for Better Broadcasting (NABB). "It's deceptive and cynical because kids can't tell when they are being pitched." The Federal Communications Commission will consider the complaints within the next few weeks.

MONEY MACHINE

For toy companies, the fate of a powerful marketing tool hinges on the outcome of the FCC's deliberations. "Until recently, we would come out with a product, put on TV commercials, and kids would ask for the product after seeing the commercials," says Joseph Mendelsohn III, president of General Mill Inc.'s Kenner Products Div. Now, instead of being confined to a 30-second spot, Kenner weaves product-based characters, such as Care Bears and Strawberry Shortcake, into half-hour animated programs. "The payoff is much bigger," Mendelsohn says.

Indeed, the marketing edge that comes from turning a toy into a television star is proving increasingly irresistible to toy companies. The number of toy-based shows has jumped from 14 to 40 in the past two years. Mattel's Masters of the Universe line—priced from $5 to $30—racked up $500 million in worldwide sales in 1984, its third year. The company has had problems keeping up with demand. Helped by a TV show called The Transformers, Hasbro Bradley Inc.'s Transformers toy line—which can change from vehicles to robots—pulled in more than $100 million in its first year, making it the most successful toy introduction ever.

As the FCC continues to ease rules requiring the separation and clear identification of commercials, critics fear these programs will spread throughout children's television. "In a competitive environment, no toy manufacturer can afford not to have its own programs based on toys," says Peggy Charren, founder of Action for Children's Television (ACT), a Newtonville (Mass.) children's advocacy group. Adds FCC Commissioner Henry M. Rivera: "If the commission blesses this practice by inaction, the vast majority of children's programming eventually will be funded this way."

But Rivera is a minority of one on the five-member FCC. Despite his dissent, the commission eliminated children's programming guidelines just before Christmas in 1983 and later deregulated nearly all commercial practices on television. Broadcasters had claimed deregulation would have little effect because marketplace competition would keep them in line. But ACT and the NABB contend market forces do not adequately protect children, a uniquely vulnerable class of consumers. They filed the FCC complaints, hoping to slow the spread of product-based programming.

PROFIT SHARING

The FCC will also consider an ACT proposal that would keep station owners from receiving part of the profits from sales of merchandise featured on the programs they broadcast. That request attacks an unusual deal worked out by Telepicture Corp., producer of the forthcoming ThunderCats animated action series, which features cat-like superheroes. Telepicture offered station owners who signed on early an option to participate in profits from the program and from toys and other licensed products based on ThunderCats characters. To date, about 45 licensing deals have been arranged. The program which cost a staggering $15 million to produce, already is scheduled to air in nearly 90 percent of the country when it debuts this fall.

Opponents say this type of arrangement will distort programming decisions, leading broadcasters to consider retail sales potential in scheduling programs. But Telepictures President Michael N. Garin defends the profit-sharing plan as an innovative way of allowing small producers to mount expensive productions. "Only by bringing in stations at the initial stages to share the risks are you going to have any alternatives to network television," he says.

NATIONAL SCANDAL

Increasingly, toy companies are producing the product-based shows themselves, or are striking joint agreements with established producers such as Hanna-Barbera Productions, a Taft Broadcasting Co. subsidiary. Many of the shows are then sold to independent stations.

The networks, ambivalent about the trend to product-based programming, are partly responsible for the role the independents have taken. They turned down top-rated Masters of the Universe, for example, largely based on objections to Mattel's involvement in the program's production company. "I have a general discomfort with toy-company ownership positions [in these] series," says Squire D. Rushnell, American Broadcasting Cos.' vice-president for children's programming. "How do you separate the intention of doing a TV show from the intention of selling a product?" Still, all three networks are now running children's shows that were inspired by products. George F. Schweitzer, a CBS Broadcast Group vice-president, asks: "Why should it be wrong if the top inspired the program and not the other way around? We evaluate programming on entertainment value and not on its merchandising ability."

If the FCC rejects the complaints, as is widely expected, opponents shouldn't count on help from Congress. Although Representative Timothy E. Wirth (D-Colo.), chairman of the House telecommunications subcommittee, calls product-based programming "a national scandal," he says Congress can't tell broadcasters what they can or cannot air. Concludes Wirth: "You can't legislate good judgment."

FEDERAL HELP NEEDED TO GIVE CHILDREN CHOICE

(By Peggy Charren)

NEWTON, MA.—Choice is the secret to public service on that small screen from which most of us get our news, our entertainment, our fantasies, and our perceptions of what's happening all over the world.

The lack of choice in commercial TV's offerings to children is a national disgrace.

Neither CBS, NBC, nor ABC airs a single daily or even weekly show for children Monday through Friday.

The nation's major toy companies—Mattell, Hasbro and a dozen others—now control the production of more than 40 children's "program-length commercials" based on brand-name toys.

The new GI Joe series, for example, includes 90 half-hour shows featuring every character, vehicle, and weapon in Hasbro's GI Joe line.

It is too soon to depend on cable or home video to provide the diversity missing from TV station schedules.

These new delivery systems are not yet in a majority of U.S. homes and the cost means this solution discriminates unfairly against the poor.

Public broadcasting, the source of programs that serve a multitude of special audiences, including children, with education and entertainment, is underfinanced and cannot fill the void by itself.

That's the bad news.

But the good news is that TV choice for children and their families can be a reality before the end of 1985 if three Washington institutions each deal with a single piece of the problem.

The Federal Communications Commission must enforce its own guidelines against program-length commercials for children, a guideline first promulgated in 1974.

The President, instead of vetoing funds for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting—as he did twice last year—should become a vocal supporter of increased dollars for PBS.

Congress should act to pass the Children's Television Education Act, introduced last year by Rep. Tim C. Wirth, D-Colo., and Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J.

This bill would provide for each station to air five hours a week of children's educational programs Monday through Friday.

With enough choice for young audiences, parents can help their children to develop viewing patterns that educate, entertain, and enchance the process of growing into happy, productive adults.

The choice for choice is ours, but only if we all act together on behalf of our children.

WHY CHILDREN'S TV TURNS OFF SO MANY PARENTS

(By Geoffrey Tooth)

Amid growing alarm over violence on television, a wide-ranging drive is under way to improve the quality of TV shows for American children.

Heating the campaign that is reaching all the way to Congress is a concern that the nation's 33 million children between the ages of 2 and 11—some of TV's most ardent viewers—are being shortchanged by the electronic screen.

The A.C. Nielsen Company says the average child in that age group watched a record 27 hours and 21 minutes a week in its latest survey in November, compared with 23 hours and 18 minutes a decade ago. By the time most young people leave high school, they have spent more time before a television screen than in the classroom.

Critics complain that despite viewer enthusiasm the number of educational programs for children is declining, especially on the three commercial networks. Such shows as "Captain Kangaroo" have disappeared, and most of what remains on ABC, CBS and NBC are cartoons, which some say have little informational value.

LIMITED ACCESS

The Public Broadcasting Service offers highly acclaimed programs such as "Sesame Street," but many parents complain that they aren't enough because PBS is unavailable or reception is poor in some areas.

"The commercial TV networks have abandoned their obligation to children," says Peggy Charren, president of Action for Children's Television, a Boston-based citizen's group. "The problem with children's television is that there isn't enough, and what there is isn't diverse enough."

Initiatives for change include measures at the local and national levels, both inside and outside the broadcasting industry. Among them—

Legislation soon to be introduced in Congress would require every TV station to air a minimum of about 5 hours of programs a week to enhance the education of children. Backers of the plan include Senator Frank Lautenberg (D-NJ) and Representative Timothy Wirth (D-Colo), chairman of the House Telecommunications Subcommittee.

A bill sponsored by Senator John Heinz (R-Pa) would allow tax credits for corporations that invest in the development of children's programs on public broadcasting.

Commercial networks are about to introduce a variety of new programs for the young, including a half-hour show on NBC with news for children.

Some local stations also are trying new approaches. Channel 20 in Washington, D.C., for example, introduced a series January 27 designed to teach parents and young people how to learn more from the medium and to participate in the creation of shows.

Much of the desire for change stems from fears that many children are influenced as much or more by TV as by traditional sources of guidance—families, churches and schools. A 1982 study by the National Institute of Mental Health concluded that "violence on television does lead to aggressive behavior by children and teenagers who watch the programs." The National Coalition on Television Violence, a citizens' group, reports a recent "deluge of high-action, violent cartoon shows."

Says Dr. Thomas Radecki, head of the coalition and a psychiatrist: "We can only pump so much violence into our people before we explode."

The coalition reports that violent acts on television—viewed by many children as well as adults—increased 65 percent in the last four years. The group counted 46 acts of violence an hour on NBC's "The A Team." Defenders counter that TV mayhem is clearly perceived by most viewers as entertainment and reflects themes dating back to the plays of ancient Greece.

CRITICAL SURVEYS

A new study by the Task Force on Children and Television of the American Academy of Pediatrics, says TV contributes not only to violence but also to high rate of drug and alcohol abuse and encourages smoking and obesity. The report pinpoints advertising on children's programs and prime-time broadcasts as major influences.

Many scholars say that changes now being considered are inadequate. Notes a study by the Markle Foundation/Boys Town Conference: "The U.S. is failing to make full and effective use of television as an educational tool. In this technological age, there can be no effective education policy without an effective telecommunications policy."

The conference, to which some of the nation's leading educators contributed, found the U.S. far behind many other countries in providing educational programs for the young. The British Broadcasting Corporation, for example, airs 840 hours of at-home children's TV a year, compared with 150 hours a year of new shows on America's PBS.

The study urges that public broadcasting be a main conduit for more programs in light of generally low profits on children's shows on commercial channels. Also recommended: A crash program costing 62 million dollars a year—to be paid by the U.S. government—that would create a variety of new informational shows for children up to age 13.

The Markle report concludes: "Unless we begin to value television for its educational potential, that potential will never be realized."

CHILDREN, ADOLESCENTS, AND TELEVISION

Next to the family, television may be the most important source of information for children and a principal factor influencing their development. Children two to 12 years old in the United States watch approximately 25 hours of television per week. On an annual basis, children spend more time in front of their television sets than they spend in school.

Television is a powerful tool that can promote learning, create aspirations, and induce prosocial behavior. When it deals with medical topics, television contains many messages that promote health or prevent illness. However, television advertising and programming can adversely affect learning and behavior of children and adolescents in a number of significant areas:

1. Repeated exposure to televised violence promotes a proclivity to violence and a passive response to its practice.

2. Television viewing increases consumption of high caloric density snacks, and increases the prevalance of obesity.

3. Although the evidence that television may have a deleterious effect on school performance may be confounded by other factors, learning from television is passive rather than active, and detracts from time spent reading or using active learning skills.

4. Television conveys unrealistic messages regarding drugs, alcohol, and tobacco, and indirectly encourages their use.

5. The portrayal of sex roles and sexuality on television is unrealistic and misleading: sexual relationships develop rapidly; the risk of pregnancy is rarely considered; adolescence is portrayed as a constant state of sexual crisis. These characteristics may contribute directly or indirectly to the risk of adolescent pregnancy and clearly alter age-dependent experiential learning with respect to sexuality. Pornography on cable television is a particularly important concern.

6. Television promotes ethnic and racial stereotypes and does little to promote a sympathetic understanding of handicapped people.

7. Television conveys an unrealistic view of problem solving or conflict resolution.

To address these concerns, we recommend that the AAP:

1. Educate pediatricians with respect to the consequences of television viewing. Approaches should include the development of specific materials and curricula for teaching medical students, pediatric house staff, practicing pediatricians, and others who deal directly with the health of children and adolescents.

2. Provide materials and an approach to counseling children, adolescents and their families regarding the effects of television and methods suitable for altering viewing habits. Although an AAP pamphlet already exists for this purpose, additional materials regarding alcohol and sexuality would be useful. Specific recommendations for counseling should be developed.

3. Encourage legislative activity to increase quality programming and reduce advertising directed at children.

4. Establish liaisons with networks, producers, writers, and other professional organizations to improve the quality of programming and advertising and to act as a resource for these groups.

5. Provide an ongoing review of new technologies that enable families to alter or control their children's television viewing habits.

6. Encourage involvement by local and chapter groups to interact with network affiliates, independent television stations and cable companies to improve local programming and advertising directed at children.

FOWLER'S FCC TELLS KIDS TO GET LOST

(By Paul Harris)

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27.—The FCC's latest kidvid policy statement, depending on one's perspective, represents either the pinnacle or the nadir of chairman Mark Fowler's philosophy of "unregulation."

With the wave of a hand last week, Fowler dismissed the idea of adopting program standards for kidvid, arguing that doing so would violate a D.C. Appeals Court decision (see separate story). Never mind that view's unfirm legal footing, Fowler's message to the industry is clear: This agency wants to renew every broadcast license and can best do so by removing such petty technicalities as a station's performance.

In classic doublespeak, the commission ruled that tv stations have an obligation to serve moppet interests, but no minimum guidelines will be stipulated. So innocuous is the language that a station can now get by without programming anything specified for children, according to dissenting commissioner Henry Rivera, a Reagan appointee.

It need only argue that kids are served by other video sources in the community, from "Sesame Street" on a PBS station to cable tv or even homevideo. That's economic discrimination, as fundamental as it comes, Rivera argues.

Needless to say, the position goes farther then any previous FCC Chairman, either conservative or liberal, has been willing to tread in excusing broadcasters from recognizing the special needs of a constituency that can't fend for itself in the marketplace. Responsible broadcasters will continue to see a commitment—if only to ward off competing applications—while marginal stations may now bask in the realization that a once-feared FCC is now their true friend.

In short, the agency has muddled the kidvid lingo to such an extent that there is no way a station can be held accountable. FCC official Bill Johnson admitted as much when he said last week he could not conceive of how a broadcaster could be considered in violation of the new policy, there are so many variables.

Just how Fowler's well-known distaste for programming guidelines would withstand the first comparative hearing on the subject is open to question. The commission would be required to measure an incumbent's level of kivid programming—say, zero for example—against a petitioner's promise for a specific level of excellence. That's a quantitative collision he presumably would seek to avoid.

Meanwhile, broadcasters have officially suppressed their glee over the ruling with an innocuous statement of their own. "Children are our most valuable resource," cried Eddie Fritts, prez of the National Assn. of Broadcasters, who argued that interjecting Federally mandated programming is a dangerous precedent.

"We are entering an age with television of abundance. What should be analyzed in this situation is not what one individual station is telecasting but what is available to the child in the home on a daily basis."

The NAB's euphoria could conceivably turn sour in a month or two depending on how much furor is whipped up in Congress over the FCC's move. To politicians during an election year, a vote against children is like blaspheming motherhood. At a time when the industry is seeking friends on Capital Hill for deregulation legislation, it doesn't need an additional rallying cry against its special interest bill.

STATEMENT OF COMMISSIONER HENRY M. RIVERA CONCURRING IN PART, DISSENTING IN PART

REPORT AND ORDER REVISING COMMERCIAL TELEVISION LICENSING POLICIES

When the Commission issued the Notice of Proposed Rulemaking in this proceeding,[1] I expressed strong reservations about several of the reasons given for launching this regulatory review.[2] I am pleased that the Report and Order abandons the deregulatory rationales I found objectionable.[3] Doing so has forced the Commission to focus closely on the actual performance of the over-the-air television broadcast system, and this close study allows us responsibly to conclude that the regulations eliminated by this decision are unnecessary to protect the public interest.[4]

Frankly, although this proceeding is commonly referred to as "television deregulation," I do not think our actions are especially deregulatory[5]—nor could they be, as long as television remains a medium pervaded by structural scarcity. In reality, our decision changes very little of substance. The bedrock public interest obligation of broadcasters to serve the needs and interests of their communities of license still exists.[6] The primary change being made is the way we will measure compliance with the obligation. The key to the effectiveness of this revised scheme will be, as before, a sincere commitment by the FCC to police broadcasters' compliance with their substantive obligations. That sincere commitment, not the paperwork we eliminate here, is what is needed to maintain an accountable system. The requirements we retain generally give us the necessary tools to do our job properly, if we are committed to the task.

Except for the Commission's continuing inaction with regard to children's television programming, see infra pp. 11-14, I am persuaded that our decisions in this proceeding will not put the public interest in jeopardy. While I do not completely subscribe to the analysis advanced by the Report and Order,[7] the assembled evidence convinces me that the public can expect a continued healthy supply of non-entertainment programming and non-abusive levels of commercialization absent FCC processing guidelines. I also believe the quarterly issue-programs lists will allow the Commission and the general public to ensure that every television station remains publicly accountable, at least to the extent they are now.

Turning to the specifics of this decision, the evidence before us regarding adult-oriented non-entertainment programming establishes that commercial incentives rather than FCC guidelines spur broadcasters to provide such service, and that licensees in markets of all sizes will continue to provide an acceptable amount of informational and other similar programs absent our guidelines. I recognize that reasonable people may differ on these points[8] and that, at first blush, identical regulatory schemes for radio and television would seem unjustified in view of the quantum difference between the number of competitors in the two industries.[9] Initially, however, it bears emphasizing that although we are conforming the procedural rules governing television and radio licensees, the substantive requirements of the average radio of television license differ considerably. As described more fully below, pp. 9-11, television stations remain far more restricted in their discretion to specialize than their counterparts in radio. In addition, the degree to which most broadcasters are surpassing our informational, local and other non-entertainment program guidelines strongly suggests that this performance is generally due to economic self interest, not FCC processing guidelines.[10] By eliminating the guidelines, we are not saying that commercial television licensees are no longer required to air programming that responds to the needs and interests of the local community. We are simply choosing to deemphasize these benchmarks as monitoring devices because we are confident, based on the data, that from a strictly quantitative standpoint the system is functioning acceptably and will continue to do so.[11]

This issue of whether to retain a formal ascertainment procedure is a somewhat closer question. The ascertainment primers were adopted largely at the behest of broadcasters and broadcast lawyers in search of security in the licensing process. If broadcasters no longer want the safe harbor provided by the primer—and the record in this docket establishes that they do not[12]—there would have to be a very good reason for the FCC to insist upon it. While not without detractors, the primer does have its virtues. First, it provides an objective (if imperfect) framework within which to evaluate performance at renewal time. Second, some public interest advocates have argued that formal ascertainment is needed to guarantee broadcaster sensitivity to the programming needs of groups having limited economic resources. With regard to the first point, I am persuaded that the quarterly issues-programs lists can serve as well as the primer in providing evidence of a broadcaster's awareness of and attention to its community, without the undue formalisms of the primer.[13] As for the second point, if I believed that ascertainment in accordance with existing FCC guidelines assured programming responsive to all strongly felt needs, I would readily oppose repeal of those guidelines. However, broadcasters necessarily have broad discretion in deciding what programs to air and what local needs to address; and it is impossible to assure programming responsive to all local needs and interests simply by requiring broadcasters to ascertain according to a prescribed formula.[14] That being the case, retention of the ascertainment primers does not appear warranted and I concur in their elimination.[15]

For many of the same reasons, I can support the repeal of the logging duty. The FCC requires program logs primarily to determine how much non-entertainment programming each broadcaster is airing. If logging helped to assure adequate attention to community needs or an effective comparative renewal standard, these benefits would plainly outweigh the costs imposed and I would object to elimination of the program log requirement. From what I can gather, however, logging does neither. Failure to meet the Commission's processing guidelines (which is revealed by scrutiny of logs) does not prevent renewal and satisfaction of them does not assure renewal. More than that, the new quarterly issues-programs list may be a superior gauge of a broadcaster's programming because a licensee will have to account for its public interest performance more precisely than it does under a system of rote logging.[16]

Having discussed the particulars of this decision, it is important that I set forth my understanding of a television broadcaster's public interest responsibilities under this revised scheme. Television licensees, as public trustees, must remain accountable for their exclusive use of valuable spectrum. This decision maintains that public accountability. Indeed, most broadcasters' public interest responsibilities remain unchanged by our actions here: every broadcaster must continue to air programming responsive to local needs,[17] and to assure that issues of particular relevance to all significant segments of the community are addressed.[18] Now, however, when a broadcaster's overall programming performance is challenged at renewal time, its rendition of these duties will be measured in the first instance by reference to quarterly issues-programs lists, rather than by its compliance with the ascertainment primer. Furthermore, the 1960 En Banc Programming Statement's[19] requirement that each broadcaster provide well-rounded, "something-for-everyone" programming has been modified. Licensees may now specialize, but their discretion to do so is elastic and will expand or contract depending on the number of television outlets in a market. In markets with relatively few stations (and, thus, where satisfaction of all programming needs through specialization will be economically impossible), a broadcaster's programming responsibilities remain exactly what they were before this decision. And, under the reasoning of the Report of Order,[20] most television stations will fall into this category because few local television markets presently approximate the narrowcasting environment indispensible to specialization.[21] Seen in this light, it is evident that the substantive changes made possible by this decision are relatively limited.

As noted initially, I do take strong exception to this Report and Order in one respect: its failure to adopt a children's educational programming requirement and guideline.[22] This issue is the Achilles' heel of this Commission's efforts to deregulate the video marketplace and is a subject on which I have spoken elsewhere.[23] In brief, evidence before the FCC indicates that licensees are not fulfilling the special children's programming obligations previously imposed on them by the Commission; that commercial incentives discourage licensees from airing such programming; and, thus, that regulatory intervention is required to protect the public interest in this regard.[24] This proceeding, being framed broadly to review and revise the programming obligations of television licensees,[25] gave the Commission both the opportunity and the duty to correct the injury to children's interests caused by the Commission's refusal to promulgate a children's educational programming guideline.[26] The Commission seriously undermines the credibility and viability of its deregulatory efforts when it fails, as here, responsibly to address problems not accommodated by the marketplace. I dissent from the majority's continued irresponsibility in this regard.

I cannot help noting that the thorough evaluation of adult-oriented non-entertainment programming in this proceeding stands in marked contrast to the shallow effort made in the children's television docket. This difference explains why I can support most of this decision and why I adamantly oppose the action taken by the children's television order. In this decision, the Commission has relaxed its regulations only because empirical evidence corroborates economic theory and confirms that adult-oriented informational and other non-entertainment programming is currently available in substantial amounts and is likely to continue undiminished under reduced regulation. By comparison, in the children's television decision, the Commission conducted no study or survey to discover how much and what kind of programming is presently broadcast on commercial television to meet children's special needs.[27] Then, in the face of substantial record evidence suggesting market failure and its own recognition that economic incentives to air such programming are weak, the majority arbitrarily concluded that programming responsive to children's needs was adequate and retained only token agency oversight.[28] Importantly, this decision retains a vehicle for overseeing licensees' compliance with their obligation to air programming responsive to the needs of the adult audience (the issues-programs lists), unlike Docket 19142, which eschewed any form of reporting to enable the Commission to enforce licensees' purported "special obligation" to children.[29] Finally, unlike its approach to children's television, the Commission in appraising the need for continuing these rules has wisely focussed on the actual performance of commercial television broadcasters—who form the backbone of our television system and will continue to fulfill this role for the forseeable future—instead of glossing over the facts and relying on the presumed performance of cable operators and others just now entering the video marketplace.[30]

In all other respects, I do not oppose the specific actions taken here. As I said at the outset, the success or failure of this new scheme from a public interest perspective will depend, as under the prior scheme, upon its good faith implementation. More specifically, its success or failure will depend, as before, upon the standards used to evaluate an incumbent's performance at renewal time in the face of a competing application or petition to deny. This Commission's pursuit of a comparative renewal policy that is both coherent and lawful merits a footnote, if not a chapter, in the annals of American administrative law.[31] Our comparative renewal policy was not at issue in this proceeding.[32] This decision, however, by abandoning the benchmarks provided by some of these now eliminated rules and failing concurrently to provide clear guidance about what must be done to earn a legitimate renewal expectancy has done nothing to render the renewal process more objective or less susceptible to judicial criticism. Therefore, the Commission was most unwise in failing to resolve the comparative renewal inquiry concurrent with this proceeding.[33]

In summary, I can generally concur in this decision because the scheme it adopts is no worse than the one it replaces in assuring licensee accountability and, in some respects, may be better.[34] The Commission's failure to adopt, together with this order, a clear comparative renewal policy may lead broadcasters to rue the day this action was taken. I cannot say, however, that the general public [35] will suffer as a result of this decision.

[2] Concurring Statement of Commissioner Henry M. Rivera, supra, 94 FCC 2d at 721-27. I found unconvincing the argument that the Commission could rely on competition from new media in the video marketplace to safeguard the public interest in responsive programming, since the new media are not available nationwide. Id. at 721-25. I was also wholly unpersuaded by the claim that these regulations should be discarded because they place broadcasters at a disadvantage vis-a-vis the new video services. Id. at 725. After all, there can be no competitive disadvantage occurring from unborn competition and the cable industry, the principal alternative to over-the-air television, is often more extensively regulated by local municipalities than broadcasters are by the FCC.

[3] The Report and Order admits that most of the new competition adverted to in the NPRM is "just beginning to assert" itself and that the impact of this nascent competition is difficult to predict. Paras. 20-21. It contains no reference whatever to the level playing field rationale previously advanced.

[4] Although I harbored doubts about the reasons given for starting this proceeding, I was not convinced that the regulations under review were necessary to advance the public interest in a responsive and accountable television broadcast system. My initial view was that it might be possible to further this objective through more finely tuned administrative tools. 94 FCC 2d at 726. Our actions here are, in the main, procedural fine tuning, I said then, and I continue to believe, that any revised regulatory framework will have to: (1) assure that television stations continue to be subject to binding and enforceable public service obligations, consistent with their status as public trustees; (2) retain rational procedures to measure a licensee's rendition of these public obligations; and (3) preserve the public's opportunity to participate meaningfully in our licensing decisions. Id. at 721-22.

[5] That is no doubt why the unadopted "statutory option" proposed in this proceeding continues to draw attention from hopeful deregulators, see Report and Order para. 7, and why efforts to narrow the ambit of statutory obligations continue. See generally Fairness Doctrine Notice of Inquiry, 49 Fed. Reg. 20317 (May 14, 1984).

[6] My fellow commissioners are apparently inclined to chip away at this bedrock by downgrading it here to a mere "obligation." See Report and Order paras. 3, 23, 29, 32, 54. Regardless of how this core public interest programming requirement may be described, however, the Commission's discretion to eliminate it altogether is statutorily foreclosed. See UCC v. FCC, 707 F.2d 1413, 1427-1430 (D.C. Cir. 1983).

[7] For example, I disagree with the suggestion that these regulations should be repealed simply because they are costly or allegedly raise First Amendment concerns. See Report and Order paras. 25-30.

[8] In fact, I was initially skeptical that statistics on licensee performance in a regulated environment could be probative of licensees' likely performance absent regulation. 94 FCC 2d at 725 n.25. Close examination of the evidence has put a new light on the matter.

[9] See 94 FCC 2d at 724.

[10] Some broadcasters do not meet current programming guidelines; however, the overwhelming majority far exceeds them in markets of all sizes. See Comments of the National Association of Broadcasters in MM Docket No. 83-670, Appendix B—NAB Television Programming Study, filed November 21, 1983. This is not entirely surprising since television is the dominant information provider and since informational programming, especially news, is a profitable business. In any event, viewing the statistics compiled in this proceeding, it is difficult to conclude that the public's overall access to issue-oriented and other non-entertainment programs on television will be impaired by this decision.

[11] When the FCC established the processing guidelines under review, it set them at a level at which most licenses were performing, rather than at a level of performance at which the public interest was theoretically optimized. However, insofar as the guidelines can be said to represent a level at which the system as a whole functioned acceptably, that level of acceptable performance will continue because: (1) there are more television licenses on the air now than there were in 1976; (2) the record shows that most licensees in markets of all sizes are airing substantially more informational and other non-entertainment programming than the FCC's guidelines; and therefore, (3) viewers have access to more of this programming than before. See Appendix B to NAB Comments.

[12] See Report and Order, Appendix B, paras. 42-52.

[13] A number of questions remain regarding the role of these lists in renewal cases. For example, the Commission has not described the standard to be used to evaluate the relationship between the issues a licensee singles out and the programs listed as responsive to those issues. Obviously, there must be a demonstrable relationship if the list is to serve its intended function. See UCC v. FCC, 707 F.2d at 1437. Similarly, how will a licensee show that its issue-responsive programming is sufficient to withstand a challenge? I agree that these questions can be answered on an ad hoc basis, but until this body of precedent has developed our failure to detail the mechanics of the process will disadvantage both the public and licensees. Nonetheless, our decision does provide some important guidance: (1) the issues-programs list will be the most significant vehicle for recording efforts to fulfill the bedrock programming responsibility; (2) licensees must adequately document their issue-responsive programming; (3) the lists will serve as an initial frame of reference by the Commission to evaluate programming issues raised in a petition to deny or comparative renewal; (4) if the lists are insufficient to resolve a substantial question, the Commission can ask the licensee for more information; and, most importantly, (5) the licensee bears the burden of proving that it has met the bedrock duty to air issue-responsive programming. Report and Order paras. 76-77.

[14] Citizens' groups and the judiciary have, in fact, complained about the inadequacy of formal ascertainment as a measure of licensee performance and as a public interest spur. See Alianza Federal de Mercedes v. FCC, 539 F.2d 732, 736 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

[15] The Report and Order's comment that the ascertainment requirement is being completely eliminated, see paras. 47 and 54, overstates the action being taken and should not lull licensees into a false security. All broadcasters remain responsible for seeing to it that all significant issues are addressed and for airing issue-responsive programming; therefore, a fortiori they will have to ascertain local programming needs to meet those requirements. Cf. Committee for Community Access v. FCC, No. 82-2314, slip op. at 6-7 (D.C. Cir. July 15, 1984). They would also be well advised to document their reasons for covering some issues but not others to guard against renewal challengers. The Report and Order indicates that "[i]f the programming presented by the licensee satisfies its obligation, the ascertainment efforts of the station are irrelevant." Para. 54. In other words, if confronted by evidence that a licensee has ignored a significant need or has failed to provide adequate issue-responsive programming the station would bear the burden of showing that its programming decisions were reasonable, and its ascertainment of local needs would be material to this issue. In this respect, our action is closer to Option II than Option I as specified in the NPRM. See also para. 39 ("Assessing the reasonableness of a licensee's decision [in a comparative challenge] will necessitate an ad hoc review to examine the circumstances in which the programming decision was made. The examination will focus on the licensee's evaluation of the programming of other television stations and on its own responsive programming in light of the needs of the community.") As we said in the radio deregulation proceeding: "[W]hat is important is that licensees utilize their good faith discretion in determining the type of programming that they will offer and this issues to which they will be responsive. It would be inconsistent with the exercize of good faith judgment for a broadcaster to be 'walled off' from its community. Rather, broadcasters should maintain contact with their community on a personal basis. . . . What is not important is that each licensee follow the same requirements dictating how to do so." Deregulation of Radio, 84 FCC 2d 968 (1981).

[16] The commission could have replaced the present logging duty with a rule requiring broadcasters to log all issue-responsive programming (as initially proposed in response to the court's remand of the radio regulation decision, UCC v. FCC, supra). However, the quarterly issues-programs list is likely to provide much the same information because a licensee must describe issue-responsive programming as well as its time date and duration. Since these lists will serve as "[t]he most significant source of issue-responsive information under the new regulatory scheme," Report and Order at para. 76, and since there is no limit to the number of issues that can be specified it will behoove broadcasters to assemble the most comprehensive and informative lists possible. Consequently, these lists are likely to provide an index of public interest performance that is as informative as the issue-oriented logs. See also Petition for Reconsideration by National Radio Broadcasters Association in BC Docket No. 79-219, filed June 4, 1984 (complaining that new quarterly lists are too burdensome).

[17] Report and Order, para. 37. While we are deemphasizing the significance of quantitative performance, the amount of issue-oriented programming aired by a licensee will continue to be relevant in some contexts, contrarty to the contention of the Report and Order in paragraph 37 ("arguments based solely on the failure to present amounts of nonentertainment programming will not be appropriate"). See UCC v. FCC, supra, 707 F.2d at 1433-34; Committee for Community Access v. FCC, No. 82-2314, Slip op. at 6-7 (June 15, 1984).

[20] Footnotes 34 and 61.

[21] Even where specialization is feasible and permissible, no licensee may flatly ignore issues of concern to a significant segment of the communit. Rather, a licensee may do so only after developing a reasonable basis for relying on another station in the market to address the needs in question. Thus unless a broadcaster wants to endanger its renewal expectancy, it will exercise great care to assure that such needs are met.

[22] I also object to the apparent repeal of aggregate commercial time limitations insofar as children's programming is concerned. Not only does this represent an unexplained (and, thus unlawful) departure from the FCC's prior conviction that special policies are required to protect vulnerable young viewers from overcommercialization, Children's Television Policy Statement, 50 FCC 2d at 1, 12-14 (1979), but it does so without any record support. Because the Commission by this action does not alter other policies governing commercial practices in the children's programming area (e.g. the prohibition against host-selling, the reguirement that program and commercial matter be separated, etc.), I can concur in its action in that regard, See Report and Order n. 99.

[33] Prompt resolution of the pending inquiry on comparative renewal standards is essential and has been promised by the staff; in view of the meager results produced by the FCC's prior efforts, however, I am not confident that this issue can be properly resolved absent legislative intervention.

[34] An apparent mystique has attached to the regulations under review here—that they are essential to the public accountability of commercial licensees. I disagree. What is essential is responsible oversight by the FCC of broadcaster performance. If this exists, reams of rountinely filed paperwork are unnecessary. If it does not exist, no amount of administrative regulation will make a whit of difference.

By Mr. WARNER (for himself, Mr. WILSON, Mr. HELMS, Mr. GARN, Mr. EXON, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. THURMOND):

S. 1595. A bill to prevent the implementation of Revenue Ruling 83-3 and other similar considerations affecting the housing allowances of the military and clergy; to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSING ALLOWANCES OF THE MILITARY AND CLERGY

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a measure preventing the Internal Revenue Service from implementing Revenue Ruling 83-3 and other similar considerations affecting the housing allowances of the military and clergy.

Joining me as cosponsors on this bill are Senators HELMS, WILSON, GARN, EXON, HEFLIN, GRASSLEY, and THURMOND.

This legislation is mandated despite the best efforts of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], myself, and others during the last Congress who joined me in trying to prevent the IRS from promulgating Revenue Ruling 83-3.

This legislation is also mandated even though the President's tax reform proposal protects the tax exempt status of the military and clergys' housing allowance and the deductibility of mortgage interest payments for an individual's principal residence.

The President's proposal, unfortunately, does not prevent Revenue Ruling 83-3 from being implemented, thereby depriving members of the military and the clergy a substantial portion of their total compensation.

On several occasions during the 98th Congress this Senator, along with others, sponsored bills and amendments seeking to retain the current tax treatment of housing allowances for our uniformed service personnel and clergy.

The first major push came last June when the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from North Carolina successfully offered an amendment to the 1985 Defense authorization bill.

Unfortunately, many items considered nongermane to the DOD authorization bill were dropped in conference with the House of Representatives.

This amendment was one such item.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees' statement on this issue be included at this point in my comments to illustrate the significance with which this matter was viewed at the time.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Clarification of tax treatment of certain allowances.—The Senate amendment contained a provision (sec. 160c) that would provide, for purposes of the tax benefit rule of section 265(1) of the Internal Revenue Code, that military housing and subsistence allowances and ministers' parsonage allowances not be considered as exempt fom the Federal income tax.

The House bill contained no similar provision.

The conferees are deeply troubled by the prospect of an Internal Revenue Service ruling that would treat military housing allowances in such a manner as to disallow military homeowners' itemized deductions of mortgage interest and real property taxes on their Federal income tax returns. The specter of such a ruling has created substantial anxiety within the armed forces.

The Congress has consistently considered the tax advantage that accrues to military allowances in defining and setting military compensation levels. (See section 101(25) of title 37, United States Code.) If the tax advantage component of military compensation were to be neutralized by a change in current tax practice, then it would be necessary to adjust the other components of military compensation accordingly. The conferees believe that the better course would be to preserve the current tax practice.

In the interest of setting the concerns of service members to rest, the conferees were sorely tempted to retain section 160c of the Senate amendment. Unfortunately, inclusion of the provision in Senate amendment. Unfortunately, inclusion of the provision in the conference report might be ruled to violate the rules of the House of Representatives by including a tax measure in legislation not reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. Consequently, the conferees reluctantly agreed to drop the provision.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, another major effort to get this issue before the Congress came on September 26, 1984, when the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD] held hearings in the Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management.

In response to testimony by Congressman PARRIS, representatives of affected groups and myself, Senators PACKWOOD and MOYNIHAN expressed their strong support for retention of the pre-83-3 treatment.

Senator PACKWOOD, recognizing the need to remove the chilling effect this ruling already created, offered his assistance to bring this issue before the Congress before adjournment.

Unfortunately, time ran out before that action could be taken.

But now, as the Congress begins its deliberations on tax reform, it seems appropriate to this Senator that attention be directed to revenue ruling 83-3 and the impact it will have on the military and clergy.

This is an issue of fundamental and urgent importance that has produced great fear and confusion.

Currently, ministers who purchased a home prior to 83-3 have protection from its effects until January 1, 1987.

However, those ministers who purchased a home after the effective date of 83-3 are affected immediately and have paid additional taxes on their 1984 returns because this situation was not resolved last year.

In addition, the Internal Revenue Service and the Treasury have been internally examining the extension of the housing allowance aspect of 83-3 to all uniformed service personnel receiving housing allowances.

Every day, hundreds of service people are forced to make rent-or-buy decisions with this issue hanging over their heads like the "Sword of Damocles."

With this background, Senators can see that the action Congress takes on this bill will assume tremendous signficance to our Nation's military personnel, our clergy, the families of both groups, and many builders and realtors.

This Senator fully supports continuation of the pre-83-3 tax treatment in both cases, not on the grounds of special treatment, though that is, indeed, justified.

This Senator takes this position because it is demonstrably more cost effective.

While, at first blush, it might seem proper that no one should use tax-free dollars to finance a tax deductible expense, closer examination reveals that, in these special cases, blind application of that concept not only leads to a serious decline in morale for the affected groups, but also creates a potential net loss for the Treasury.

The figure we historically use for determining comparability relative to civilian professions in "regular military compensation," or RMC.

The RMC is defined in title 37 of the United States Code of include the tax advantages resulting from tax-free allowances paid to military personnel.

Subsequently, Congress has historically computed the total compensation package of the military with these allowances included.

If revenue ruling 83-3 were applied to the military, as the IRS fully intends to do, it would breach longstanding pay and benefit commitments.

Further, the Department of Defense estimates that if 83-3 were applied, at least 270,000 military homeowners, at any one time, will incur an additional tax burden equivalent to 4 to 6 percent of their pay. Equity considerations and the potential impact on retention would virtually force us to restore the lost take-home pay.

The only way to restore RMC to its previous level of comparability would be through a pay raise. There is no way to target such a raise to homeowners only. Thus, it would cost approximately $1.2 billion while revenues gained by implementing 83-3 on the military would be about $350 million; a net loss to the Treasury of approximately $800 million.

In the case of the clergy, their salaries are paid by the tax-deductible contributions of the members of their respective congregations. Any loss to a minister due to additional taxes he must pay as a result of 83-3 will inevitably be made up by increased contributions from members of the congregation.

The contributions are tax deductible and, of course, must be greater than the after-tax net income of the minister since his housing costs are now greater due to his inability to deduct his mortgage interest costs to the extent of the tax-exempt housing allowance he receives.

As a result, the Treasury loses more income from increased charitable deductions than it receives from implementation of 83-3.

Gen. John W. Vessey, Jr., Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the uniformed military adviser to the Commander in Chief, has assessed the impact of 83-3 and stated his deep concern. And I quote:

> Our most conservative projections indicate that this action would result in the loss of tens of thousands of trained career officers and enlisted personnel essential to the maintenance of the readiness of our forces.
> This revenue ruling (83-3) issue will continue to take its toll on the morale and welfare of service members until it is favorably and permanently resolved.

Mr. President, this is the most important pay and benefit issue of immediate impact to military personnel and clergy.

Failure to resolve it promptly could have more impact on military retention than almost any other personnel issue.

The problem for the clergy is equally critical. Retaining the pre-83-3 tax treatment will add no new costs to the Federal budget.

In fact, as this Senator has explained, prohibiting implementation of the housing allowance aspects of 83-3 for both the clergy and the military will save the Treasury substantial sums of money.

It has long been the intent of Congress that these housing allowances be tax exempt and that the military and clergy be able to take full advantage of the mortgage interest deduction as well.

The advantage for military personnel resulting from this consideration is an integral part of RMC. Congress has explicitly recognized and used this principle in setting military pay rates for many, many years. In addition, 83-3 contradicts earlier revenue rulings that expressly allowed such deductions.

I urge my colleagues in both Houses to act now to stop this unnecessary and fiscally unproductive attack on the morale of two professions central to our Nation. This measure will provide favorable and prompt resolution to this issue.

Congress must not leave the "Sword of Damocles" hanging over the heads of so many when it is within our power and ability to remove it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two recent statements from the Internal Revenue Service on these matters be included at this point in my statement. Further, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in full at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1595

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DEDUCTIONS FOR CERTAIN EXPENSES INCURRED BY MEMBERS OF UNIFORMED SERVICES OF THE UNITED STATES, OR BY MINISTERS, WHO RECEIVE HOUSING, SUBSISTENCE OR PARSONAGE ALLOWANCES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—With respect to any mortgage interest or real property tax costs paid or incurred by any minister of the gospel or any member of a uniformed service (within the meaning given to such term by section 101(3) of title 37, United States Code) or to a subsistance, quarters, housing or equivalent allowance or to income excluded from gross income of the taxpayer under section 107 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to rental value of parsonages) the application of section 285(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall be determined without regard to Revenue Ruling 83-3 (and without regard to any other regulation, ruling, or decision reaching the same result, or a result similar to the result, set forth in such Revenue Ruling).

(b) Members of Uniformed Services.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 7 of title 37, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 431. Tax deductions allocable to basic allowance for quarters and basic subsistence allowance

"In determining whether any deduction allocable to basic allowance for quarters (including any variable housing allowance, station housing allowance, or similar allowance) or basic subsistence allowance is allowable under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, and only for such determination, such allowance shall not be considered as exempt from income taxes nor shall any such deduction be considered as reimbursed by the receipt of any such allowance.".

(2) TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section.

"431. Tax deductions allocable to basic allowance for quarters and basic subsistence allowance.".

(3) CROSS REFERENCES.—Section 134 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to cross references to other acts) is amended—

(A) by adding at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraph:

"(7) Allowances paid as part of regular military compensation, see section 101 (25) of title 37, United States Code.", and

(B) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) For deductions allocable to basic allowance for quarters and basic subsistence allowance see section 431 of title 37, United States Code.".

(c) MINISTERS.—Section 107 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to rental value of parsonages) is amended—

(1) by striking out the matter preceding paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof:

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—In the case of a minister of the gospel, gross income does not include—", and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) SPECIAL RULE.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, for the purposes of determining whether any deduction allocable to any allowance defined by this section or any similar housing allowance is allowable under this title, and only for such determination, such allowance shall not be considered as exempt from income taxes nor shall any such deduction be considered as reimbursed by the receipt of any such allowance.".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The provisions made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982.

NEWS RELEASE—DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

WASHINGTON.—The Internal Revenue Service today announced that it has not concluded its consideration of the question of whether members of the uniformed services are entitled, under current law, to take deductions on their income tax returns for home mortgage interest and property taxes to the extent they receive tax-free housing allowances from the federal government.

The IRS said, however, that any determination on the issue that would adversely affect members of the uniformed services would not be applied to home mortgage interest and property taxes paid before Jan. 1, 1987. The IRS had previously announced that no adverse decision would be applied to home mortgage interest and property taxes paid by members of the uniformed service before Jan. 1, 1985.

The uniformed services include all branches of the armed forces, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, and the Public Health Service. By law, eligible members are entitled to receive tax-free housing and subsistence allowances if they do not reside on a federal base.

NEWS RELEASE—DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

WASHINGTON.—The Internal Revenue Service today announced that for certain ministers Revenue Ruling 83-3 will not be applied until Jan. 1, 1987, to disallow deductions for mortgage interest and property taxes paid by a minister out of a tax-free parsonage allowance. Relief from the disallowance of deduction is provided only to ministers who owned and occupied a home before Jan. 3, 1983, or who, on that date, had a contract to purchase a home and later owned and occupied that home.

If, on Jan. 3, 1983, a minister owned and occupied a home or had a contract to purchase a home, but later ceased to occupy that home, the disallowance in Revenue Ruling 83-3 applies for any home the minister may subsequently occupy, regardless of when that occupancy begins.

The IRS explained that Internal Revenue Code section 265(1) disallows any deductions for expenses allocable to tax-exempt income. In Revenue Ruling 83-3, issued on Jan. 3, 1983, the IRS said that section 265(1) precludes deductions for mortgage interest and property taxes paid by a minister out of a tax-free parsonage allowance.

Revenue Ruling 85-96, which modifies Revenue Ruling 83-3, is attached and will be published in Internal Revenue Bulletin No. 1985-29, dated July 22, 1985.

PART I—SECTION 265

Expenses and Interest Relating to Tax-Exempt Income 26 CFR 1.265-1: Expenses relating to tax-exempt income. (Also sections 107, 163, 164; 1.107-1, 1.163-1, 1.164-1.)

Rev. Rul. 85-96, Rev. Rul. 83-3, 1983-1 C.B. 72, holds, in part, that a minister may not deduct interest and property taxes that are allocable to a rental allowance excluded from gross income under section 107 of the Internal Revenue Code. This holding is based on section 265(1) of the Code, which provides, in part, that no deduction is allowed for any amount that is otherwise deductible but that is allocable to one or more classes of income (other than interest) wholly exempt from income tax. Section 7805(b) of the Code grants the discretion for any revenue ruling to be applied without retroactive effect. Under the authority contained in section 7805(b), Rev. Rul. 83-3 states that if a minister owned and occupied a home before January 3, 1983 (or before January 3, 1983, had a contract to purchase a home and subsequently owns and occupies that home), there will be no disallowance of deductions for interest and property taxes until the earlier of the date on which the minister no longer occupies the home or January 1, 1985.

Section 1052 of the Tax Reform Act of 1984, Pub. L. 98-369, provides that with respect to any mortgage interest or real property tax costs paid or incurred before January 1, 1986, by any minister of the gospel who owned and occupied a home before January 3, 1983 (or had a contract to purchase a home before such date and subsequently owned and occupied such home), the application of section 265(1) of the Code to such costs will be determined without regard to Rev. Rul. 83-3 (and without regard to any other regulation, ruling, or decision reaching the same result, or a result similar to the result, set forth in Rev. Rul. 83-3).

The Internal Revenue Service has decided, under the authority of section 7805(b), to grant further relief to taxpayers who may have relied on Rev. Rul. 62-212, 1962-2 C.B. 41, which was revoked by Rev. Rul. 83-3. Accordingly, deductions for mortgage interest and real property tax costs will not be disallowed under Rev. Rul. 83-3 if such costs are paid or incurred before January 1, 1987, and if section 1052 of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 would have applied to those costs had they been paid or incurred before January 1, 1986.

HOLDING

The second sentence of the next-to-the-last paragraph of Rev. Rul. 83-3 is amended to read as follows:

Further, if the minister described in Situation 2 owned and occupied a home before January 3, 1983, (or had a contract to purchase a home before January 3, 1983, and subsequently owns and occupies that home), the revenue ruling will not be applied to that minister so as to disallow deductions for mortgage interest or real property tax costs paid or incurred before January 1, 1987, or before such date as the minister ceases to occupy that home, whichever is earlier.

EFFECT ON OTHER REVENUE RULINGS

Rev. Rul. 83-3 is hereby modified.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am honored to join again with my friend from Virginia [Mr. WARNER] in a continuation of our efforts to protect ministers and military personnel from overreaching by the Internal Revenue Service. The basic problem is that the IRS is constantly looking for ways to bring about what they call "tax enhancement"—which are, in fact, tax increases. In this case the IRS, through administrative action, has targeted ministers and military personnel and the tax breaks Congress has previously extended these groups through legislation.

Mr. President, in early 1983 the IRS issued a ruling preventing ministers from deducting mortgage interest and taxes paid on their residence, to the extent that they receive a traditional, nontaxable parsonage allowance. Later, the IRS indicated that it would apply the some ruling to military personnel with respect to their quarters allowance.

Because of these IRS actions, I introduced S. 2017 on October 27, 1984, to maintain the status quo for both ministers and military personnel. When the deficit-reduction package came before the Senate in April 1984, Senator WARNER and I sponsored an amendment—which was adopted—to postpone the taking effect of the IRS ruling until January 1, 1986. Senator WARNER and I believed that the interim provided by our amendment would allow Congress to study the matter carefully, and then work its will before January 1, 1986. Many, including myself, have questioned whether the IRS should have attempted to make this substantive change in the law on its own anyway.

Mr. President, in addition to the Warner-Helms amendment postponing the full taking effect of the revenue ruling, we also offered an amendment to the Department of Defense authorization bill which, in a different way than S. 2017, would have maintained the status quo ante. This amendment was adopted in the Senate without opposition in June 1984, but it was deleted by the conference committee in an effort to maintain the customary prerogatives of the House on the initiation of revenue measures.

I believe these two separate Senate floor victories—which Senator WARNER and I have had in connection with this issue—demonstrate that there is strong support for the objectives we seek. Because of this strong support, I urge prompt action by the Senate during this session.

Mr. President, let me explain now in more detail the background of this issue and the reasons for enacting this legislation.

In early January 1983, the Internal Revenue Service published Revenue Ruling 83-3. In part, this ruling provides that ministers may no longer deduct interest and taxes paid on a personal residence to the extent the amounts expended are allocable to tax-exempt income. In addition, there have been indications that Revenue Ruling 83-3 will be applied to military personnel who likewise receive housing allowances.

Mr. President, it is common practice in the United States for a minister to be given a housing allowance by his church. Under section 107 of the Internal Revenue Code this allowance is excludable from the minister's gross income. Up to new ministers have, fully within the letter of the law, deducted interest and taxes from their income just like other taxpayers. In their case, however, this deduction has an additional benefit because some of their compensation, in the form of a housing allowance, is exempted from gross income by section 107. With Revenue Ruling 83-3 and its new application of section 265, the IRS is attempting to diminish the benefit of section 107 to the clergy.

Traditionally, Congress has tried to promote religion by refraining from taxing religious activities and by providing certain tax benefits for those involved in religious activities. We provide these tax benefits because of the longstanding recognition by the American people that Government exists to serve the common good of society. Government is the servant, not the master, of the people. Therefore, it is perfectly proper for the Government to give preferred status to certain institutions in society for the public good. Religion certainly occupies such a place in American society.

Also, Mr. President, ever since the formation of the various branches of our armed services, it has been the practice to provide military personnel with appropriate housing or with a housing allowance when appropriate housing has been unavailable. The granting of subsistence and housing allowances, separate and apart from actual pay, has been the traditional method for compensating members of the armed services and has been provided for either by regulation or by statute. It is codified today in title 37 of the United States Code.

Allowances paid to our military personnel have in the past been recognized as being exempt from taxation. Both the courts and the Internal Revenue Service have held that subsistence and housing allowances are not items of income. For many years IRS regulations specifically have provided that subsistence and housing allowances need not be included in the income tax returns of members of the uniformed services. Up to now, members of the Armed Forces have, fully within the letter of the law, deducted interest and taxes on their personal residences just like other taxpayers.

As with ministers, prior to Revenue Ruling 83-3, members of the uniformed service have received an additional benefit when taking such deductions because some of their compensation, in the form of housing and subsistence allowances, is exempted from gross income. In Revenue Ruling 83-3, the IRS has attempted to diminish the benefits available to the clergy. Now the possibility exists that the IRS will also apply 83-3 to the military.

Mr. President, it is my strong conviction, shared by Senator WARNER and others, that Revenue Ruling 83-3 should not be permitted by Congress to take effect in this way. In order to achieve the objectives of maintaining the status quo, I urge enactment of the legislation we are today introducing.

By Mr. WARNER:

S. 1596. A bill to amend the District of Columbia Stadium Act of 1957 to direct the Secretary of the Interior to convey title to the Robert F. Kennedy Memorial Stadium to the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

TRANSFER OF ROBERT F. KENNEDY MEMORIAL STADIUM TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation requiring the Secretary of the Interior to convey ownership of the Robert F. Kennedy Memorial Stadium to the District of Columbia.

The origin of this proposal goes back several years.

President Carter's Task Force on the District of Columbia in 1977 laid the foundation, and now the Department of the Interior and the District of Columbia government have supported this step to complete a transfer.

I strongly support this legislation which was approved by the House of Representatives in the 98th Congress and again in this Congress on June 24, 1985.

Comparable Senate action is timely.

The Congressional Budget Office, in a letter to Chairman DELLUMS of the House District of Columbia Committee on June 18, 1985, has determined that transfer of the stadium "will not affect the budgets of either the Federal Government or the District of Columbia."

The Secretary of the Interior authorized the District of Columbia Armory Board to issue 20-year bonds to finance the construction of the stadium in 1960. However, revenue from the stadium operations was never enough to meet the interest payments on the bonds or to begin payment on the principal.

The District of Columbia has covered the interest payments of $12.8 million.

In the District of Columbia Appropriations Act of Fiscal Year 1978 and 1979, the bond principal of $19.8 million was jointly repaid by the Federal Government and the District of Columbia.

The District of Columbia, through the Armory Board, has operated and maintained the stadium since its construction, and has financed two-thirds of the stadium costs—$22.7 million of the total $36.2 million.

This transfer will not be a departure from the normal use of the stadium, or its operating procedures.

Provisions are included which require the District of Columbia to use the stadium for purposes previously approved by the Department of the Interior.

Should the terms and conditions of this agreement be reached, an orderly process for returning the ownership to the Federal Government is provided.

In the spirit of federalism, there is simply no logical reason for the Federal Government to own a stadium, a responsibility which should be purely local.

As an avid sports fan, and an unpaid director of the Washington Redskins, I am hopeful that this legislation will also enhance the attraction of the Nation's Capital as a major league baseball city.

As you may know, the District of Columbia is actively engaged in a campaign to win a major league baseball franchise for the city.

Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth has indicated that a favorable stadium lease, including needed repairs to the stadium, is a key prerequisite in determining the site of a new franchise.

The District of Columbia is prepared to make the estimated $16 million in repairs with public and private funds.

This transfer legislation removes any Federal taxpayer obligation for future operation or maintenance of the stadium, and allows the District of Columbia to compete fairly with other cities for a major league baseball franchise.

I have asked the distinguished chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, Mr. MCCLURE, to schedule a hearing on the bill soon after the Senate returns from the August recess so that we may bring it to the floor before adjournment.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1596

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CONVEYANCE OF STADIUM

Section 7 of the District of Columbia Stadium Act of 1957 (D.C. Code, sec. 2-326) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" after "Sec. 7."; and

(2) by inserting after subsection (a) the following new subsections:

"(b) The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'Secretary') shall convey without consideration to the government of the District of Columbia all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the stadium constructed under this Act.

"(c) The conveyance of real property under subsection (b) shall be subject to such terms and conditions (which shall be set forth in the instrument of conveyance) as will ensure that title to the property shall not be transferred by the District to any person or entity other than the United States and that the property will be used only—

"(1) for stadium purposes;

"(2) for providing recreational facilities, open space, or public outdoor recreation opportunities;

"(3) for such other public purposes for which the property was used prior to June 1, 1985; and

"(4) for such other public purposes for which the property was approved for use by the Secretary with the concurrence of the National Capital Planning Commission prior to June 1, 1985.

"(d)(1) the instrument of conveyance referred to in subsection (c) shall provide all right, title, and interest conveyed to the District of Columbia pursuant to such instrument shall revert to the United States if—

"(A) the terms and conditions referred to in subsection (c) have not been complied with, as determined by the Secretary, and

"(B) such noncompliance has not been corrected within ninety days after written notice of such noncompliance has been received by the Mayor of the District of Columbia.

Such noncompliance shall be treated as corrected if the District of Columbia and the Secretary enter into an agreement, with the concurrence of the National Capital Planning Commission, which the Secretary considers adequate to ensure that the property will be used in a manner consistent with the purposes referred to in subsection (c).

"(2) No person may bring an action respecting a violation of any term or condition referred to in subsection (c) before the expiration of ninety days after the date on which such person has notified the Mayor of the District of Columbia of the alleged violation. By Mr. WARNER:

S. 1597. A bill to authorize awards, decorations, insignia, and other recognition for service on the U.S. Merchant Marine, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

MERCHANT MARINE DEFENSE SERVICE RECOGNITIONS AND MEDALS ACT

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to authorize the Secretary of Transportation to issue medals for service in the merchant marine during World War II and subsequent conflicts and to issue medals, ribbons, or bars previously awarded for merchant marine service.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of Transportation to provide a U.S.-flag and grave markers for burials of merchant marine veterans who served in World War II, subsequent conflicts or in significant military operations.

Identical legislation, H.R. 679, was introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative MARJORIE HOLT.

My legislation is designed to provide appropriate recognition for merchant mariners who have served the United States in wartime. This measure establishes some comparability with persons who served under similar circumstances in the Armed Forces of the United States.

In both World Wars I and II, the U.S. merchant marine was greatly expanded to provide the necessary logistic support without which our forces could not have operated successfully overseas.

In 1917, troop ships, hospital ships, vessels serving in the war and Navy Departments and commercial vessels engaged in trade to ports in war zones were taken over by the Navy.

Naval Reserve members in the Naval Auxiliary Service were called to active duty to operate such ships under the Naval Overseas Transportation Service which transported about 60 percent of the supplies sent to the American Expeditionary Force in Europe, supplies to all U.S. naval bases abroad and other essential shipping purposes.

When the United States entered World War I, its ocean going merchant marine was very small and a tremendous effort was made to expand the U.S. merchant shipping capacity.

Vice Admiral A. Gleaves, USN, who commanded the Cruiser and Transport Force, stated in "The History of the Transport Service," published in 1921, that the merchant marine and Navy had worked together shoulder to shoulder during the war period, without differences or distinction as to status.

He further stated:

The outstanding lesson which the experience of the war has driven home is of value both in peace and in war of a prosperous deepsea merchant marine.

The loss of merchant mariners due to enemy action in World War I numerically exceeded that of Navy losses.

With the advent of World War II, thousands of seafarers were needed to man new ships of all types that were soon to be coming off the ways.

The War Shipping Administration built U.S. Maritime Service training stations at ports around the Nation for a tremendous expansion of the U.S. merchant marine.

Men of the merchant marine shared the fighting during World War II with Navy armed guard crews and communications personnel assigned to augment the small merchant marine complements.

The percent of merchant marine personnel lost to enemy action was greater than that of any armed service with the possible exception of the Marine Corps.

However, the Navy did not mobilize the merchant marine in World War II as it had done in World War I.

Although President Roosevelt decided not to militarize the merchant marine, in the sense that it would have become officially an armed service, Admiral Land established the U.S. Maritime Service along Navy lines complete with Navy grades, similar uniforms, insignia, medals, ribbons, et cetera.

It was known as the fourth arm of defense.

Service in the merchant marine was voluntary.

Many joined who were too old or had disabilities which precluded their entry into the armed services.

Others joined because of the promise of early action with the enemy and were often not disappointed.

Following World War II, merchant marine veterans were given discharge lapel buttons, certificates of continuous service, and a document suitable for framing expressing the Nation's thanks from the President.

Because many returned to their shore occupations, they were given reemployment rights similar to veterans of the Armed Forces.

It is difficult to estimate the number of merchant mariners who served in World War II because accurate records are not available.

A considerable number of World War II merchant mariners either had served or subsequently served on active duty in the armed services.

Estimates of those who served in war zones in World War II range from 200,000 to 300,000.

Perhaps 25 to 50 percent of those are also veterans of an Armed Force.

Many have since died.

The sealift provided by the merchant marine remains indispensable to the ability of our armed services to sustain combat operations overseas.

Incentives are necessary to acquire and maintain a healthy sealift capacity.

In addition to acknowledging outstanding merit performed by members of the American merchant marine similar to official recognition of gallantry and heroism of men in the Armed Forces, this bill will serve as an incentive to others to adopt seafaring careers.

The disparity of treatment is highlighted when the merchant marine veteran of World War II, who is not also a veteran of the armed services, dies. This disparity was often brought to my attention, when serving as Secretary of Navy, by my special assistant for the merchant marine Robert Carl, a World War II merchant mariner of distinction.

Although the merchant mariner may have been exposed to considerable hardship and danger, fought the enemy, had ships sunk from under him and even may have been a prisoner of war, as more than 500 merchant mariners were during World War II, there is no official recognition of his sacrifices.

Additional costs incident to this bill with reference to the medals will be relatively small.

It is estimated 3,000 to 5,000 individuals may apply on reauthorization and the costs of administration and for new medals will be $18,000 to $30,000 total over several years.

Except for administration, the costs of replacements and medals for ribbons previously issued will be paid directly by those eligible.

It is estimated demand for flags and grave markers for deceased merchant mariners will range between 3,000 and 7,000 per year, costing, including administration costs, about $25 per death, for totals of $75,000 to $175,000 per year.

My bill will signal to these heroic merchant mariners that a great and grateful Nation does not forget their courageous service.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1597

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Merchant Marine Defense Service Recognition and Medals Act."

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Transportation ("Secretary"), is authorized to award any person decorations and insignia of appropriate design, including medals, ribbons, bars, ribbon bars, emblems, rosettes, miniature facsimiles, plaques, citations, or other appropriate awards, or other suitable devices or indicia symbolic thereof, and replacements or replicas therefor, for any of the following acts or service in the United States Merchant Marine:

(a) Distinguished service by outstanding acts, conduct, or valor beyond the line of duty;

(b) Meritorious acts, conduct or services, in the line of duty, but not of such outstanding character as would warrant an award for distinguished service;

(c) Service in time of war or national emergency proclaimed by the President or by Congress, or during operations by Armed Forces of the United States outside the continental United States, for such period of time and in such areas, or under such conditions or danger to life as the Secretary may set forth in regulations;

(d) For other acts or service of conspicious gallantry, intrepidity, extraordinary heroism, at risk of life above and beyond the call of duty which would warrant decorations or awards for members of the Armed Forces.

SEC. 3. The Secretary is authorized to issue a citation to any United States ship or to any foreign ship which participates in outstanding or gallant action in marine disasters or other emergencies for the purpose of saving life or property. The Secretary may award a plaque to a ship so cited, and a replica of such plaque may be preserved, as a permanent historic record. The Secretary may also award an appropriate citation ribbon bar to the master or each person serving on board such ship at the time of the action for which the citation is made. Any award or citation to a foreign ship or crew under this section shall be subject to the concurrence of the Secretary of State.

SEC. 4. (a) Not more than one of any type of medal shall be awarded to any one person, but for each succeeding act, conduct, or service justifying such an award, a suitable device may be awarded to be in worn with the medal or ribbon.

(b) In the event a person scheduled to receive any award under this Act is unable to accept it, the Secretary may make the award to an acceptable personal representative.

(c) The Secretary may provide at cost, or authorize for manufacture and sale at reasonable prices by private persons, the decorations or insignia awarded under the authority of Section 2 of this Act, and replacements, including awards, medals for ribbons and ribbon bars previously issued under this Act or any predecessor Act.

(d) Decorations authorized under Section 2 (c) and (d) of this Act may be of the same design as are authorized for members of the Armed Services for similar service or acts.

SEC. 5. The Secretary is authorized to issue a flag of the United States and grave markers for the burial or similar service of merchant mariners who served in the United States Merchant Marine in World War II, or in support of the Armed Forces of the United States or its allies in subsequent periods of conflict.

SEC. 6. The Secretary may prescribe rules and regulations as necessary to carry out this Act.

SEC. 7. The manufacture, sale, possession or display of any awards, decorations or insignia provided for in this Act, or in any rule or regulation issued pursuant to this Act, is prohibited except as authorized by this Act or any rule or regulation issued pursuant thereto. Whoever violates any provision of this Section shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $250 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both.

SEC. 8. The Merchant Marine Medals Act, as amended, (46 App. 249-249c), is repealed.

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 1598. A bill to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1971 to provide additional farm credit resources, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

S. 1599. A bill to establish a commission to study the structure of the Farm Credit System and recommend any appropriate changes, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

FARM CREDIT SYSTEM LEGISLATION

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today S. 1598, will provide assistance to the troubled Farm Credit System. Congressman COOPER EVANS, my colleague from Iowa introduced this bill in the House. I realize that this bill may not provide all the answers to the problems in the Farm Credit System but it can serve as a blueprint and a beginning. This bill would establish a central reserve for the Farm Credit System and authorizes the appropriation of $5 billion to capitalize this central reserve. The purpose of this reserve is to assist troubled banks and associations. During the time Federal funds are on deposit in this reserve, the Governor of the Farm Credit System will serve at the pleasure of the President and will be required to hold reserve funds in Treasury bills or some other liquid form.

This bill also requires the Federal land banks and associations to offer fixed-rate, 20-year real estate mortgages to be financed by issuing a separate class of long-term bonds, with interest rates on the mortgages to be limited to not more than 1½ percent above the interest rate on the bonds.

This bill would provide the Farm Credit Administration with enforcement powers similar to other financial institution regulatory agencies. It also directs the governor to issue regulations requiring banks and associations to provide by-laws, lists of directors and officers, and stockholder meeting schedules to stockholders and members of the banks and associations on an annual basis and other times on request. The Governor is required to develop guidelines for an annual financial audit to be conducted by each bank and association using an independent CPA and the results of this audit is to be presented to the stockholders and members at an annual meeting. Limits will be established to prevent banks and associations from concentrating an excessive portion of its loans with any one borrower.

In addition, the General Accounting Office is required to audit the Farm Credit System every 3 years and report the results to Congress. This bill also will increase collateral requirements for Federal Land Bank loans by reducing the percentage limits which determine the amount which can be loaned in relation to total collateral on the loan, this is to protect against sharp fluctuations in land values.

Today I am also introducing a bill, S. 1599, that will establish a Farm Credit System Review Commission. The purpose of this Commission is to examine the Farm Credit System and recommend organizational changes which will maintain the long-term viability of the Farm Credit System and allow it to adapt to the changing nature of American agriculture.

I encourage my colleagues to support this legislation and work with me toward solutions. It is critical that the Congress starts to take action to deal with the serious problems facing the Farm Credit System and its members.

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. DENTON Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. WILSON):

S. 1600. A bill to provide that certain of the Social Security Trust Funds be excluded from the Federal budget process for fiscal years beginning on or after October 1, 1985, and to clarify that specifications and directions with respect to such trust funds may not be included in any concurrent resolution on the budget adopted with respect to fiscal years beginning after such date; pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

TAKING SOCIAL SECURITY OUT OF THE UNIFIED BUDGET

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, it is time to make it clear where the Congress stands on Social Security. The House and the President have agreed that Social Security should be put outside the budget discussion. The Senate should now take the lead in locking that door. Consequently, I am introducing legislation today that will remove Social Security from the Federal budget and, therefore, from all current and future budget debates, beginning on October 1, 1985.

Over the past several months many of the proposals we have taken up to reduce the deficit have included across-the-board COLA freezes. There is no reason for the Senate to be defensive about these proposals, which in their various forms claimed widespread bipartisan support. At one time or another at least 60 Senators supported a freeze, whether it be the Chiles proposal, the so-called KGB plan, or the final budget resolution adopted by the Senate. In all those efforts the key element was fairness. Millions of Americans who would have been affected by a COLA freeze supported these deficit reduction efforts because they touched all programs and they were fair. Most importantly, these proposals were comprehensive and effective approaches to solving the deficit.

Despite our determined efforts at effective deficit reduction, the President and the House have closed off any consideration of Social Security in the budget debate. Thus, it is time for the Senate to take the lead in closing the door once and for all on any further debate on this issue.

Beyond the politics of the budget there are substantive reasons for taking Social Security off budget. Social Security is a trust-funded program with its own source of tax revenues. This program is financially sound. It currently brings in more revenues than it pays out and is projected to be solvent well into the next century.

Despite Social Security's unique status, it can be, and occasionally has been, a target for irresponsible budget cutting. That is why I proposed an amendment in 1982 and again in 1983 to immediately remove Social Security from the unified budget. When I proposed that we take Social Security out of the unified budget, I did so because the acrimonious budget battles nearly felled the effort to restore solvency to Social Security and to reduce the Federal budget deficit. My amendment was narrowly defeated, but the Social Security Amendments of 1983 included a provision to remove the trust funds from the unified budget in 1992.

Mr. President, I think Social Security is every bit as explosive an issue today as it was during those earlier debates. In fact, I don't think we will get a real budget until we separate Social Security from the budget process. The legislation I am introducing today will accelerate Social Security's departure from the budget to fiscal year 1986. I have discussed this with the chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator PACKWOOD, and he has indicated his support for this effort. Also, the bill I am introducing has broad bipartisan support and is cosponsored by Senators DURENBERGER, ABDNOR, RIEGLE, DECONCINI, ANDREWS, DENTON, MATHIAS, HAWKINS, SPECTER, and PRESSLER.

Mr. President, we have to recognize that with Social Security in the budget Congress loses sight of the real source of budget deficits. The real source of the budget deficit can be explained by basic arithmetic: We spend more on programs than we want to pay for from income taxes. Social Security now gives us billions in payroll taxes to make this difference look smaller. The real issue here is not Social Security, but rather our unwillingness to reconcile our expectations of Government with our tolerance for taxes. Social Security has nothing to do with this. We tax enough in Social Security to more than pay for the benefits. We deceive ourselves as to the structural causes of the deficit if we allow the current on-budget status of Social Security to obscure the unvarnished reality of spending beyond our means everywhere else.

Mr. President, we are now depending on Social Security to pay for programs that we don't have the guts to pay for through the income tax. This is a problem that can only get worse. Taking Social Security off budget will, in 1986, show the true deficit to be $16.8 billion higher than it is under current budget calculations. By 1990 it will be $67 billion higher. And, by the end of this century, if Social Security is not taken off budget we could well have more than $100 billion a year from its trust funds to lull us into a false sense of fiscal responsibility.

Not only does Social Security bail us out by masking the deficit, but it is an irresistible target for the budget cutters' knives. Social Security is a program of such enormous size—serving one out of seven Americans—the tremendous savings can be achieved with relatively small adjustments in the program. We have no other program—save defense—that allows us to make such sweeping deficit reductions with such a small stroke of the pen. We have to face up to the real need for spending reductions lies elsewhere.

Fifty years ago the Congress embarked on a new enterprise to guarantee a secure retirement, not just to those Americans who have already attained old age, but to the hundreds of millions of workers now planning for their retirement. The truly remarkable accomplishment of this system is the psychological security that it delivers. Yet, Mr. President, in the 15 years that the Social Security Program has appeared in the unified budget, the confidence of younger Americans has steadily declined. Today, the message of security is not being heard by younger generations. It's being drowned out by the hue and cry of deficit reduction. The radios of today's youth can barely detect the signals we work so hard to transmit on Social Security because of interference from our transmissions in the budget process.

Mr. President, we can never convince the younger generation of the durability of this program unless we respect the permanence of our promise. It is time that we recognize the uniqueness of this program with its own tax base, its own trust funds, and benefits based on earnings. We must stop holding Social Security hostage to the vicissitudes of budget negotiations. We need to free the program to pay benefits and collect contributions that American workers have come to rely on. It is my hope that by taking Social Security out of the budget debates, we can begin to restore public confidence in the system.

There is more at stake here than the integrity of the Social Security Program. I think we must concern ourselves in this Chamber with the integrity of the budget process. The mere mention of Social Security as a means to reduce deficits has once again threatened to grind the process to a halt.

We are never going to get an honest budget that has the agreement of both Chambers until we take Social Security out of the debate. We have nearly brought the budget process to grief in the last 5 years because of the mere mention of Social Security. If we are going to begin to get serious about budget deficits, we must heed the message that Social Security is clearly out of bounds. We must take the leadership to make sure it truly is out of bounds.

So, Mr. President, I rise today to urge my colleagues to join with me in moving the Social Security trust funds out of the unified budget so we can get on with the responsible job of solving our massive budget deficits.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1600

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a)(1) section 346(a)(2) of the Social Security Amendments of 1983 is amended by striking out "1992" and inserting in lieu thereof "1985".

(2) Section 346(b) of the Social Security Amendments of 1983 is amended by striking out "1992" and inserting in lieu thereof "1985".

(b) Section 710(a) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 911 note), as amended by section 346(b) of the Social Security Amendments of 1983 (to be effective with respect to fiscal years beginning on or after October 1, 1985, as provided in the amendments made by paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of this Act), is amended—

(A) by inserting "(1)" after the subsection designation; and

(B) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) No concurrent resolution on the budget considered under section 301, 304, or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (2 U.S.C. 632, 635, 641), or any amendment thereto, or conference report thereon, may contain any specifications or directions described in the second sentence of section 310(a) of such Act with respect to any Trust Fund specified in paragraph (1) of this subsection or with respect to revenues attributable to the taxes specified in such paragraph.".

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, this month marks the 50th anniversary of the signing into law of the Social Security Act. This landmark legislation has done so much to give all of us a measure of optimism and stability as we grow older.

As we celebrate the first half-century of Social Security, we must work together to sustain its future. The legislation that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] and I, with others, introduce today will help do that by removing the Social Security system from the unified budget. With enactment of this bill, decisions about Social Security can be based exclusively on maintaining solvent trust funds which guarantee benefits, rather than on other economic or budgetary constraints of the Government as a whole.

Legislation enacted in 1983 already requires that the Social Security and Medicare trust funds be removed from the budget beginning in fiscal year 1992. Our bill would immediately return Social Security to the same position of budget independence that it occupied from its origins until 1969. However, in our present attempts to reduce mounting Federal budget deficits, Social Security has become an unnecessary and unfair bargaining tool.

By removing Social Security from the unified budget, not only will we protect beneficiaries from recurring threats to the benefits on which they depend and which they have earned, but also we will gain a truer picture of just how bad the deficit problem really is. No longer will we mislead ourselves or the American people with distorted budget deficit figures that have reflected Social Security trust funds that don't belong in the picture.

Let us put the minds of our senior citizens at ease, once and for all. Let us end the temptation to make Social Security a political hostage to the necessity of controlling the budget deficits. Let us abandon cosmetic attempts to color the public perception of deficit figures. The time has come to return Social Security to its historic budgetary independence.●

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be added as a cosponsor of legislation offered by Senator HEINZ removing the Social Security trust funds from the unified Federal budget.

Approximately 36 million Americans are receiving Social Security benefits, and nearly 90 million Americans are supporting the program by paying Social Security taxes.

Social Security is the bedrock of retirement income, and as we all know, the only means of subsistence for millions of our older citizens.

The Social Security Amendments Act of 1983 provided in part for this process beginning in 1992.

By moving the date of enactment to October 1, 1985, we may once and for all set Social Security apart from normal budgetary considerations.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this effort.

By Mr. LEAHY:

S. 1601. A bill entitled the "Rural Transportation Equity Act of 1985"; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

RURAL TRANSPORTATION EQUITY ACT

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to ensure that Americans living in rural areas of this country will have access to vital health care and social service programs.

The Rural Transportation Equity Act, which I am introducing today, would clarify the funding formula for the Section 18 Rural Bus Line Program administered by the Urban Mass Transportation Administration. The Section 18 Program has provided almost $500 million in much-needed aid to transportation systems in rural areas since 1978. Nearly 1,000 communities are served by this program, drawing them even closer together with effective and reliable transportation systems.

Since its inception, the Section 18 Transportation Program has been a partnership among the Federal and State and local governments. Under a funding formula established in 1978 by an amendment I offered with Senator STAFFORD, the Federal Government provides half of the operating funds, while State and local governments provide the other half.

In addition, the funding formula we designed allowed State and local governments to use the Federal moneys they receive to fund half of the State and local portion of Section 18 Rural Bus Programs. The other half of the State and local funds were generally intended to come from purely State and local moneys, with some specific exceptions.

Until 1983, the Federal Highway Administration [FHWA] had jurisdiction over the Rural Bus Program. FHWA's longstanding interpretation of our funding formula permitted rural communities to use some Federal moneys to meet the so-called local match requirement. FHWA correctly recognized that rural areas often have difficulty competing with metropolitan areas for State transportation funds. In light of these difficulties, the agency relaxed the requirement that local governments must foot a full 25 percent of the bill for a rural bus line.

Certain Federal funds could be devoted to the local matching funds, including revenue sharing, Appalachian Regional Commission funds, and HUD community block grant development funds. In addition, State and local social service agencies were permitted to contract with section 18 transportation providers to transport clients to and from their offices and programs. These social service contracts are an integral source of funds for section 18 rural bus lines. A majority of these bus lines devote more than 50 percent of their services to transporting the elderly, ill, and handicapped.

Soon after UMTA assumed authority over the Rural Bus Program in 1983, however, the agency ruled that social service contracts could no longer be used as part of the local match. Mr. President, this decision, I believe, strays from our original intention in Congress and has jeopardized the ability of rural communities to provide citizens access to health care and social services—access that is taken for granted in metropolitan areas.

A recent study published by Rural America found that the average rural transportation system that uses social service contracts has suffered up to a 25-percent loss of funds as a result of the UMTA ruling.

The legislation I am introducing today would restore the longstanding interpretation of the law that contracts with social service agencies and may be used to fund the local portion of the Rural Bus Program.

A few brief examples of the kinds of services provided by section 18 bus lines, Mr. President, should bear out the need to restore the previous interpretation of the funding formula. In my own State of Vermont, David Palmer has run a most successful Section 18 Program in Bethel. The Stage Coach Line is a 15-vehicle operation which devotes the majority of its energy to transporting the elderly and infirm under contract from social service agencies. Elderly residents of eight towns near Bethel are picked up each day and driven to centers which provide low-cost meals and recreational activities. In addition, residents of the area may use the Stage Coach for transportation to mental health workshops and day care centers.

All around the country, Section 18 Bus Programs provide these kinds of services. In rural Pennsylvania dislocated workers are transported to job training sites. In the Plains States, deaf and blind citizens are provided transportation to schools and recreational centers. And in California, children ride on section 18 bus lines to participate in the Foster Grandparents Program.

Section 18 bus lines are a vital link between health care, nutrition, social services, and the residents of the rural areas of this Nation. It was not too long ago that these important programs were only available in major metropolitan areas. Rural parts of this country were left out, for the most part. UMTA's misguided interpretation of the law has now made it more difficult for rural Americans to have access to the programs and services we fought so hard to bring to rural areas.

Mr. President, Americans living in rural areas are entitled to the same services and programs offered to other Americans. This is something we all agree upon. The Rural Transportation Equity Act would require UMTA to recognize that a consensus exists in this country in favor of the equitable treatment of rural America, and would enable section 18 bus lines to more readily provide citizens in rural areas with transportation to social service and health care programs.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being on objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1601

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 18(e) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "For the purpose of this subsection, the term 'Federal funds or revenues' does not include funds received by a recipient of funds under this section pursuant to a service agreement with a State or local social service agency or a private social service organization.".●

By Mr. SPECTER (for himself, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, and Mr. MURKOWSKI):

S. 1602. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to assist certain disabled veterans in acquiring specifically adapted residences; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

SPECIAL ADAPTED RESIDENCES FOR CERTAIN DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am proud to be introducing legislation today with my colleagues, Senators FRANK MURKOWSKI, and JAY ROCKEFELLER which would amend title 38, section 801, concerning the Veterans Administration's Adaptive Housing Program for disabled veterans.

This legislation would change title 38 to enhance the fairness of current law as it relates to America's veterans who have been blinded or have lost the use of both hands while serving their Nation. Unfortunately, the loss of the use of one's eyes or hands makes it difficult or impossible to live in comfort in a conventional home. In recognition of these disabled veterans' needs and of their service to the United States, the VA provides them with a $6,000 grant to be used in acquiring adaptations to their homes that are necessary due to their disability.

Currently, a blinded or disabled veteran eligible for this grant cannot use it toward the purchase of a home that has already been adapted. Yet, other disabled veterans who qualify for a similar adaptive housing grant under title 38, section 801(a) are able to utilize their grant to purchase an already adopted home. The legislation which I am introducing would correct this inequality in title 38, section 801(b), by enabling veterans covered under this section to also apply their grant to the purchase of a home that is already equipped with the adaptations that they need to live full and productive lives.

There would be no significant financial cost involved in making this change. The $6,000 grant for adaptations is already in effect. This bill would simply allow these disabled veterans to receive the money in a way that will be more useful to many of them.

This measure has the full support of the Blinded Veterans Association, chartered by this Congress in 1958 to serve as the official representative of America's blinded veterans. In addition, VA Administrator Harry Walters has endorsed this bill and it has already been favorably reported by the House of Representatives.

This legislation will bring fairness to current law and will help many veterans who were blinded or who lost the use of their hands while serving their country, by enabling them to purchase a home that has already been sensitized to their disability. We can make a major difference to the lives of these courageous people at an insignificant cost. I, therefore, urge all of you to joint with me in supporting this long overdue measure.

● Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, with pride, I am joining my distinguished colleagues, Senators SPECTER and MURKOWSKI, in introducing legislation to address the special needs of our Nation's blind veterans. As a member of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, which is chaired by Senator MURKOWSKI, this bill reflects my stong commitment to ensuring that all veterans are recognized for their sacrifices and service on behalf of our country.

As Senator SPECTER has explained, the legislation would amend title 38, section 801 concerning the Veterans Administration's existing Adaptive Housing Program for disabled veterans. We seek to make a very minor change in the current law; however, if and when enacted, it will result in providing more fairness to veterans who were blinded in service defending America.

This bill would amend the law to enable a service-connected blinded veteran to use a $6,000 adaptive housing grant, provided by the VA in an existing program, to purchase a home which already has the modifications he requires. It appears that the original authors overlooked the need to make this provision explicit. There is no reason to require a blinded veteran to purchase a home without the needed modifications in order to qualify for the grant. Through this bill, the veteran would receive this modest assistance for the best housing option available, which makes sense financially for him and fulfills the intent of the original law. For example, in another part of the original law, other disabled veterans who qualify for a different adaptive housing grant are clearly able to use a $37,000 grant to purchase a home with adaptions already constructed.

I wish to commend the Blinded Veterans Association for their assistance in bringing this matter to my attention as soon as I joined the Veterans Committee. The BVA was chartered by Congress in 1958 to serve as the official representative of America's blinded veterans. The organization has done an excellent job in educating Congress and the VA about the Adaptive Housing Program and the need improving upon its provisions for blinded veterans.

The Veterans' Administration is on record in support of this legislation. And the bill's companion has already been received favorably by the House Veterans Committee.

I encourage all of my colleagues in the Senate to join Senators MURKOWSKI, SPECTER, and myself in working to enact this legislation on behalf of blinded veterans. In doing so, we will bring more fairness and equity to a fine law in order to further pay the debt we owe to veterans who were disabled in performing their duty to America.●

By Mrs. HAWKINS:

S. 1603. A bill to amend the Truth in Lending Act to impose a national ceiling on credit card interest rates; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

NATIONAL CREDIT CARD CONSUMER PROTECTION ACT

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to curtail the amount of interest charged on credit cards. This is a consumer issue that has concerned me for some time, and one that I believe requires our action.

According to the Congressional Research Service in December 1980, the prime rate in this country was 21.50 percent—an all-time high. In November of that year, just 1 month earlier, interest rates on credit cards were 17.41 percent.

Today, the prime rate is 9½ percent but interestingly, the average interest rate reported for credit cards in May of this year which is the most recent data available, was 18.71 percent.

As we all know the prime rate is usually defined as the rate that banks charge their most creditworthy customers. What I want to know is why the rest of us, who are also creditworthy customers, are being charged 18, 20 and even 22 percent. The American consumer is being taken to the cleaners to the tune of $12 billion annually which is the amount that Consumer Reports magazine recently reported lenders are making in interest collection assuming an average 18-percent interest rate. The magazine also reported another $3.4 billion in annual fees was collected by the issuers of the five major cards and 1 to 6 percent of the dollar value of each transaction was charged to merchants who use those cards.

Credit cards provide a safe and convenient method of payment. They are popularly used from vocationers to elderly consumers preferring not to carry cash. The bill I am introducing today will impose a national ceiling on credit card interest rates. It amends the Truth in Lending Act and provides that the interest rate on credit cards may not exceed more than 5 percentage points the average of the investment yield of U.S. Treasury bills, with maturities of 26 weeks, which were outstanding the year before.

I believe that this legislation is overdue. Credit card interest rates have remained consistently high over the past year and have not responded to anything other than State imposed usuary ceilings. The bill I am introducing today would ensure a reasonable ceiling nationwide. The average investment yield on U.S. Treasury bills in 1983 was 9.27. In 1984 it was 10.43. If this bill had been enacted last year, the maximum interest rate that could be charged this year on credit cards would be 15.43 percent—5 percentage points above 10.43 percent.

Mr. President, I do not favor legislative action to remedy this problem. I would prefer the banks to take voluntary action, but I do not see any movement in that direction, and I can no longer stand by and watch the elderly residents of my State on fixed incomes, or the young couples struggling to start a family, or the middle-class parents who are trying to send their son or daughter to college, continue to be gouged by these outrageous interest rates. Consumers need a friend on this issue. I urge my colleagues to join me in ths effort.

Mr. President, I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1603

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That this act may be cited as the "National Credit Card Consumer Protection Act".

SEC. 2. Section 107 of the Truth in Lending Act (15 U.S.C. 1606) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(f) The annual percentage rate which may be charged during a calendar year on an extension of credit obtained by use of a credit card may not exceed by more than 5 percentage points the average of the investment yield of United States Treasury bills with maturities of 26 weeks which were outstanding during the most recent 12-month period preceding January 1 of that year for which data are available, as determined by the Board.".●

By Mr. RIEGLE:

S. 1604. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to waive the late enrollment penalty under Medicare part B for any disabled individual who was covered under his own or his spouse's private employment-related health insurance; to the Committee on Finance.

ELIGIBILITY FOR SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY INSURANCE

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing S. 1604, a bill which will eliminate an inequity which exists in the Medicare Program for Social Security disability insurance [SSDI] beneficiaries. There is a small number of SSDI beneficiaries who are eligible for Medicare but who have failed to enroll because they have health coverage through the extension of their work-related health insurance or a spouse's employment-related health care plan. If these individuals ever need to enroll in the Medicare part B program, they will be subject to a 10-percent annual penalty for their delayed enrollment. This bill will address this persistent inequity.

Mr. President, as you know Medicare is a program first enacted in 1965 as title VIII of the Social Security Act to provide financial access to vital health care services to our elderly population. In 1973, Medicare coverage was extended to disabled individuals entitled to Social Security disability insurance for 24 months or more. Since its inception, the program has experienced an enormous growth. In 1983, 27-million elderly and 3-million disabled individuals were enrolled in the Medicare Program. In 1983, Medicare expenditures equaled $58.8 billion and accounted for 17 percent of all health care expenditures in this country. In 1986, Medicare is estimated to cost $67 billion. It is clear that this program is serving a vital source of access for our seniors and disabled individuals.

When Medicare was first enacted in 1965, a 10-percent annual surcharge was assessed against those who delayed their enrollment in the voluntary part B—supplemental medical insurance—of Medicare. This provision was enacted to create a disincentive for individuals who were planning to delay enrollment until they became ill and in need of health care services. This was a provision based on sound actuarial accounting and was designed to assure a sufficient amount of premiums to assist in the funding of the program. At that time, there was a maximum of a 30-percent penalty because the enrollment period for the part B of Medicare was limited to 3 years. In 1972, the limited enrollment period was abolished. However, Congress failed to repeal or cap the part B surcharge. We now have a small population of individuals who have incurred a substantial penalty for their late enrollment. According to the Health Care Financing Administration [HCFA], in 1983, 169 seniors were paying a 150-percent penalty and 18 seniors were paying a 160-percent penalty. This penalty is an add-on to their monthly premium payment. There are situations where this surcharge is not only unfair and inequitable but is penalizing American citizens who are actually saving the Federal Government significant Medicare outlays.

Congress recently addressed this problem and rectified a similar circumstance where old age and survivors beneficiaries were being inappropriately penalized. Included in Public Law 97-248, the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 [TEFRA], was the "working aged" provisions which made Medicare the "secondary payer" for certain elderly workers. The provisions amended the Federal Age Discrimination Employment Act [ADEA] to require employers to offer their employees aged 65 to 69 and their dependents the equivalent health care coverage as their younger employees. It became clear that it would be inappropriate to penalize these individuals and subject them to the part B premium surcharge if enrollment in the part B program would simply duplicate their work-based health care coverage. This inequity was rectified with the passage of Public Law 98-369, the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 [DEFRA], which exempted these individuals from the surcharge.

The bill I am introducing today, S. 1604, would address another circumstance where individuals are being inappropriately penalized. A small number of disabled individuals who are qualified for Medicare as a result of their eligibility for SSDI, receive their health care coverage through a spouse's employment-related health care plan or through the continuation of their own work-related health plan. They are saving the Federal Government health care dollars by their utilization of an employment-related plan to cover the expenses of their disability and health care needs and they should not be penalized for their efforts. This bill will eliminate the part B premium penalty for the disabled person and/or disabled spouse who are enrolled in a group health care plan provided by the beneficiary's former employment or a spouse's current or former employment.

I urge all my colleagues to support this piece of legislation and help to eliminate this inequitable and unfair situation. We must persist in our efforts of making Medicare affordable, accessible, and fair in its design and implementation.●

By Mrs. HAWKINS:

S. 1605. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to increase the amount of the credit for dependent care expenses, to make such credit refundable, and to provide that certain respite care expenses are eligible for such credit; to the Committee on Finance.

CREDIT FOR DEPENDENT CARE EXPENSES

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to expand the dependent care tax credit and make it refundable for those whose tax liability does not exceed the credit to which they are otherwise entitled. This legislation would also provide for a limited credit for respite care expenses. Respite care is a service afforded seriously ill or disabled dependants and provides the caregiver some relief to their demanding job.

I have been involved in this issue for many years and am convinced that the dependant care tax credit plays a very important role in both young and older families. Access to affordable dependent care is a crucial factor in ensuring that women, who have a disproportionate share of the responsibility for caring for these family members, have an equal opportunity to enter and continue in the job market. The tax credit enables them to work and contribute to the economy while avoiding the terribly high costs of institutional care for children and elderly dependents.

Almost 46 percent mothers with children under three are in the labor force as are almost 57 percent of mothers with children ages 3 to 5. Additionally, 1 in 10 middle-aged women between 45 and 65 has responsibility for an older relative, and nearly 1 million women aged 44 to 58 claim that the health of a family member limits their work.

The need for this tax credit is well established. It is critical to young families with children who are struggling to keep up with the cost of living. Unfortunately, economic realities dictate that many mothers absolutely must work. Two-thirds of the women in the work force are either sole providers or have husbands who earn less than $15,000. Almost one in six American families is headed by a woman. If affordable child care is unavailable, the children are left to fend for themselves. As many as 6 to 7 million children 13 years and under may go without care for a substantial part of the day—those are alarming statistics. Broadening the dependent care tax credit is clearly another tool that we can use to help keep our children safe.

The credit is equally important to families caring for an elderly dependent. The availability of the dependent care tax credit encourages women in these families to stay in the work force. However, for those who do retire to assume the full-time job of caring for a dependent family member, it is important that the use of respite care be encouraged to give them an opportunity to rejuvenate. In the long run, this will enable them to provide quality care to the family member for a longer period of time.

Currently, the dependent care tax credit is available to taxpayers who incur work related expenses for the care of a child under the age of 15, a disabled spouse, or any other dependent who is physically or mentally incapable of caring for himself or herself. The sliding scale provides the maximum benefit to the lower income families, but it does not go far enough. It currently allows a 30-percent credit for work related dependent care expenditures up to $2,400 for taxpayers with incomes of $10,000 or less. The credit is reduced by the percentage point for each $2,000 of income between $10,000 and $28,000 to a minimum of 20 percent.

This is a rather unrealistic picture of the amount of assistance needed by low-income families. Under the current system, a family earning $10,000 a year would have to pay $2,400 per year, nearly one-fourth of its income, to receive the maximum credit. Most families at this income level are unable to spend that amount of money on child care. The scale needs to be adjusted to provide them with more assistance so that child care can be a realistically affordable option for them. In so doing, we will be directly assisting those children who have been left alone for several hours in the day while their mothers work. It is the children who will benefit from this change.

The bill I am introducing today would raise the sliding scale to 50 percent of work related expenses for families earning $11,000 or less. The scale would be reduced by 1 percentage point for each full $2,000 of income with earnings of $41,000 or more receiving a maximum credit of 20 percent. By expanding the credit to give low-income families greater access to the benefits of the credit, we are providing an incentive to these families to join or stay in the work force. Additionally, and very importantly, the credit would be refundable. A refundable tax credit that is also indexed to the cost of living will allow low-income families to take full advantage of the credit.

This legislation expands the concept of the dependent care tax credit and allows a credit for respite care. The credit is available for up to $1,200 of expenses for one dependent and $2,400 for two individuals. The legislation allows the care giver to either hire someone to come to the home and care for the dependent or to take the dependent to an adult day care center. It also permits a maximum 2-week stay in an institution. This is to allow the care giver an adequate block of free time each year in order to thoroughly rejuvenate and tend to personal affairs.

Respite care is a service afforded a dependent person which allows the full-time care giver some relief to the full-time job of tending to the needs of a dependent relative. It is a new concept, but a vitally important one. Full-time care of an elderly person is exhausting, demanding and sometimes lonely work. Respite care will allow the caregiver an opportunity to rest for a few hours during the day and tend to personal and family matters. In the long run, this will provide the caregiver with more stamina and mental energy to deal with the demands of this round-the-clock job.

Mr. President, I believe that I have established the critical need for expansion of the dependent care tax credit in my statement. This is an issue that affects our families—the very nucleus of society. The availability of affordable care for our children and family members who are unable to care for themselves should be a national priority. I hope that my colleagues will join me in this effort to enact a reform that keeps pace with our changing society, a society in which more and more women are working and there is a growing need for affordable child care.●

By Mr. DOLE (for himself and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S. 1606. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to revise the methodology for computing the additional payment to hospitals for indirect costs of medical education, and to provide an additional payment for hospitals which serve a disproportionate share of low-income or Medicare payments; to the Committee on Finance.

INDIRECT GRADUATE MEDICAL EDUCATION REIMBURSEMENT AND DISPROPORTIONATE SHARE HOSPITALS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today I join my distinguished colleague Senator DURENBERGER in introducing S. 1606, a bill that revises the way the Medicare Program pays for the indirect costs of teaching hospitals and also provides for an added payment to hospitals serving a large number of poor elderly. The primary purpose of this bill is to begin working toward a more accurate and equitable Medicare reimbursement method for hospitals that have graduate medical education programs and/or serve a large portion of low-income elderly. While the bill we offer brings us closer to our stated purpose, we recognize that it is only the first step. We welcome suggestions and comments on the bill.

THE INDIRECT TEACHING ADJUSTMENT

Medicare currently provides an added payment to hospitals to account for the indirect costs of medical education programs. These so-called indirect costs are due to the increased patient care costs that are associated with the presence of a teaching program. These costs exist for a variety of reasons, such as an increase in the number of tests and procedures ordered and increased staffing requirements.

The original adjustment was calculated on the basis of the number of residents per bed. In 1983, when we moved away from cost based reimbursement to the new DRG system, due to a lack of clear information that took into account nonteaching factors that legitimately increase hospitals' costs, the Congress doubled the original adjustment factor. It was Congress' stated intention to continue the doubling until a better method could be developed. And I believe we have developed an interim strategy that is better.

S. 1606 has three major provisions which revise the indirect payment. First we reduce the overall level of the adjustment by approximately one quarter. Second, the reimbursement formula has been changed to take into account economies that are gained with the increase in size of a teaching program. The current formula provides for an 11.597-percent increase to each payment for every 0.1 of resident per patient bed. If the resident-to-bed ratio triples, so does the adjustment percent. With the revised formula, the rate of adjustment increases more slowly as the teaching program becomes larger.

Third, and also consistent with S. 1158 a bill introduced earlier dealing with Medicare payments for direct medical education expenses, and consistent with testimony given at the June 3, 1985, Senate Finance Committee Subcommittee on Health Hearing, after July 1986, the calculation of the resident per bed formula omits those who have not graduated from accredited United States or Canadian medical schools. We recognize that some States, particularly those in the Northeast, may have difficulty with this provision. We are continuing to work with Senators BRADLEY and MOYNIHAN to develop a strategy that will minimize disruptions that may occur in hospitals with large numbers of foreign medical graduates.

DISPROPORTIONATE SHARE ADJUSTMENT

There is mounting evidence that hospitals many of which are large urban public hospitals but also some located in rural areas who care for a large number of poor elderly incur higher costs. Provisions contained in TEFRA charged the Secretary of Heath and Human Services with the responsibility of providing for exceptions and adjustments to hospital payment amounts to take into account the special needs of public or other hospitals that serve a disproportionate share of poor elderly patients. To date the Secretary of Health and Human Services, however, has not provided for such a disproportionate share adjustment.

In 1983, Congress enacted the provisions creating the prospective payment system. The legislation included an exception for disproportionate share hospitals and again required the Secretary to provide for exceptions and adjustments as deemed appropriate. Still no action took place.

Finally again in DEFRA we required the Secretary to develop a definition of disproportionate share hospitals and to identify such hospitals by December 31, 1984. The Health Care Financing Administration, though currently working on meeting this requirement, is well past the deadline of December 31, 1984.

COURT ACTION REGARDING THE DISPROPORTIONATE SHARE ADJUSTMENT

In 1984 a California hospital—Redbud Hospital—filed suit against HHS challenging the hospital's initial payment rate under the new DRG system. On July 30, 1984, the court granted a preliminary injunction, prohibiting the Secretary from imposing the new system on the hospital. The court noted the hospital's status as a hospital serving a disproportionate number of Medicare and Medicaid patients and that Congress has singled this class of hospitals out for special consideration. The court required the Secretary to promulgate regulations or written policies with respect to this class of hospitals serving a disproportionate share of Medicare and low income patients, as provided in law. On June 14, 1985 the court required that the Secretary publish interim final rules by July 1, 1985, and final rules by October 1, 1985. Although HCFA appealed the decision, it published interim rules on July 1, 1985.

These interim rules allowed hospitals, on a case-by-case basis, to apply for an adjustment. They were also given a number of requirements with which they had to comply in order to qualify for the adjustment. However, no specific adjustment method was described in the interim rule.

Last week the order was stayed. The interim rules are being withdrawn.

CURRENT RESEARCH EFFORTS

Preliminary results from research being conducted by a great many groups including the Health Care Financing Administration, the American Hospital Association, the Congressional Budget Office, and the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission, underscore the existence of a disproportionate share effect—higher costs do occur as a result of the presence of large numbers of Medicare or low income patients. Continuing research is building on these findings, along with work on the evaluation of alternative measures of disproportionate share and on an adjustment methodology. While a definitive answer is unlikely in the short run, we can take a step forward toward a solution.

DISPROPORTIONATE SHARE ADJUSTMENT

Thus in addition to revising the way Medicare pays teaching hospitals, S. 1606 also provides for a disproportionate share adjustment. The adjustment would be available to rural as well as urban hospitals.

This portion of the bill is made up of three major provisions.

First, hospitals larger than 100 beds serving a large portion of low-income individuals or those participating in Medicare, will be eligible to receive an adjustment calculated on the basis of the proportion of low-income elderly and the proportion of Medicaid patients they serve. In order to qualify for an adjustment, a hospital must have a specified proportion of its days accounted for by either dually eligible Medicare and Medicaid patients or nonaged Medicaid patients at which point a 3-percent adjustment is provided. The adjustment increases until the proportion reaches a maximum point and then the adjustment is capped at 13 percent thereafter.

Second, an exceptions process has been provided that permits the Secretary to provide the adjustment to hospitals who do not otherwise qualify by reason of their bed size or their failure to meet the other requirements previously described relating to the proportion of Medicare or low-income patients. This may provide some assistance to small rural hospitals which would not otherwise qualify but would also be available to urban hospitals.

Third, we require the Secretary to develop data files that will be instrumental in our ability to further target the adjustment in year two of this bill. Specifically, we wish to construct a method which targets the adjustment on institutions who serve a large number of low-income Medicare beneficiaries. We continue to believe that Medicare is not intended to subsidize access of nonelderly poor to hospital care.

CONCLUSION

There is broad consensus that under the current system at some hospitals are experiencing unusual hardships while others are receiving windfall profits. The disparity should not be allowed to continue if we can find an equitable method of reallocating these funds. We believe that the approach contained in this bill will eliminate some of the inequities and starts us down the road toward a more fair and reasonable approach. Also important to note is our continuing commitment to the support of medical education and to teaching institutions. They perform a critical function in our communities as do those nonteaching institutions who care for the poor and the elderly.

We knew at the outset of the new PPS system that changes would be necessary. We believe this bill is a responsible attempt to address some of the issues confronting us.

Mr. President, I request that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1606

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

PAYMENT FOR INDIRECT COSTS OF MEDICAL EDUCATION

SECTION 1. (a) DETERMINATION OF PAYMENT.—Section 1886(d)(5)(B) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"(B) Effective with respect to discharges occurring on or after October 1, 1985, the Secretary shall provide for an additional payment amount for subsection (d) hospitals with indirect costs of medical education, in an amount computed in the same manner as the adjustment for such costs under regulations (in effect as of January 1, 1983) under subsection (a)(2), except as follows:

"(i) The amount of such additional payment shall be equal to the DRG payment multiplied by an educational adjustment factor equal to $((1+r).442-1)(1.63)$, with r being the ratio of interns and residents to beds.

"(ii) In determing such adjustment the Secretary shall not distinguish between those interns and residents who are employess of a hospital and those interns and residents who furnish services to a hospital but are not employees of such hospital.

"(iii) Effective on and after July 1, 1986, such additional payments shall not be made with respect to any intern or resident who is not a graduate of a school of medicine approved by the Liaison Committee on Medical Education of the American Medical Association and the Association of American Medical Colleges, or of an accredited school of osteopathy, dentistry, or podiatry located in the United States or Canada.

"(iv) The Secretary shall continue to count interns and residents assigned to outpatient services of the hospital as part of the calculation of the full-time equivalent number of interns and residents.".

(b) STUDY RELATING TO INTERNS AND RESIDENTS ASSIGNED TO OUTPATIENT SERVICES.—Prior to June 1, 1986, the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall conduct a study and report to the Congress on the impact of eliminating the counting of interns and residents assigned to outpatient services of a hospital for purposes of section 1886(d)(5)(B) of the Social Security Act.

PAYMENT FOR HOSPITALS WHICH SERVE A DISPROPORTIONATE SHARE OF LOW-INCOME OR MEDICARE PATIENTS

SEC. 2. (a) DETERMINATION OF PAYMENT.—Section 1886(d)(5) of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(F)(i) For fiscal years 1986 and 1987, the Secretary shall provide for an additional payment amount for subsection (d) hospitals which serve a significantly disproportionate number of low-income patients or patients entitled to benefits under part A of this title, and have 100 beds or more.

"(ii) A payment under this subparagraph shall be made to any hospital described in clause (i) for which, for the preceding fiscal year, the percentage determined under clause (iii) is 30 percent or greater

"(iii) The percentage for a hospital is the fraction (expressed as a percentage) equal to the sum of—

"(I) the fraction, the numerator of which is the number of such hospital's patient days for such fiscal year which were made up of patients who (for such days) were enrolled under part B of this title pursuant to an agreement under section 1843, and the denominator of which is the number of such hospital's patient days for such fiscal year which were made up of patients who (for such days) were entitled to benefits under part A of this title; plus

"(II) the fraction, the numerator of which is the number of such hospital's patient days for such fiscal year which were made up of patients who (for such days) were eligible for medical assistance under a State plan approved under title XIX of this act, other than individuals enrolled under part B of this title pursuant to an agreement under section 1843, and the denominator of which is the total number of such hospital's patient days for such fiscal year.

"(iv) The amount of the additional payment under this subparagraph shall be equal to—

"(I) 3.0 percent of the DRG payment in the case of a hospital for which the percentage under clause (iii) is equal to 30 percent;

"(II) 13.0 percent of the DRG payment in the case of equal to or greater than 55 percent; and

"(III) a percentage between 3.0 percent and 13.0 percent (determined at a rate of four-tenths of one percentage point increase for each 1 percentage point increase in the hospital's percentage under clause (iii) of the DRG payment for a hospital for which the percentage under clause (iii) is greater than 30 percent but less than 55 percent.

"(v) The Secretary may make payments under this subparagraph to a hospital which does not qualify for an additional payment under this subparagraph by reason of the 100-bed requirement of clause (1) or the minimum percentage requirement of clause (ii), or may increase the payment amount to a hospital as otherwise determined under clause (iv) (but not to an amount in excess of 13.0 percent of the hospital's DRG payment), in the case of a hospital which the Secretary determines, on the basis of additional data on the economic status of its patients presented by the hospital, serves a significantly disproportionate share of low-income patients or patients entitled to benefits under part A of this title as compared to other hospitals.

"(vi) The Secretary shall, if feasible, for fiscal year 1987, make payments under this subparagraph on the basis of an index constructed by the Secretary which the Secretary determines is a better measure of the disproportionate share of low-income patients or patients entitled to benefits under part A of this title served by hospitals than are the provisions of clauses (ii), (iii), (iv), and (v). If the Secretary makes payments on the basis of such an index, the total amount of the payments made to all hospitals may not exceed the total amount which would be made under this subparagraph if clauses (ii), (iii), (iv), and (v) were to apply to such fiscal year.".

(b) DUAL ELIGIBILITY FILE.—For purposes of implementing section 1886(d)(5)(F) of the Social Security Act, the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall develop for each State statistical files of individuals in such State who are dually eligible under both title XVIII of such Act and under the State's plan approved under title XIX of such Act. For purposes of establishing such files, any State having a plan approved under such title XIX shall provide to the Secretary any data necessary to carry out this subsection.

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 1886(d)(5)(C)(i) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out ", and of public or other hospitals that serve a significantly disproportionate number of patients who have low income or are entitled to benefits under part A of this title".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 3. The amendments made by this Act shall become effective on October 1, 1985.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise to join my colleague from Kansas, the distinguished majority leader, Mr. DOLE, to introduce a bill to amend title IX of the Social Security Act to refine the payment adjustment to hospitals under Medicare Part A for indirect medical education and establish an adjustment in Medicare payments to those hospitals treating a disproportionate share of the poor, elderly, and disabled.

This amendment is an interim step in Medicare policy. The new prospective payment system will require further refinement. But this measure clearly moves the payment methodology for prospective payment forward and makes it fairer. It will also help assure that the elderly and disabled will have access to the quality hospital services they deserve.

INDIRECT MEDICAL EDUCATION ADJUSTMENT

The indirect medical education adjustment is a misnomer. It is actually an adjustment adopted as part of the Medicare prospective payment system to provide for the legitimate higher costs of services to Medicare beneficiaries in teaching hospitals. The prospective payment system's per-case payment methodology is based on averages. It was felt at the time of its establishment that these payments based on average per-case costs alone would not be sufficiently sensitive to the fact that teaching hospitals tend to: First, treat sicker patients, thus more intensive treatment; second, be located in inner cities where costs of operations are higher; third, be saddled with a disproportionate share of poor Medicare patients; and fourth, experience an increase in the number of tests and procedures prescribed due to the practice style of residents.

It was determined in 1983, as part of the Social Security amendments establishing prospective payment, that an indirect medical education adjustment should be set at 11.59 percent as an add-on to the per-case payment for teaching hospitals for every 0.1 resident-to-bed in a given teaching hospital. There is little question, from all analyses, that this adjustment has been set to high. The adminstration to meet its budget goals would have the Congress reduce it by half. This is inappropriate and would unduly harm many institutions.

On the other hand, the adjustment was set arbitrarily at 11.59 percent. Under the current methodology, the hospital of the University of Minnesota with a 0.43 ratio of residents to beds, gets at add-on of 48.89 percent. UCLA's hospital, on the other hand, with a ratio of 1.0, residents to beds, gets an add-on of 115.9 percent. The University of Minnesota is just not that much different in the type or people served and the services provided than UCLA.

Senator DOLE and I have developed this bill to refine the payment adjustment to account for the fact that it is too high and now oversubsidizes certain institutions simply because they have an extremely high ratio of residents to beds. The bill reduces the current payment adjustment of 11.59 percent by a quarter and provides a lesser adjustment for each increment of additional residents to beds. The methodology will better reflect the actual marginal costs of a higher ratio of the number of residents to beds. UCLA may receive higher payments than the University of Minnesota under this new model, but the proportions will be more in line.

We have already introduced legislation reforming Medicare payment for the direct costs of graduate medical education. That bill, S. 1158, reaffirms Medicare's commitment to support residents, interns, and other health professionals in training who provide services to Medicare beneficiaries. It also addresses the budgetary and health policy realities of 1985.

The policies outlined in S. 1158 are intricately related to the bill I am proposing today. At a hearing I chaired in the Finance Committee's Health Subcommittee on S. 1158, witnesses testified that Medicare would be justified in dropping its payment for the direct costs of residency slots filled by foreign medical graduates. This policy should be consistent in the indirect medical education adjustment as well, and so it is included in this bill.

I know eliminating the foreign medical graduates from the indirect adjustment will concern those who view the indirect as a necessary subsidy for the poor Medicare beneficiaries who frequently have access only to hospitals with a large number of foreign medical graduates. I share their concern though I am confident that the disproportionate share adjustments included in S. 1606—discussed below—will sufficiently substitute for the amounts lost due to new medicare policy toward foreign medical graduates in training in U.S. hospitals.

The indirect medical education adjustment is, at best, a crude measure of many factors relating to the higher cost of teaching hospitals. Eventually, when the Secretary of Health and Human Services is able to develop an index to adjust the per-case payments in the prospective payment system to severity, the indirect can be further reduced or eliminated. Such an index, however, seems currently out of our grasp. And, despite the Secretary's commitment to finding an acceptable index, I think adoption of such a measure is years away. Until we find the right measure, it is important to sustain an appropriate adjustment for teaching hospitals.

DISPROPORTIONATE SHARE

S. 1606 would establish a new adjustment to the per-case payment to hospitals which treat a disproportionate share of poor, elderly, and disabled. I chaired a hearing of the Finance Committee's Health Subcommittee on the disproportionate share issue earlier this week. The testimony from the hearing convinced me that Congress should adopt an adjustment, albeit crude, and put pressure on the Secretary to develop a more appropriate adjustment.

The Congress, in the 1982 Medicare law, the 1983 Medicare law, and the 1984 Medicare law instructed the Secretary to make provision in Medicare's payments for the hospitals which treat a disproportionate share of the poor. She has chosen to ignore this directive. And she has actually fought it in the Redbud versus Heckler case. She contends that the legislative language concerning disproportionate share hospitals is ambiguous as to its mandate, that the best-intentioned enforcers have difficulty finding adequate data with which to identify these institutions, and that even if we were able to identify the right institutions, we would have difficulty determining the nature of the payment.

Well, the Ways and Means Committee has already addressed these questions about disproportionate share in their Medicare package. The Finance Committee should act also, and S. 1606 provides a starting point for its action on disproportionate share. Our answers, even when conferenced this fall, may be less than accurate or adequate. But, at least they will put in law the clear congressional direction that the Secretary has argued is currently not available.

As I stated at the hearing, a disproportionate share amendment to the Medicare law should meet certain principles:

First, disproportionate share legislation will not be designed to bail out hospitals. The purpose of the Medicare prospective payment reform and health systems reform in general is to provide incentives for cost-effective management of hospitals and to reward the efficient providers of quality care. That is why the Congress moved away from a hospital-specific cost-based payment system to one based on prospectively set per-case prices.

The old cost-based system was inflationary and promoted inefficient management of hospital services. Public hospitals and others which primarily treat the poor did well in the cost-based environment because they passed their higher costs and bad debts on to other payers. In the new prospective pricing system for Medicare many of the hospitals are in trouble. Their survival, per se, is not Medicare's concern—it is only important that Medicare's pricing system not inhibit access to care for its beneficiaries.

Second, unless and until the law is changed and we decide to tax the payroll of working people in America to pay for indigent care, Medicare is not intended to subsidize access of the nonelderly poor to hospital care. Medicare cannot be in the business of saving public or inner city hospitals at the expense of all other hosptials, the elderly and disabled, and the workers of America.

The Congress has mandated commitment from Medicare's resources to finance its share of medical education, and we will make a recommitment to medical education in this year's legislative package. But we do this because it is directly relevant to the quality health care to which the elderly and disabled are entitled under Medicare.

I have been careful to articulate the limits of our commitment to the poor via the Medicare trust fund. But this does not mean that the Congress can leave to Crosby, Stills, and Nash—who are holding concerts to raise money for the poor—the financing of the health care of 30 million disadvantaged Americans. I have said many times how impressed I was to learn that the greatest killer of children in America today—10,000 young victims last year alone—is poverty. That is unconscionable. And, it is also unconscionable that this administration would have us cut more deeply into the national response to this crying need and that this Congress would be so ineffecutal in its commitment to health care for indigent Americans.

Third, the Finance Committee and the U.S. Senate, since the problem of the disproportionate share hospital came on the congressional scene in 1982, has always seen this as an issue, in large part of severity of illness. The Secretary hasn't been able to find a severity index to help make the prospective payment system more realistic. Even if she had, we would probably still be considering the disproportionate share issue because, as we will learn today, there are factors of the sick poor beyond simply severity which add to the cost of their treatment. Nutritional deficiency, chemical dependency, lack of family, social service requirements, and locational costs are examples. So we will be looking for severity measures that take these factors into account, while recognizing with work that's already been done in this area.

Finally, this Senator, in particular, will make two additional arguments. One is of location and the other of federalism. While most people—the Ways and Means Committee included—seem to think of disproportionate share in terms of downtown Chicago or Parkland in Dallas, it's no accident that the Secretary got sued by a 40-bed hospital in Redbud, CA. I think the problem is in many ways worse in rural America where choices are limited and the population is both older and poorer. I'm just afraid our big city researchers are going to overlook the Redbuds and the Windom, MN, in their sampling.

This leads me to federalism. For 4 years now we have been practicing devolution of responsibility from the Federal to State and local governments without devolution of resources. The administration would have us make a bad situation worse by eliminating deductibility of State and local taxes, eliminating tax-exempt bond financing, and increasing the Federal role in excise taxes—a field, except in wartime, usually left to the States. The problem in Redbud and Windom is a poor tax base which, throughout rural America is getting weaker every day. The municipalities and counties cannot pay to provide access for their indigent citizens to hospitals or to maintain their public hospitals. To make the problem even worse, the States are all cutting their taxes and their spending on income maintenance of the poor in an effort to attract the Saturn plants of this crazy world.

Even before the stiff competition for industry started, the disparity in State commitment to the poor, which we have blessed with Federal reimbursement, varies widely from a $138 a month AFDC payment in Tennessee—the new home of Saturn—to $474 a month in New York City to $524 a month in Minnesota.

S. 1606 meets these criteria. It provides an adjustment to per case payments for hospitals which serve a sufficient level of poor Medicare beneficiaries. The proxies used to determine that level are not perfect by any means.

The bill gives direction to the Secretary to do better on new proxy by fiscal year 1987. And, the entire provision will sunset after fiscal 1987. The sunset is important. It will compel the Congress to revisit the issue at that time and access the adjustment in light of progress on developing a severity index and the availability of better data generally.

The bill limits an automatic adjustment to hospitals with over 100 beds which meets the threshold for the proxy. This level is based on the advice of the analysts who tell us that the data shows little disproportionate share factor for hospitals of smaller size. I am not completely confident in their conclusions. Their determination is problematic and may exclude rural hospitals which are small and should qualify. Therefore, the bill allows for an exceptions process so smaller rural hospitals can make a case for the adjustment.

As I said, a portion of the indirect medical education expense can be attributed to the treatment of poorer Medicare patients. To fund the new disproportionate share adjustment, the indirect has been lowered by an amount proportional to the percentage of the indirect which can statistically be shown to represent treatment of poor patients. This is a tough cut to make. But, it is essential so that the new adjustment is based on appropriate assumptions and not a budget issue.

S. 1606 is a start. A final version of disproportionate share adjustment will be thrashed out in the Finance Committee this fall when we markup on Medicare. I look forward at that time to working closely with my colleagues on this bill and the Finance Committee chairman, Senator PACKWOOD. I know the chairman has done much thinking in this area and I look forward to cooperating with him in developing a final disproportionate share provision for the Finance Committee's package.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, there has been considerable discussion this year regarding the appropriate level of Medicare financing for medical education. In February of this year, the President proposed a long-term freeze in the level of support for direct medical education costs and an immediate halving of the indirect medical education payment. Over my objections, the Senate budget resolution adopted the level of cuts proposed by the President and reconciled this level of savings to the Senate Finance Committee.

Mr. President, as an alternative to the administration proposal, Senators DOLE, DURENBERGER, and BENTSEN recently introduced a bill (S. 1158) that provides for a 1-year freeze on all direct medical education payments, a limit on the number of years of physician training that Medicare will fund, and an immediate termination of the direct costs of training foreign medical school graduates.

Today, a companion bill is being introduced that provides for a sizeable reduction in funding—perhaps too sizeable—for the indirect medical education payment, an immediate termination of the indirect payment for foreign medical school graduates and a special payment for hospitals serving a disproportionate share of low-income patients.

Mr. President, both of these bills will most likely be debated as part of the Finance Committee reconciliation bill this September.

I know that changes in Federal support for medical education should be made, but there are two issues that I would like to address at this time.

The first relates to the abrupt termination of all funding for foreign medical graduates. Roughly 60 percent of all residents in New Jersey and 35 percent in New York are foreign medical graduates—well over the national average. Any proposal to eliminate funding will be felt more severely in New Jersey and New York than in other States. A precipitous cessation of funding will severely affect the capacity of these hospitals to effectively function. Rather than an immedate elimination of funding, these hospitals need a period of years to adjust to new conditions.

Mr. President, Senator MOYNIHAN and I have entered into discussions with Senators DOLE and DURENBERGER to see if there is some way that these proposals can be modified to help these hospitals adapt to changing conditions. I am pleased to report that everyone is making a good faith effort on this, and I am optimistic that we will be able to arrive at a mutually acceptable solution to this issue by September.

Mr. President, I would also like to commend the sponsors of this legislation for including in their bill a provision to help hospitals that serve a disproportionate share of low-income patients. Senator MOYNIHAN and I have discussed the importance of this with the sponsors of the legislation. The evidence is compelling that many center city hospitals have higher costs, and the Medicare law should be changed to reimburse these hospitals accordingly. While some changes may need to be made in the legislative provisions on disproportionate share that are included in this bill, I want to commend the sponsors for agreeing that Federal legislation is needed in this area.

I look forward to working with my colleagues on the Finance Committee on a mutually acceptable solution to these issues.

S.J. Res. 186. Joint resolution to designate the week of September 23, 1985, through September 29, 1985, as "National Historically Black Colleges Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL HISTORICALLY BLACK COLLEGES WEEK

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it gives me great pleasure, along with 55 of my distinguished colleagues, to introduce Senate Joint Resolution 186, which authorizes and requests the President to designate the week of September 23, 1985, through September 29, 1985, as "National Historically Black Colleges Week."

This is the third consecutive year that I have been pleased to author this legislation. This year, I am especially proud to see such an overwhelming display of bipartisan support from my colleagues for this joint resolution. Several of the original cosponsors of this bill do not have historically black colleges and universities located in their States. However, they appreciate, as do I, the great contributions made to our Nation by the historically black colleges and universities.

I am particularly pleased that six of these institutions of higher learning, namely Allen University, Benedict College, Claflin College, South Carolina State College, Morris College, and Voorhees College, are located in my home State. These colleges are vital to the higher education system of South Carolina. They have provided the opportunity for thousands of young people in my State to go to college who would not otherwise have been able to afford a college education.

Mr. President, hundreds of thousands of young Americans have received quality educations at these 102 schools. These institutions have a long and distinguished history of providing the training necessary for participation in a rapidly changing society. The predominantly black colleges and universities in America have offered to our citizens a variety of curriculums and programs through which they could develop their skills and talents, thereby expanding their opportunities as individuals and laying the foundation for continued social progress.

Specifically, recent statistics show that historically black colleges and universities have graduated 60 percent of the black physicians in our country, 60 percent of the black pharmacists, 40 percent of the black attorneys, 50 percent of the black engineers, 75 percent of the black military officers, and 80 percent of the black members of the judiciary.

Mr. President, through passage of this commemorative resolution, Congress can reaffirm its support of our historically black colleges, and appropriately recognize their important contributions to our Nation. I look forward to the speedy passage of this joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 186

Whereas there are one hundred and two historically black colleges and universities in the United States;

Whereas such colleges and universities provide the quality education so essential to full participation in a complex, highly technological society;

Whereas black colleges and universities have a rich heritage and have played a prominent role in American history;

Whereas such institutions have allowed many underprivileged students to attain their full potential through higher education; and

Whereas the achievements and goals of the historically black colleges are deserving of national recognition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of September 23, 1985, through September 29, 1985, is designated as "National Historically Black Colleges Week" and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States and interested groups to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies, activities, and programs, thereby demonstrating support for historically black colleges and universities in the United States..

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in recognition of historically black colleges throughout the Nation. These fine institutions of higher learning deserve this special recognition. Therefore, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of a joint resolution introduced by my distinguished colleague from South Carolina, which designates September 23, 1985, as "National Historically Black Colleges Week."

One hundred and two historically black colleges and universities provide quality education for the advancement of our citizenry. They provide us with citizens who are both capable of functioning in a high technology world and who have not forgotten the history of the Romans or the beauty of Shakespeare. These historically black colleges not only have a rich heritage, but have played a significant role in American history as well.

For example, Tuskegee Institute was created in 1881 by an act of the Alabama State Legislature. Booker T. Washington opened the school and served as principal and instructor for 33 years. From 1896 to 1943, George Washington Carver was associated with this great institution and was one of its foremost instructors.

Many students have benefited from these institutions of higher education. Historically black colleges have the potential to continue to provide necessary educational programs so that more students will reach their fullest potential. Only through education do we set the minds of mankind, and mankind itself, free.

I urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors of this joint resolution.●

By Mr. WARNER (for himself and Mr. TRIBLE):

S.J. Res. 187. Joint resolution designating Patrick Henry's last home and burial place, known as Red Hill, in the Commonwealth of Virginia, as a National Memorial to Patrick Henry; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

NATIONAL MEMORIAL TO PATRICK HENRY

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, next year our country will observe the 250th anniversary of the birth of one of our country's greatest orators and Revolutionary War heros, Patrick Henry.

Celebrations and events will be held throughout the year in remembrance of the contributions of Patrick Henry in our struggle for independence.

I rise today to introduce a joint resolution to commemorate this American's lifelong service to our country by designating his last home and burial place as The Red Hill Patrick Henry National Memorial.

His devotion to public service began in 1765 as a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses where he quickly became an outspoken advocate of the rights of the colonies.

With the leadership of Patrick Henry, Virginia led the opposition to the Stamp Act, the first direct tax to be levied by the British Parliament on the Colonies.

This solidified the growing unrest and produced a common bond among the Colonies.

As a delegate to the First Continental Congress in 1775, Patrick Henry argued vigorously for collective measures by the Colonies against Britain.

During that same year, he delivered his famous "Give me liberty or give me death" speech at the Second Virginia Convention at St. John's Church in Richmond, VA.

He devoted the spring of 1775 to sessions of Congress in Philadelphia and to organizing military forces in Virginia, of which he later served as Commander in Chief.

Patrick Henry became Virginia's first Governor, serving for 5 yearly terms.

Following the Revolutionary War, he was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention where he was successful in securing the adoption of the Bill of Rights by the Convention.

Following his long career as a public servant, Patrick Henry retired to Red Hill which he referred to as "one of the garden spots of the world."

Red Hill is presently managed by the Patrick Henry Memorial Foundation and is dedicated to the aims, ideals, and purposes for which Patrick Henry lived.

His home, gardens, and law office are preserved as a shrine and museum and are operated solely by private donations.

The joint resolution I introduce today will duly recognize the lifelong contributions of this dedicated American patriot by memorializing his last home and burial place, Red Hill.

This action follows the request of the Virginia General Assembly in its 1985 legislative session where Senate Joint Resolution 82 was enacted calling for national recognition and stewardship of Red Hill by the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I request that letters of endorsement of the joint resolution from other foundations in Virginia dedicated to the remembrance of Patrick Henry be printed in the RECORD.

This joint resolution reaffirms that the ownership of Red Hill remains non-Federal, and any future operation and maintenance costs will not be the responsibility of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I believe approval of this joint resolution by the Senate will complete the deserved recognition of the life of Patrick Henry and provide for a successful 250th anniversary celebration next year.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH FOUNDATION,
Richmond, VA, July 9, 1985.

Senator JOHN WARNER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR WARNER: We are in receipt of a copy of your letter which was written to Mr. Theodore W. Graves, President, Patrick Henry Memorial Foundation, relative to the draft resolution concerning the designation of Patrick Henry's home at Red Hill as a National Memorial. Upon reading this resolution, we feel that it is most appropriate and sincerely hope that it can be adopted by the Congress of the United States.

Thanking you for bringing this to our attention and with kindest regards, I remain,

Sincerely,

T.M. CARRINGTON III,
President.

JULY 4, 1985.

Hon. JOHN W. WARNER, Senator,
Hon. PAUL S. TRIBLE, Senator,
Hon. DAN DANIEL, Representative,
Washington, DC.

GENTLEMEN: Thank you for your consideration in sending a copy to me of your proposed House or Senate Joint Resolution to recognize the brilliance and contributions of Patrick Henry, the First Governor of Virginia under the first constitution of the independent states, in the formation and creation of the United States by designating Red Hill, his last home and site of his grave as a "National Memorial".

I could not possibly improve upon your statements which you have presented and I heartily endorse them and feel assured that they will be passed by the Congress and signed by the President.

As Chairman of the 250th Anniversary Celebration of the historic Hanover County Courthouse on May 29, 1985, Patrick Henry's 249th birthday I would like, herewith to send each of you a copy of that program and a book we published that day—Portraits in the Historic Hanover County Courthouse. The Hon. A. E. Dick Howard gave a remarkable address titled, "Virginia: The Hourglass of Constitutional Liberty". He further stated that the Historic Hanover County Courthouse because of Patrick Henry was an early stage for our seeking Constitutional Liberty.

As Chairman of the Bicentennial Committee for Hanover County I was proud to display the flag that Senator Warner helped design which was given to us when Hanover County was designated a Bicentennial Community.

As Chairman of the Courthouse Committee for the Honorable Richard H. C. Taylor, Judge of the 15th Judicial Circuit I am continuing our efforts to preserve this important property and to help to prepare for the 1986 Celebration of the 250th Anniversary of the birth of Patrick Henry.

We commend your efforts on behalf of Patrick Henry. Also, we are appealing to the Postmaster General for a Commemorative Stamp for Patrick Henry to be issued on May 29, 1986 at Hanover, Virginia 23069 which is near the site of his birthplace Studley Plantation.

The Red Hill designation as a "National Memorial" would be one of the highlights of the anniversary year. On July 5 at a special meeting of The Scotchtown Committee when I presented your proposal a resolution was passed unanimously endorsing Red Hill as a "National Memorial". We wish you Godspeed!

Respectfully submitted.

BRUCE V. ENGLISH,
Chairman, Bicentennial Committee for Hanover County.

THE ASSOCIATION FOR THE PRESERVATION OF VIRGINIA ANTIQUITIES,
Richmond, VA, July 26, 1985.

Senator JOHN WARNER,
Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR WARNER: I am pleased to inform you that the matter of your proposed House or Senate Resolution concerning the Department of Interior recognizing Red Hill was a topic on the agenda of our Executive Committee meeting of 23 July.

Please know that, by a unanimous vote, the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees for the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities wholeheartedly supports your efforts, along with those of Senator Trible and Representative Dan Daniel, to pass a resolution providing that Mr. Henry's Red Hill site be hereto recognized and known as The Red Hill Patrick Henry National Memorial. We feel that such action on the part of the Congress of the United States will further bring recognition and honor to a man who played an important part in the formation of our Nation; and that it is fitting and proper that the Red Hill site be designated a National Monument.

If the APVA can be of further assistance in this matter, please contact me. I am,

Sincerely,

SHIRLEY T. VANLANDINGHAM,
President, APVA.

PATRICK HENRY MEMORIAL FOUNDATION,
Brookneal, VA, July 26, 1985.

Hon. JOHN W. WARNER,
U.S. Senate, 405 Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR WARNER: I am authorized by the Executive Committee of the Patrick Henry Memorial Foundation to report that we have reviewed the revised draft resolution and find it acceptable as drafted.

It is pleasing to know that the citizens of Virginia and the Nation, as well as our colleagues that honor Patrick Henry in the preservation field, support a National Memorial to Patrick Henry at Red Hill. Special thanks to you and Congressman Daniel for crystallizing that feeling in the form of legislation.

Sincerely,

PATRICK DAILY,
Director.

By Mr. HATCH (for himself and Mr. THURMOND):

S.J. Res. 189. Joint resolution designating the week beginning January 12, 1986, as "National Fetal Alcohol Syndrome Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL FETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the consumption of alcohol during pregnancy has been shown to cause extremely serious problems. To call attention to these problems and encourage their solution, I am pleased to introduce this resolution which designates the week of January 12, 1986, as National Fetal Alcohol Syndrome Awareness Week.

This issue, indeed, merits our attention. For, in the past few years, we have learned that the use of alcohol during pregnancy may cause serious birth defects. In 1981, Surgeon General Everett Koop issued a strong advisory warning about fetal alcohol syndrome and cautioned expectant women or women considering pregnancy to abstain from the use of alcoholic beverages.

Throughout pregnancy, a fetus is dependent entirely on its mother to provide the nutrients for physical development because the mother's blood carries nutrients directly through the placenta into the baby's bloodstream. Thus, alcohol in a mother's bloodstream is transported directly into her baby's bloodstream, possibly affecting the baby's development adversely.

Several of these adverse consequences of fetal alcohol syndrome have been identified: Deficient growth both before and after birth can occur. More specifically, a reduction in height and weight and in brain size, which is associated with mental retardation, are possible. Developmental disabilities can result, with the infant experiencing delays in learning to walk and speak. Heart defects also plague babies suffering from fetal alcohol syndrome.

Some of the striking tragic facts already known about fetal alcohol syndrome include the following:

Fetal alcohol syndrome is one of the three leading causes of birth defects with accompanying mental retardation in this country.

Fetal alcohol syndrome ranks behind only Down's and spina bifida as the most common cause of mental retardation due to birth defects.

Less severe effects, such as increased irritability and hyperactivity, are characteristics of babies whose mothers have consumed alcohol during pregnancy.

Not only are the problems associated with fetal alcohol syndrome severe, but also the magnitude of those affected is great. A conservative estimate of the number of infants born with irreversible abnormalities caused by fetal alcohol syndrome is 1,800 to 2,400 each year. Thirty-six thousand babies each year exhibit the less severe alcohol-related birth defects. The dollar costs are staggering, running over $1.5 billion per year. It is impossible to measure the emotional costs of fetal alcohol syndrome.

Let us spread the message that alcohol and pregnancy don't mix. This resolution is a first step. I urge you to join me in cosponsoring it.

By Mr. ROTH (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. COHEN, and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S.J. Res. 190. Joint resolution to establish greater productivity in Federal Government operations as a national goal of the United States; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PRODUCTIVITY IMPROVEMENT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, today I, along with Senators STEVENS, COHEN, and DURENBERGER, am introducing a joint resolution which would establish increased productivity in the Federal Government as a national goal.

To strengthen the integrity and improve the productivity of Federal programs, President Reagan is proposing several legislative initiatives to provide Government managers with the new tools necessary to effectively manage the Government's resources. These initiatives build upon past accomplishments in assuring that we get the most for each tax dollar spent. This joint resolution is the cornerstone of these initiatives.

Partnership between the Congress and the administration in support of a governmentwide productivity improvement program will help to assure success. A joint resolution establishing productivity improvement in the Federal Government as a national goal would be a strong signal of congressional intent to foster productivity improvement.

While Federal productivity has been improving, it has not been increasing as quickly as private and public organizations that have continuously focused on its importance. This resolution presents the Congress with an opportunity to show its support for better management, more efficient services to the public and a conscious effort to make productivity a higher priority.

Everyone knows what productivity is—getting the most for each tax dollar while efficiently delivering goods and services. In the Federal Government this means reducing costs in addition to providing better services. A 1984 GAO report on productivity management suggested that a 5-percent increase in Federal productivity could produce a 1-year savings of about $4.5 billion, and the Grace Commission estimated $3.18 billion might be saved with a 5-percent increase in productivity.

By Executive order, the President plans to establish a productivity program that will be administered by the Office of Management and Budget and involves all major executive departments and agencies. Each agency is to appoint a productivity executive and develop a 5-year productivity plan. OMB will then review agency plans as a part of its budget and management review process to ensure overall guidance and control.

While the executive branch is primarily responsible for the operation of Government, it does so under the statutory limits and oversight powers of the Congress. That makes us, the legislators, partners in the delivery of better Government. Through this congressional resolution, we are reaffirming our responsibilities by making productivity a national goal, encouraging the President to make recommendations to Congress he believes necessary to achieve that goal, and requiring him to submit a report annually with the budget detailing the management improvements in each agency that contribute to greater Government productivity.

We expect this annual productivity report to provide, for each department and major independent agency, productivity data on relevant operations, productivity goals, management actions taken during the current and previous years which contribute to improving productivity, and planned management actions for the next year.

I hope the Senate will act quickly on this resolution and let the American public, as well as the executive branch, know that we are behind the President's initiative to provide those that rely on Government and those who pay for Government with the best management that we can deliver. I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this legislation.●

By Mr. BUMPERS (for himself, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. NUNN, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. SIMON, Mr. DODD, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. MOYNIHAN, and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S.J. Res. 191. Joint resolution to designate the month of October 1985 as "Learning Disabilities Awareness Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEARNING DISABILITIES AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce, along with Senators MATHIAS, CRANSTON, WEICKER, NUNN, MURKOWSKI, INOUYE, CHAFEE, SIMON, DODD, LEVIN, MOYNIHAN, and ZORINSKY, a joint resolution to designate October 1985 as "Learning Disabilities Awareness Month." With this resolution, I hope to shed light on the problems that confront the learning disabled of this country and to help open the door to a greater understanding of the nature and causes of these learning difficulties.

There are over 10 million children in this country that have been positively diagnosed as learning disabled. I and my distinguished colleagues who have cosponsored this resolution simply want to say that we care about these children, and that we also care about the many more who may be suffering from learning disabilities but have not yet been diagnosed as such.

We have made great strides since the adoption of the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975 (Public Law 94-142). The programs spawned by this law have brightened the lives of many children and allowed them to pursue the goals they fully deserve to attain. The number of learning disabled children served under the auspices of this act in the United States is over 1.8 million.

Yet, learning disabilities are not easily identified by even the most experienced teachers and pediatricians. Clearly, there are many more children who suffer from learning disabilities that may have not yet been identified. The number of children counted as learning disabled has increased substantially since 1976. While the rate of growth has declined, every day there are those whose disabilities have been recognized and the path to treatment illuminated.

The term "learning disability" itself is only 20 years old. Learning disabilities are neurological problems that can impair a child's ability to perform certain tasks that require accurate perceptive skills. These are physiological problems that in no way reflect a child's intellectual capacity or potential. The learning disabled child encounters difficulty in linguistic skills such as reading, writing, spelling, and often in mathematics, concentration, memory and symbolism. Regulations that accompany Public Law 94-142 state that learning disabilities include "such conditions as perceptual handicaps, brain injury, minimal brain dysfunction, dyslexia, and developmental aphasia."

There is an important distinction between learning disabilities and other problems that are often mistaken as being similar. Learning disabled children are not mentally retarded, nor do they suffer from emotional disturbances that are the result of psychological ailments. The hyperactivity and antisocial behavior often associated with learning disabilities are simply a reflection of the frustration that these children feel.

These frustrations are manifested in many ways and often result in a sense of failure that breeds even further frustration. A recent article in the Journal of Learning Disabilities cites evidence that establishes a clear link between juvenile delinquency and learning disability. The so-called JD-LD link has also been confirmed by the American Bar Association. Of course, the overwhelming majority of learning disabled are not at risk of becoming delinquent. But the number of youths in the juvenile justice system that have been identified as suffering from learning disabilities is staggering.

Research conducted by the National Center of State Courts and the Association of Children with Learning Disabilities found the incidence of learning disabilities among youths brought before the juvenile justice system to be 36 percent. Other research shows that after 40 to 60 hours of remediation the rate of recidivism for JD-LD children drops drastically. This fall a bench book about learning disabilities for juvenile delinquency judges and family court judges will be distributed nationally through the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges.

The current Presidential initiative on adult literacy has highlighted the problem of adult literacy in this country. Recent studies document that 60 million men and women in this country cannot read the front page of their local newspaper. The link between adult illiteracy and learning disabilities has also been firmly established. Can we allow today's learning disabled child to become tomorrow's illiterate adult?

Intelligent and gifted children can suffer with these problems, yet with early diagnosis and proper remediation these children can soar to the highest reaches of achievement. In fact such notable men as Einstein, Disney, Patton, Nelson Rockefeller, and Edison were victims of learning disability. How many more geniuses are there who may be suffering from this handicap? The trained and caring professional can take a learning disabled child and, like the cutting of rough diamond, reveal the sharp and perfect edge of genius that lies just below the surface.

There are many lives touched by learning disabilities and many that we know and love who have battled with these problems. One such battle has been won by the wife of my dear friend and colleague, Senator CHARLES MATHIAS, Ann Bradford Mathias. Her story brings inspiration to us all. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that following my remarks be printed an article by Mrs Mathias that appeared in People magazine.

Before concluding, I wish to acknowledge the efforts of my distinguished colleagues in the House of Representatives who sponsored this resolution in that body—Mr. GEORGE BROWN of California and Mr. JACK KEMP of New York. Also, Mr. President, I would also like to extend my praise for the tireless efforts of the many and varied organizations in this country who have embraced this cause and worked so hard to improve the lives of the learning disabled. This praise particularly extends to the Foundation for Children with Learning Disabilities, who gave much assistance in drafting this resolution.

Mr. President, those with learning disabilities can overcome their difficulties. These problems do not have to be tragic. Current and emerging technology, such as tapes, computers, data processing equipment, and new teaching techniques can help in the eradication of learning disabilities as an impediment to achievement. This is clearly the time to interject hope and understanding into the lives of those who have such disabilities. With the designation of October as "Learning Disabilities Awareness Month" we can bring down the barriers that prevent the recognition and treatment of these problems. I urge the Senate to adopt this resolution.

Mr. President, along with the article, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 191

Whereas millions of Americans suffer from one or more learning disabilities;

Whereas it is estimated that 10,000,000 American children have been diagnosed as suffering from learning disabilities;

Whereas most learning-disabled persons are of normal or above normal intelligence but cannot learn to read and write in the conventional manner;

Whereas it is important for parents, educators, physicians, and learning-disabled persons to be aware of the nature of learning disabilities and the resources available to help learning-disabled persons;

Whereas early diagnosis and treatment of learning-disabled children gives such children a better chance for a happy and productive adult life;

Whereas the courage necessary for learning-disabled persons to meet their special challenges should be recognized;

Whereas hundreds of national and local support groups for learning-disabled persons, parents of learning-disabled children, and professionals who work with learning disabled persons have made important contributions to the treatment of learning disabilities;

Whereas research and study have contributed to public knowledge about learning disabilities, but much remains to be learned; and

Whereas public awareness of and concern about learning disabilities may encourage the establishment of the program necessary to promote early diagnosis and treatment of learning disabilities and to help learning-disabled persons and their families cope with their learning disabilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 1985 hereby is designated "Learning Disabilities Awareness Month," and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all public officials and the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

A SENATOR'S WIFE STRUGGLES WITH A LEARNING DISABILITY

(By Ann Bradford Mathias)

From the time I was very small, I can remember feeling that I was different. No one ever talked about it; it was just something I sensed. I was an underachiever in every subject. There was confusion within my brain, and I could not pull things out of it when I felt that I needed to.

At 5, like my older sister and younger brothers, I went off to a progressive private school in Cambridge, Mass. I was an academic disaster. Reading, writing and spelling were a problem from the very first. No matter how hard I tried to memorize spelling, I couldn't. As the material, particularly the math, became more complicated, I wasn't able to do it. We had a real math wizard teaching us in the fourth grade, and she would call out numbers for us to multiply. I would sit there cringing because I couldn't remember sequentially much more than the first two steps in any exercise. In front of my peers, I would always come up with the wrong answer or nothing. I couldn't compete.

As the work grew tougher, it only got worse. I became a habitually slow reader; trying to speed up only lessened my comprehension. I was good on the sports field and socially, and since I seemed to be growing in the area of leadership, I was allowed to pass into higher grades even though I wasn't going anywhere academically. I was getting C-minuses and D's no matter how hard I was trying. How I craved to go home to my parents with some good grades! There was never a discussion in my household about marks. There was sort of a vacuum, and that made me all the more uncomfortable. There were always conferences between my parents and the teachers, but I didn't know what they were about and would never be told.

Eighth grade was a real washout. In English we began to memorize the poems of John Masefield and other poets. I would work all evening and go to sleep memorizing, only to wake up in the morning and not be able to recall one line. None of the teachers believed me. I was accused again and again of not doing my homework. It was terribly painful. I felt the only thing I had going for me was my integrity, and to have it questioned struck at my very innards.

In the end I even traded that for a good mark. That same year we began French and Latin. I was having trouble reading my native tongue, much less a foreign one. One day during a Latin test I panicked. Sitting in front of me was the smartest boy in the class, and because he was left-handed his paper was always available for me to see. I desperately needed something to indicate to myself, and more importantly to my parents, that I could be okay, so I copied his paper. At the end of the week I got the test back with "terrific" written in Latin. I took it home and put it on my father's bureau, where it sat like a monument for the rest of the year. Every time I looked at it I felt uncomfortable for having done something so totally dishonest.

Later, when it came time to start thinking about college, I stunned my teachers by telling them I was applying to Vassar. By then I had learned how to organize my thoughts better and then get them down on paper. I still had to work four times harder than my peers, but I felt that if I didn't try I would always wonder if I could have made it. One of my former teachers, who had begun doing some work on identifying what are now called learning disabilities, had been following my progress over the years. She was on the Vassar board of trustees and was a personal friend of the dean of admissions and offered to take me for a private interview, where she was able to tell the dean something about my problems. Her interceding on my behalf got me in. The dean of admissions was very direct and told me I didn't have the necessary skills but that there was a steady progress in my learning. On the famous day when everybody heard whether they had been accepted at the colleges where they'd applied, I got a communication from Vassar that I was on a waiting list. Eight weeks later I got a call saying that I had been accepted as a Vassar "risk." For a long time afterward, whenever the phone would ring in my room at Vassar, I was sure it was some official telling me, "Bye-bye, Baby."

In my sophomore year I had a marvelous English teacher named Mrs. Bergeret. I credit her with the fact that I graduated. She gave me extra time for my papers and advised me to use pencil since it was easier to erase. She sat me down and said, "You know, there is nothing the matter with you. You are an extremely articulate and interesting person." I was astonished. I needed that kind of encouragement. I also needed to learn that there was a way to do things that addressed my needs as opposed to the norm. Although she didn't know about my learning disabilities per se, Mrs. Bergeret taught me that, in order to learn and retain facts, I first had to read, then write down everything I'd read, then speak it. It was simple reinforcement, but for me it worked. By the time I graduated from college, I was making B's and some A's.

My first job after college was with the CIA in Washington, D.C. I was placed in an area where I was performing very well, so well that I soon found myself having to do briefings. The fear of public utterance will always haunt me, but the CIA insisted. So they sent me to an elementary speaking course, where I bombed and was invited by the teacher not to come back.

During that time I met Mac, who had just decided to run for the Maryland legislature. Over the years I've campaigned for Mac, but it has always been on a one-to-one basis. I park my car and walk 15 miles a day, knocking on doors. That's been embarrassing too. Because of my confusion with directions, I've lost my car quite a few times.

One of my father's cousins is Dr. Edwin Cole, an expert in developmental dyslexia and founder of the language training program at Massachusetts General Hospital. He has traced a pattern of learning disorders in our family that goes back almost to William Bradford. When my own boys came, I was watching for it. There were few problems with our older boy, Charlie, but with our younger son, Rob, I have relived my own pain. He couldn't write, for instance. He had a real processing problem—a problem getting his thought from his brain through his muscles onto paper. I would have him dictate his creative stories to me and he would then illustrate them. That way he felt he could communicate. As he grew older he became an excellent skier and sailor, and though these sports were an additional expense we let him pursue them because they were great for his self-esteem. Rob is now 22 and a senior at the University of Vermont, and director of operations at the university rescue squad where he takes every message down on the typewriter rather than trusting his handwriting.

A year ago I became involved with the experimental Lab School of Washington. It was founded by educator Sally Smith and teaches learning-disabled children of ages 6 to 16 academic skills through the arts such as music and dance. Each child has his own so-called "prescription" that tells how he learns best. If, for example, he can't read, he can perhaps learn through hearing. The arts offer the children opportunities to strengthen their visual, auditory, tactile and motor skills.

It is a great relief to find out that there are neurological reasons for my disability. Organization is still a problem, though. Even now, when I get nervous, I have trouble pulling out my words. If I am handling my problems in any way today, it is by getting up and talking about them. It is terribly important that the public know such a syndrome exists. I wish they had known about it when I was growing up.

SENATE RESOLUTION 207—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. ABDNOR, from the Committee on Environment and Public Works, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 207

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of the Water Resources Development Act of 1985. Such waiver is necessary because the bill authorizes enactment of new budget authority which becomes available in fiscal year 1986, and such bill was not reported prior to the statutory deadline imposed by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for such authorizations.

The Committee postponed consideration of the legislation beyond the reporting date to ensure full and deliberate consideration of the complex issues surrounding the equitable allocation of costs among the users and the federal government.

SENATE RESOLUTION 208—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. ABDNOR, from the Committee on Environment and Public Works, reported the following original resoluton; which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 208

Resolved, That Section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act is hereby waived with respect to consideration of The Water Resources Development Act of 1985. This waiver is necessary because the legislation provides an increase in revenue which first become effective in fiscal year 1986, and the first concurrent resolution on the budget for such year has not been agreed to pursuant to Section 301.

The Committee devoted substantial time to ensuring full and deliberate consideration of the complex issues surrounding the equitable allocation of costs among the users and the federal government and believes the legislation should be considered by the Senate promptly.

SENATE RESOLUTION 209—RELATING TO THE REPEAL OF THE HISTORIC REHABILITATION TAX CREDIT

Mr. HEINZ submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 209

Whereas the 25% investment credit for the rehabilitation of cerfified historic buildings has been an unqualified success, working just as Congress intended to stimulate investment in our nation's cities and towns and to preserve the best of our older buildings;

Whereas as neighborhoods and central business districts are experiencing this renaissance, the state and local economies of which they are a part receive the benefits of increased local retail sales and business activity, increased employment and wages, and the resulting increased collection of income, sales, and property taxes;

Whereas the historic rehabilitation tax credit has generated more than $5 billion in private sector investment in more than 6,800 historic buildings since January, 1982, creating thousands of rental housing opportunities, including the provision of low- and moderate-income housing;

Whereas in the absence of preservation tax incentives, market forces would channel investment away from historic buildings, which would deprive Americans of the economic and cultural benefits of historic preservation; Therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that legislation to revise or reform the Tax Code should not contain any provision to eliminate or in any way lessen the efficacy of the historic rehabilitation tax credit.

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am submitting today a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that if and when Congress enacts legislation to revise or reform the Tax Code, such legislation should not contain any provision to eliminate or in any way lessen the efficiency of the historic rehabilitation tax credit.

As most of my colleagues are aware, the President's tax reform proposal proposes to eliminate the historic rehabilitation tax credit. I support the thrust of President's effort for a fairer tax system and tax reform, however, I do not believe that our zeal for tax reform should blind us to those programs and tax provisions which are truly successful. The historic rehabilitation tax credit has contributed to the preservation of America's heritage, and has revitalized our cities and towns.

The Tax Reform Act of 1976 was the first initiative to eliminate some of the previous tax law's bias against historic preservation, but it did not go far enough. Consequently in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 Congress created the current three-tiered system of rehabilitation tax credits. The rehabilitation credit is provided for qualified expenditures incurred in connection with the rehabilitation—but not enlargement—of certain old or historic buildings. The credit rate is equal to 15 percent for qualified expenditures incurred in connection with buildings at least 30 years old but less than 40 years old. There is a 20-percent credit for qualified expenditures incurred in connection with buildings at least 40 years old, and a 25-percent credit for qualified expenditures incurred in connection with certified historic structures of any age.

The rehabilitation credit has met the goal which Congress established in an effective and efficient manner. In 1981, Congress expressed its intent to stimulate investment in our Nation's cities and towns to preserve the best of our older buildings. Since January 1982, more than $5 billion has been invested in more than 6,800 historic buildings. A recent Government Accounting Office report concluded that the credit has been effective, as well as efficient. One of the reasons for this is that the credit does not involve a lot of Government redtape or bureaucracy. The 25-percent credit is truly a model of what Government can do to stimulate private-sector development activity without undue bureaucratic controls.

The rehabilitation credit has led to the preservation of our cultural and architectural heritage. It has also generated what can be accurately described as an urban renaissance. In Pennsylvania, from large structures in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh to the Old School in Mechanicsburg, projects aided by the historic rehabilitation tax credit are serving as anchors for urban revitalization. This is truly an urban renewal program that has benefited State and local economies in terms of increased sales and business activity, increased employment and wages, and increased tax revenue.

My final point concerns the credit's effect in an area that should be a top priority of citizens and legislators alike: this Nation's housing stock. The rehabilitation credit has effectively been used to increase housing. More than half of all historic rehabilitation projects are housing. Since January 1982, more than 36,000 housing units have been rehabilitated. In my own State, Philadelphia estimates that in its Old City, use of the historic tax credit has resulted in 2,000 units, a 300-percent increase in housing units. In fact, 90 percent of the housing starts in Philadelphia last year resulted from construction activity induced by the rehabilitation tax credit, and I understand that Philadelphia's experience is not unique.

Mr. President, I am introducing this resolution to preserve the credit, and I urge all my colleagues to join me in this effort.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 210—REGARDING THE SYSTEM OF POLITICAL REPRESENTATION IN SOUTH AFRICA

Mr LEVIN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. Res. 210

Whereas South Africa has implemented a new three-tiered Parliament where South African whites share power with mixed race and Indian South Africans, but blacks are still excluded from the Parliament;

Whereas approximately 500 persons have been killed in unrest in South Africa since the August 1984 elections for new members of Parliament;

Whereas numerous persons have been detained for publicly protesting against government policies or actions in 1984 and 1985;

Whereas in 1984 South Africa prohibited all indoor political gatherings, and in September at least 130 persons were arrested for violating this law; and

Whereas forty-five political prisoners died in detention in South Africa between 1976 and 1985, and two of these died in detention in 1985: Now, therefore, be it

Resloved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should strongly urge the Government of South Africa to implement a system of political representation for all South Africans which is based on the principle of "one person, one vote."

Sec. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President.

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a resolution which expresses the sense of the Congress that the President should urge the Government of South Africa to implement a system of political representation for all South Africans which is based on the principal of "one person one vote."

I intended to offer this resolution as an amendment during the July 11 deliberations on S. 995, the Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985. However, because any amendments to the bill would have slowed down and perhaps endangered passage of sanctions, I decided not to offer the amendment at that time.

Mr. President, we must continually reaffirm the legitimacy of the struggle of the majority of South Africans for a united, nonracial, and democratic South Africa.

The elections of August 1984—the so-called colored elections—were a mockery of the democratic process. They have not brought peace or justice to South Africa for the simple reason that they still denied the right to vote to the majority of South Africans. As Randall Robinson of the Free South Africa Movement so aptly put it:

> The Government of South Africa promulgated a constitution that it advertized as a human rights advance, but that, in fact, continued the total political disenfranchisement of blacks and actually heralded the government's intention to press on relentlessly with its program of denying all political rights to blacks, stripping them of their South African citizenship and shipping many of them off to "homelands." Black leaders who protested this new constitutional enshrinement of racism were immediately slapped into jail and held incommunicado without specified charges being brought against them.

I think that it is important for the Congress to send a clear message to the South African Government that the United States believes that the continuation of the policy of disenfranchisement of the black majority should be ended and should be replaced by a system of one person, one vote. It is impossible to speak of the value of individual freedom and of democracy and ignore the blatant and massive denial of the most fundamental method of expressing that freedom and protecting that democracy. Yet this denial occurs in South Africa day after day through the continued refusal of the Government of South Africa to adhere to a policy of full voting participation.

Our own history has taught us the basic fairness of this proposition—a proposition that recognizes the basic dignity of each individual and allows each individual to express that dignity through participation in the political process in the form of exercising the right to vote.

Most of us are familiar with Bishop Desmond Tutu's continued exhortations in support of the values of freedom and democracy which are denied to the majority of his countrymen.

But for those who might not have had the opportunity to hear this Nobel Peace Prize winner on the subject, I would like to share an excerpt from his remarks of February 3, 1985, on his Enthronement as Anglican Bishop of the Diocese of Johannesburg:

I for my part cannot keep quiet when God's children hurt, when they live in single hostels, when they are banned or detained arbitrarily, when they are uprooted . . . Please dear white fellow South Africans hear the cri de coeur we utter. It is that we too are just ordinary human beings. We too love to be with our wives everyday, we too want our children to rush out to meet us as we come back from work, we too would like to live where we can afford it. We too want to be able to move freely everywhere in the land of our birth, we too want to have security of tenure. We too want to participate in the decisions that affect our lives. These are not extravagant demands. They are the expectation of any human being. We want to have a new kind of South Africa. Where we all, black and white can walk tall together. . .

Together, the President and the Congress, should send a message to the Government of South Africa that the time is now—that the time is in fact long past due—for it to adhere to the principle of one person, one vote.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 212—RELATING TO VIOLENCE AGAINST HEALTH CARE FACILITIES

Mr. DOLE (for Mr. GORTON) (for himself, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. EVANS, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. KERRY, Mr. COHEN, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. SIMON, Mr. LONG, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. GORTON, and Mr. DODD) submitted the following resolution; which was placed on the calendar:

Whereas over the last four years there has been nearly a 2000% increase in reported incidents of violence against health care facilities, most of which provide abortion services;

Whereas since January, 1984, there have been 228 reported incidents of violence, including bombings, arson, vandalism and burglaries, against certain health care facilities which provide abortion and reproductive services;

Whereas 29 of these facilities have been damaged or destroyed as a result of arson or bombings;

Whereas out of the 48 incidents of arson, bombings, and attempted arson bombings perpetrated against health care facilities since May, 1982, the efforts of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms have resulted in 14 indictments and 11 convictions with respect to 24 incidents;

Whereas since January, 1984 violence against health care facilities has resulted in millions of dollars worth of property damage;

Whereas violence not only results in destruction of property but also seriously jeopardizes the lives of patients, medical staff, and members of the general public;

Whereas violence has no place in the legitimate debate of public issues and is an immoral and totally unacceptable way by which to effect a change in law and public policy in our society;

Whereas the First Amendment guarantees the right to freedom of speech and to petition the Congress; now, therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that it condemns the growing incidence of violence against health care facilities, and it encourages the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Department of Justice to intensify their efforts to apprehend and convict the perpetrators of such violence. Further, the Senate urges the Department of Justice to use all applicable federal criminal statutes against individuals who engage in such violence.

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, today, I am introducing a sense of the Senate resolution condemning the growing incidence of violence against health care facilities.

Mr. President, last month the Nation reacted with horror at the hijacking of TWA flight 847 in Greece and has applauded the administration's determination to make a stand against terrorism around the world.

If outrage at terrorism is justified, then it is as valid when commenting about bombing an abortion clinic as when reacting to a skyjacked commerical airliner. Terrorism is an insidious crime that strikes at the innocent and the defenseless in the name of a larger cause. Those who criminally jeopardize others' lives are criminals, no matter what the rationalization and should be unanimously condemned by Congress.

In Washington State alone, there have been four incidences of bombings and arson of health care clinics which provide abortion services. An advocate of these violent attacks has declared that direct action against abortion clinics is the only appropriate response to abortion.

The tactics of "direct action" have escalated into a form of domestic terrorism. A group of fanatics has set out to impose its political will through fear rather than persuasion. Those who cannot change the law by peaceful means justify violence. The most bizarre among them are even risking murder out of the conviction that they are stopping murder.

In 1984, 24 health care facilities were damaged by bombings and arson and attempts were made at bombing six more clinics. In addition, 42 clinics received bomb threats and 35 were vandalized. A total of 173 specific acts of violence occurred against health care facilities in 1984. This statistic is particularly shocking when compared to the fact that only nine incidents of violence against health care facilities occurred in 1981.

In case after case, throughout the United States, the tactics of antiabortion protestors have been repeated. In addition to bombings and arson, they include invading clinics, blocking entrances and parking lots, making phone calls to clinics and to employees' homes which threaten death to employees or threaten bombing of the clinics; photographing and filming patients as they attempt to enter; pushing, shoving, and threatening patients and employees; copying down and tracing license plates of patients and making harassing phone calls to them at home; banging on doors and windows while surgery is in progress; flinging fetuses in the faces of patients trying to enter; and setting up gauntlets through which patients must pass.

These tactics are not simple expressions of opinion. They are part of concerted plans to intimidate women and close abortion and reproductive health clinics. In Roe versus Wade the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the constitutional right of privacy encompasses a woman's right to decide to terminate a pregnancy under certain circumstances. The Court wrote that the right of privacy is "founded in the 14th amendment's concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon State Action" and that States may not completely prohibit women from choosing abortion. Understandably, Roe versus Wade has drawn both passionate support and furious opposition.

Abortion and family planning clinics are engaged in legal activity, however, and are entitled to the same protection under law as any other place of business. The issue here is not one of "prochoice" versus "prolife." This is a matter or order over chaos. Our society cannot survive if we express our opinions about public issues by committing violent acts rather than by exercising our precious right to freedom of speech and to petition our Government.

These incidents are the acts of a few individuals who do not appreciate that words are the tools of persuasion in our society, never violence. Terrorism of the kind aimed at the clinics undermines the rule of law that makes honest debate possible in a democracy, and should be condemned by all Americans who value the public peace and the preservation of our constitutional freedoms.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors of this resolution which condemns these vicious acts of violence, calls upon the administration to intensify its efforts to bring those persons responsible for these deplorable attacks to justice, and supports prompt, effective enforcement of our laws that prohibit these totally unacceptable actions.

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, today, I am pleased to introduce a

Senate resolution which expresses the sense of the Senate concerning violence against health care facilities. In the United States, within the last 4 years, there has been nearly a 200-percent increase in the number of reported acts of violence against health care facilities, most of which provide abortion services. I strongly feel that these acts of violence and destruction demands the attention of Congress. My concern for safety at women's health care centers has prompted me to address these issues. Our society will not survive if we express our opinions about public issues by committing violent acts rather than by exercising our precious right to freedom of speech and to petition the Government. These violent acts have placed the lives of many Americans in jeopardy; solely because a group of misguided individuals have taken a vigilante approach to forcing social change on a society founded on the democratic principles of debate over civil unrest. These violent incidents are the actions of individuals who seek to change public policy through the use of violence. I strongly disagree with these individuals and believe that it is our responsibility to speak out against these reprehensive incidents.

I would like to mention a few of the violent acts that have occurred in my home State, several of which caused thousands of dollars of damage. For example, a bombing at the Cypress-Fairbanks Family Planning Center disrupted service at the entire clinic for several months. Additionally, at the West Loop Clinic, a Molotov cocktail was thrown through a window, causing $50,000 in damages. At the women's outpatient clinic, a bomb completely destroyed the reception area and created smoke damage through the office. A combined total of $1,620,000 damage was suffered by the Clear Lake Women's Center and the Mesquite Women's Clinic.

In a democratic society, controversial issues should be debated rather than resolved by acts of destruction. I must stress to you the potential trend that this violence exemplifies throughout our Nation. Our Nation prides itself on the fundamental right of freedom of speech. However, the issue before us is not the speech itself but the unbridled and lawless conduct of a few who act outside the established forum of government.●

● Mr HATFIELD. Today I join in introducing a resolution speaking out against the bombing of abortion clinics and requesting heightened efforts to apprehend and convict those responsible for these acts. Within the last 4 years there has been nearly a 2,000-percent increase in the number of reported acts of violence against health care facilities, which provide abortion services.

This shocking increase in the number of clinics bombed heightens my resolve against the tyranny of violence, not only that which is committed inside abortion clinics but the violence outside as well. Without equivocation or qualification I oppose abortion as a destruction of human life, just as I abhor the threatened destruction of life which is inherent in the buildup of nuclear weapons. It is imperative that we act to affirm the value we place on all human life, both existing and potential.

There may well be times when nonviolent civil disobedience is called for. There are times when our spiritual calling may not be compatible with the demands of governmental authority. However, in the case of civil disobedience, the use of violence is never permissible and those who engage in such acts must accept the full penalty of the law for their actions.

It is inconceivable to me that an act of destruction can be seen as fairly representing the cause of nonviolence and the preservation of life which those of us who oppose abortion advocate. The need to change our law concerning abortion is great, but I feel very strongly that criminal and desperate measures only serve to denigrate our efforts toward meaningful change.

Abortion is a form of violence. This is an undeniable reality. It is the destruction of life. It furthers the dehumanization of life. It cheapens life. In the same context, clinic bombings perpetuate that destruction. Each of these acts erodes the base of sanity on which our society teeters.●

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the Senator from Washington's resolution condemning violence against women's health care facilities. Many women's clinics in my home State of Oregon have experienced such instances of violence and harassment; and the frequency of these incidents is only growing with each passing day. Just this past weekend, a Planned Parenthood clinic in Portland was vandalized.

I ask unanimous consent that an article published in the Oregonian (July 26, 1985) describing this incident be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregonian, July 27, 1985]

CLINIC STRUCK BY VANDALS

Anti-abortion slogans were spray-painted on Planned Parenthood's main clinic in Southeast Portland and rocks where thrown into the plate-glass doors early Friday morning, according to Jay Decker, public information officer for the Portland Police Bureau.

Two of the slogans read: "Planned death" and "Stop baby murder." Police think two vandals were involved because the slogans painted on the building showed two different styles of handwriting, Decker said.

The broken doors face the west side of the parking lot, and although the outer and inner glass doors were damaged, nothing was taken, Decker said. The incident, which police think happened between 1 a.m. and 7 a.m. Friday, was reported to police by a neighbor.

"The irony of the whole thing is that Planned Parenthood combats abortion by helping women prevent unwanted pregnancy," said Scott Frangos, public relations coordinator for the agency.

Joan Binninger, director of education for Planned Parenthood, said that "Planned Parenthood is outraged by this act of violence and vandalism. We would like the public to be aware that extreme right-wing groups are actively mounting a campaign designed to enforce their ideas through overt acts of violence."

Planned Parenthood is a United Way agency whose services include birth control counseling, treatment and testing for venereal disease, and education programs for schools and community groups.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, my feelings on the matter of abortion are very strong. It is not my role, or your role or the role of any government to tell a woman what she must or must not do regarding an abortion. This relatively new and terrifying phenomenon, the bombings of clinics and harassment of their clients and employees, is yet another example of a small minority of people trying to enforce their point of view on all of us.

Unfortunately, I have a feeling that because the violence is directed at abortion and family planning clinics, some feel that these illegal acts are not as "illegal" as if, for example, the harassment was directed at a private school building. I have been involved in the fight for reproductive freedom for many years and have seen, time and time again, that the minute the word "abortion" is injected into the debate, all else becomes sidetracked. Mr. President, the subject of abortion stirs passionate emotions. But that is not the point to be made here today. The point to be made, is that illegal acts to overturn legal rights will never be successful. We will never allow a minority to violently force their view of the world on the rest of us.

As I said earlier this year on this floor on this subject, the danger of the liberties of all Americans is most threatened by those who want to compel conformity of thought and deed. Conversely, our liberties are most secured by a decent respect for diversity, and most especially on those subjects upon which there is no consensus.

I ask unanimous consent that an editorial by Adele Simmons which appeared in the New York Times (July 29, 1985) on the subject of abortion clinic violence and harassment appear at the conclusion of my remarks. I believe Ms. Simmons' conclusion is right on target. She said, "Our response to abortion clinic violence should not be determined by the political coloration of terrorists' cause." It is my hope that my colleagues on both sides of the abortion issue will join as cosponsors of this resolution and will condemn these acts for what they are: illegal. Let me not say that the subject of the harassment and violence—women exercising their right to choose to have an abortion—justifies the means.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 29, 1985]

REAGAN'S SILENCE ON ABORTION TERROR

(By Adele Simmons)

AMHERST, MA.—Bombs exploded in 25 abortion and family-planning clinics throughout America in 1984. Eighteen directors of abortion clinics were threatened with death. Opponents of abortion invaded one clinic and trampled employees. A doctor who headed an abortion clinic and his wife were abducted and held for eight days.

President Reagan remained silent on the subject throughout the year. Not unitl January did he publicly protest violence as a means of opposing abortion—and only then after heavy Congressional pressure.

From the record, it seems plain that the President's attitude toward terrorist incidents reflects his personal view of the politics of the terrorists. His outrage at the actions of the terrorists aboard the hijacked Trans World Airlines plane was both obvious and appropriate. But he has yet to demonstrate an equally passionate commitment to ending terrorism at home.

To do so would require him to set aside partisan concerns and discomfit some of his political allies. He and many Americans have been quick to denounce the terrorism associated with the Islamic fundamentalists. But what about the United States-based Christian "army of God," which claimed credit for several of the abortion clinic bombings and the abduction of the doctor and his wife? What about the Florida clinic bomber who, when arrested in January, explained that he was motivated by love of God as he sat at his kitchen table and, according to one account, "spooned explosive black powder into large iron pipes that were planted to explode before daybreak on Christmas at three abortion clinics"?

What of the lay pastor in a Maryland Lutheran church who was sentenced to jail for his role in a clinic bombing in Maryland? What of Joseph Scheidler, leader of the Pro-Life Action League, who informed the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights that his organization did not answer to the law of our country? It answers, he said, to a "higher law." God has determined that abortion is immoral, according to Mr. Scheidler, and therefore anti-abortion activists who invade clinics should be compared to "the trespassing of a fireman into a burning building to save a life."

Family-planning and abortion clinics are engaged in legal activity and are entitled to the same protection under law as any other place of work. The Federal Bureau of Investigation defines terrorism as "the unlawful use of force or violence against persons or property to intimidate or coerce a government, the civilian population, or any segment thereof, in furtherance of political and social objectives." That no one has been killed so far is sheer good fortune.

Five people were sentenced recently to 10 years in prison for their roles in abortion clinic bombings. What was particularly disturbing was the political nature of the response to these sentences. "Pro-choice" forces have condemned the sentences as too lenient; "right-to-life" people have celebrated their brevity. Both sides miss the heart of the matter: The point is not abortion, but rather terrorism.

Americans are focusing attention on terrorism. President Reagan has an opportunity to educate them on a crucial point: Our response to it should not be determined by the political coloration of terrorists' cause. If he does so, it is hard to imagine that more than a handful of Americans will oppose a consistent, firm approach to all terrorism.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 213—EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF THE SENATE CONCERNING RECESS APPOINTMENTS

Mr. BYRD (for himself, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. CHILES, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. DODD, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. FORD, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. HART, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. EXON, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. NUNN, Mr. PELL, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SASSER, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. SIMON, Mr. KERRY, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. HARKIN) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 213

Whereas, the United States Constitution in Article II, Section 2, Clause 2, vests in the Senate the power to give its advice and consent to presidential appointments,

Whereas, the Appointments Clause specifies the method clearly preferred by the Framers for the regular appointment of Officers of the United States,

Whereas, the Appointments Clause has been judicially determined to be an aspect of the principle of separation of powers woven into the United States Constitution (Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)),

Whereas, the reasons behind the Recess Appointment Clause, Article II, Section 2, Clause 3, like those supporting the pocket veto power, have been largely superseded by modern methods of instantaneous communication and the modern practice of Congress with respect to abbreviated intrasession adjournments (Kennedy v. Sampson, 511 F. 2d 430 (D.C. Cir. 1974)),

Whereas, the adherence to Appointment Clause procedures, unlike a recess appointment that thereafter may be rejected by the Senate, precludes subsequent challenges with respect to the appointee's rightful exercise of significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) The exercise of the power to make recess appointments should be confined to a formal termination of a session of the Senate, or to a recess of the Senate, protracted enough to prevent it from discharging its constitutional function of advising and consenting to executive nominations;

(2) As the President as well as the heads of Executive and military departments are authorized to detail officers of the United States to fill vacancies in offices at all levels of the Federal Government, Chapter 33, Title 5, United States Code, which details are valid for at least thirty days, no recess appointment should be made when the Senate stands adjourned or recessed within a session for a period of less than thirty days; and

(3) No recess appointment should be made of any person to any office—

(a) if such person has previously, during the same presidential term, been nominated for appointment to such office; and

(b)(1) the Senate has voted not to give its advice and consent to such appointment; or

(2) the appropriate committee of the Senate has voted not to report such nomination to the Senate.

SENATE RESOLUTION 214—RELATING TO U.S. CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE UNITED NATIONS

Mrs. HAWKINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 214

Whereas the Soviet Union has three votes in the United Nations General Assembly, one for Byelorussia, one for the Ukraine, and one for the Soviet Union proper, while the United States has only one vote;

Whereas the United Nations Charter specifies that the United Nations shall be composed of "states";

Whereas the Soviet Union does not allow sovereignty and independence, the criteria for all other nation-states in the United Nations, for the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic;

Whereas the Soviet Union has not allowed its "republics" to establish or maintain separate sovereign diplomatic relations with any other sovereign state since 1920;

Whereas the American taxpayer pours more than one billion dollars per year into the United Nations;

Whereas this funding level is more than twice the amount given by any other country; and

Whereas the Soviet Union is nearly two hundred million dollars in arrears to the United Nations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the financial contributions by the United States Government to the United Nations each year should not exceed one-third the financial contributions by the Government of the Soviet Union to the United Nations in such year until—

(1) such time as the Soviet Union grants independence and total sovereignty to Byelorussia and the Ukraine; or

(2) the United Nations reduces the number of votes of the Soviet Union in the United Nations from three to one, at which time the United States' contribution to the United Nations should be adjusted so as not to exceed that of the Soviet Union.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the Secretary of State.

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today I am submitting legislation to reduce the amount of the U.S. financial contribution to the United Nations.

Each year over $1 billion of the American taxpayer's money is poured into the coffers of the United Nations—more than twice the amount given by any other country. In fact, while the United States contributes 25 percent of the U.N. budget, the Soviets contribute less than 10 percent.

Yet day after day the United Nations is used as an international forum by the Soviets and Third World countries to denounce the United States and advance their own foreign policy objectives.

For example, the United Nations has been allocating American tax dollars to SWAPO, the PLO, and other known anti-U.S. terrorist groups.

If that isn't bad enough, the Soviets have three votes in the U.N. General Assembly—one for Byelorussia, one for the Ukraine, and one for the U.S.S.R. proper—while the United States has but one vote.

The legislation I'm introducing today would cut back our financial contribution to the United Nations until such time as the Soviet Union grants independence and total sovereignty to Byelorussia and the Ukraine or the United Nations reduces the number of votes of the Soviet Union from 3 to 1.

This would save the American taxpayers in excess of x million dollars a year, and better yet, free the people of the Ukraine and Byelorussia from Soviet reign.

Last year, President Reagan took a first step toward eliminating anti-American activity in the United Nations when he stood firm in his decision to withdraw the United States from UNESCO.

That move alone will save the American taxpayers some $47 million in 1985.

And the American people cheered when U.S. Ambassador Charles Lichenstein told the U.N. members that if they didn't feel welcome here, they should remove themselves and the organization from American soil.

The fact is, the American taxpayer is fed up with the goings-on at the United Nations. It is clear to them that the United Nations has failed its basic mission to keep the peace.

If we aren't willing to end our support for this organization then we ought to at least cut our contributions and end the ability of our adversaries to use the organization as a base for espionage and propaganda.

It is of vital importance that the voices of freedom and the interests of Western nations are heard within the United Nations.

To accomplish that goal, the United States must use any pressure available to roll back Soviet influence.

Ending the shrill anti-Western bias of the United Nations could also shift the terms of debate within the United Nations to focus outrage on Soviet aggression throughout the world, and lack of human rights within totalitarian systems.

Moving to forcefully reassert American influence within the United Nations would thus be part of a larger offensive on many fronts against Soviet power.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 215—EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF THE SENATE WITH RESPECT TO THE JULY 30, 1985, JAPAN TRADE ACTION PROGRAM

Mr. MURKOWSKI submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 215

Whereas the United States Senate on March 28, 1985, by a vote of 92 to 0, directed the President to respond to the unfair trade practices of Japan;

Whereas the United States House of Representatives on April 2, 1985, by a vote of 394 to 19 also directed the President to respond to the unfair trade practices of Japan;

Whereas the merchandise trade balance between the United States and Japan showed a deficit for the United States of $37 billion in 1984;

Whereas this bilateral merchandise trade deficit registered $25 billion for the first six months of 1985—a 40-percent increase over the comparable period in 1984;

Whereas U.S. merchandise exports to Japan in the first six months of 1985 have shown no growth and in fact have declined in the most recent reporting period;

Whereas the merchandise trade balance between the United States and Japan for the month of June showed the fourth consecutive monthly increase in the bilateral deficit including the entry of $450 million worth of additional new automobiles from Japan in one month;

Whereas other countries have experienced a similar pattern of inability to enter the Japanese market;

Whereas the currency misalignments do not sufficiently explain these trends given the five-month decline in the dollar and the decline of other major currencies against the yen, without comparable increases in Japanese imports into Japan;

Whereas the most recent United Nations statistics show that many nations, particularly in East Asia, are diverting their exports from their natural market, Japan, to the United States, thereby placing additional import pressures on important U.S. industries such as textiles and steel;

Whereas the Senate Finance Committee has reported on a pattern of unfair trading practices by Japan in merchandise trade, leading to the export of significant unemployment to the United States;

Whereas hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee have shown that this pattern of unfair trading practices extends to United States-Japan services trade;

Whereas last year for the first time in our trade relations with Japan, the United States faced a deficit with Japan in the services sector amounting to over $1 billion.

Whereas the Congress and executive branch have repeatedly urged the Japanese Government to reduce or eliminate its barriers to imports;

Whereas the Japanese Government on July 30, 1985, announced an Action Plan to expand export opportunities to the Japanese market;

Whereas an examination of the Action Plan reveals it to be inadequate and unlikely to lead to a reduction of tension over trade;

Whereas the Senate declares its disappointment that so few of the specific U.S. requests for reduction of individual barriers were contained in the Action Plan;

Whereas the Senate declares the Japanese commitment to reduce plywood tariffs, beginning in 1987 and at an undetermined rate, to be unacceptable;

Whereas the Senate declares the Japanese refusal to renounce the practices of depression cartels to be unacceptable;

Whereas the Senate declares the policy of targeting specific industries such as aerospace, computers and satellites to be unacceptable;

Whereas the Senate declares the policy of controlled distribution through restrictions on store size in Japan to be unacceptable;

Whereas the Senate declares Japanese acquiescence in cartel-like authority by Japanese business at home and abroad to be unacceptable;

Whereas the Senate declares the Japanese Government prohibition against foreign company access to Japanese Government research and development projects to be unacceptable;

Whereas the Senate notes that the Action Plan calls for some limited participation by U.S. citizens in Japanese standards making but that such promises have been given in the past without notable results;

Whereas the Senate declares that the failure to reduce tariffs sufficiently in chocolate, aluminum, fresh grapefruit, walnuts, wine and other products is unacceptable;

Whereas the Senate notes that the Action Plan does not contain any reference to Japan's intentions of reducing the growing trade deficit by the purchase of United States natural resources: Now therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should inform the Government of Japan that the Action Plan is an insufficient response to the growing trade deficit, and be it further

Resolved, That the Government of Japan should immediately take any and all steps within its power to reduce trade barriers which have been brought to its attention by officials of the government of the United States, and be it further

Resolved, That the Senate, upon its return from the forthcoming recess period, shall act on legislative measures, including S. 1404, a bill to require the President to respond to unfair trade practices of Japan, that will assure relief from the growing trade imbalance with Japan.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, this morning the Republican Conference Trade Task Force met with the new USTR Clayton Yeutter to discuss the worsening trade deficit with Japan and to review Japan's most recent action plan to deal with this growing problem.

It is my firm conviction that the trade imbalance with Japan is only worsening, and that the July 30 action plan announced by that country is too little and too late.

In this regard, I prepared a sense of the Senate resolution that I hoped would have been considered by my colleagues before we recess tonight. Unfortunately, Mr. President, I have been informed that the resolution was not cleared by the minority for action today.

Mr. President, I find it most unfortunate that my colleagues did not have a chance to consider my resolution before the August recess. I am convinced that the resolution would have received wide support in the Senate because the Japan action plan is a considerable disappointment and is unlikely to signficantly deal with the trade problem. At a time when dramatic action would have been constructive, Japan has chosen instead to take a gradual approach over 3 years to implement some changes in the approach to the United States-Japan trading relationship.

Mr. President, as the recently announced June trade figures point out, our deficit with Japan is growing out of control. In June alone, the imbalance is $4.6 billion, and for the first 6 months of this year the trade deficit is $23.9 billion. At this rate, we will face a $48 billion trade deficit in 1985, compared with the $37 billion trade deficit that we experienced last year.

My reaction to Japan's action plan, and the underlying facts about our declining market shares is captured in the sense of the Senate resolution that I today submitted and I will not repeat what is set forth in that resolution.

Suffice it to say, Mr. President, Congress will have to take action after the August recess to assure that corrective measures will be taken to end this major problem. We cannot afford to watch the situation continue to deteriorate.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1985

HATFIELD (AND BYRD) AMENDMENT NO. 574

Mr. HATFIELD (for himself and Mr. BYRD) proposed an amendment to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112 to the bill (H.R. 2577) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes; as follows:

After the word "legislation" at the end of the last sentence, add the following: "; except that this sentence shall not apply after May 15, 1986."

ENERGY AND WATER DEVELOPMENT APPROPRIATIONS

BUMPERS AMENDMENT NO. 575

Mr. HATFIELD (for Mr. BUMPERS) proposed an amendment to the bill (H.R. 2959) making appropriations for energy and water development for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes; as follows:

On page 4, after line 2, add the following new language:

"The Corps of Engineers is directed to construct recreation and management facilities at the Ouachita and Black Rivers, Arkansas and Louisiana, in the vicinity of the Felsenthal National Wildlife Refuge at full federal expenses using funds heretofore provided, using the $3.5 million provided for such purpose in this Act."

DANFORTH AMENDMENT NO. 576

Mr. HATFIELD (for Mr. DANFORTH) proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 2959, supra; as follows:

On page 4 after line 2, insert the following:

SEC. . From funds previously appropriated for the Clarence Cannon Dam, the Secretary is directed to continue construction of the remaining authorized recreation facilities at full Federal funding. Construction shall continue until completion, subject to availability of funds.".

COMPREHENSIVE ENVIRONEMENTAL RESPONSE

COMPENSATION AND LIABILITY ACT EXTENSION

CRANSTON AMENDMENT NO, 577

(Ordered to lie on the table)

Mr. CRANSTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 51) to extend and amend the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980, and for other purposes; as follows:

On page 124, line 16, strike out "FUNDS UNSPENT OR $7,500,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000,000".

On page 125, strike out lines 1 through 18.

On page 125, line 19, strike out "(3)" and insert in lieu thereof "(2)".

On page 125, line 20, strike out "$7,500,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000,000".

On page 126, line 10, strike out "$7,500,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000,000".

On page 126, line 13, strike out "$7,500,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000,000".

On page 126, line 18, strike out "$7,500,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000,000".

On page 126, line 20, strike out "(4)" and insert in lieu thereof "(3)".

On page 126, line 23 strike out "or (3)".

On page 135, line 16, strike out ".08 percent" and insert in lieu thereof ".115 percent".

On page 135, line 20 and 21, strike out "FUNDS UNSPENT OR $7,500,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000,000".

On page 136, line 3, strike out "or (3)".

On page 136, line 4, strike out "section 4611(d)(3)" and insert in lieu thereof "such paragraph".

On page 141, line 20, strike out ".08 percent" and insert in lieu thereof ".115 percent".

On page 142, line 2, strike out "$4,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,750".

On page 144, line 16 and 18, strike out "$4,000" each place it appears and insert in lieu thereof "$5,750".

ENERGY AND WATER DEVELOPMENT APPROPRIATION

CHILES AMENDMENT NO. 578

Mr. CHILES proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 2959, supra; as follows:

At the appropriate place:

Provided, That none of the funds appropriated in this title may be used for preliminary discussions, staff briefings or meetings as defined in 10 Code of Federal Regulations 9.101(c) published May 21, 1985.

KENNEDY (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 579

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. HART, and Mr. BINGAMAN) proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 2959, supra; as follows:

On page 25, line 13, strike out "$7,623,300,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,630,800,000".

On page 25, line 14, after "expended" insert the following: ", of which $101,075,000 shall be available for verification and control technology".

SIMON AMENDMENT NO. 580

Mr. SIMON proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 2959, supra; as follows:

On page 25, line 9, after the semicolon insert the following: "the preparation and submission of a report in classified and unclassified versions, not later than March 1, 1986, by the Secretary of Energy, in consultation with the Secretary of Defense, to the Congress on recent developments in the capabilities of the United States to monitor compliance with any comprehensive nuclear test ban agreement which may be negotiated by the governments of the United States and the Soviet Union;".

EVANS (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 581

Mr. EVANS (for himself, Mr. MCCLURE, and Mr. GORTON) proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 2959, supra; as follows:

On page 29, line 22, strike "$95,568,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"$95,568,000, of which $2,750,000 shall be available to conduct geographic and resource sorting for the purpose of identifying applications for hydroelectric licenses or exemptions which do not have the potential to adversely affect environmental resources in a cumulative manner,".

DOMENICI (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 582

Mr. DOMENICI (for himself, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. BINGAMAN) proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 2959, supra; as follows:

On page 25, line 13, strike "$7,623,300,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,647,800,000".

LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE POLICY ACT AMENDMENTS

THURMOND AMENDMENT NO. 583

Mr. THURMOND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1517) to amend the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act to improve procedures for the implementation of compacts providing for the establishment and operation of regional disposal facilities for low-level radioactive waste, and for other purposes; as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. The Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act (42 U.S.C 2021b et seq.) is amended by striking out sections 2, 3, and 4 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 2. For purposes of this Act:

"(1) The term 'activity of the Secretary' means any activity of the Secretary of Energy that is conducted at an atomic energy defense, research and development, or demonstration installation or institution owned by and operated principally for the Department of Energy or its successor.

"(2) The term 'agreement State' means a State that—

"(A) has entered into an agreement with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission under section 274 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2021); and

"(B) has authority to regulate the disposal of low-level radioactive waste under such agreement.

"(3) The term 'atomic energy defense activity' means any activity of the Secretary of Energy performed in whole or part in carrying out any of the following functions:

"(A) naval reactors development, propulsion, and decommissioning;

"(B) weapons activities including defense inertial confinement;

"(C) verification and control technology;

"(D) defense nuclear materials production;

"(E) defense nuclear waste and materials byproducts management;

"(F) defense nuclear materials security and safeguards and security investigations; and

"(G) defense research and development, other than that described in subparagraphs (A) through (F).

"(4) The terms 'atomic weapon', 'byproduct material', 'source material', and 'special nuclear material' have the meanings given such terms in section 11 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2014), as such section is in effect on January 1, 1985.

"(5) The term 'commercial nuclear power reactor' means any unit of a civilian nuclear powerplant required to be licensed under section 103 or 104 b. of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2133 or 2134(b)).

"(6) The term 'compact' means a compact entered into by two or more States pursuant to this Act.

"(7) The term 'compact commission' means the regional commission, committee, or board established in a compact to administer such compact.

"(8) The term 'compact region' means the area consisting of all States that are members of a compact.

"(9) The term 'disposal' means the isolation of low-level radioactive waste pursuant to the requirements established by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission under applicable laws, or by an agreement State if such isolation occurs in such agreement State.

"(10) The term 'Federal research and development activity' means any activity of the Secretary of Energy that is not an atomic energy defense activity specified in paragraph (3).

"(11) The term 'generate', when used in relation to low-level radioactive waste, means to produce new low-level radioactive waste.

"(12) The terms 'high-level radioactive waste' and 'spent nuclear fuel' have the meanings given such terms in section 2 of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10101), as such section is in effect on January 1, 1985.

"(13) The term 'low-level radioactive waste' means radioactive material that—

"(A) is not high-level radioactive waste, spent nuclear fuel, transuranic waste, or byproduct material (as defined in section 11 e. (2) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2014(e)(2)) as in effect on January 1, 1985); and

"(B) the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, consistent with existing law, classifies as low-level radioactive waste.

"(14) The term 'non-sited compact region' means any compact region that is not a sited compact region.

"(15) The term 'regional disposal facility' means a low-level radioactive waste disposal facility in operation on January 1, 1985, or subsequently established and operated under a compact.

"(16) The term 'Secretary' means the Secretary of Energy.

"(17) The term 'sited compact region' means a compact region in which there is located one of the regional disposal facilities at Barnwell, in the State of South Carolina; Richland, in the State of Wahington; or Beatty, in the State of Nevada.

"(18) The term 'State' means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, and, subject to the provisions of Public Law 96-205, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, the Northern Mariana Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and any other territory or possession of the United States.

"(19) The term 'transuranic waste' means radioactive waste contaminated with concentrations of transuranic elements greater than the limit for transuranic waste established by rule by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

"RESPONSIBILITIES FOR DISPOSAL OF LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE

"SEC. 3. (a) STATE RESPONSIBILITIES.—Each State shall be responsible for providing, either by itself or in cooperation with other States, for the disposal of—

"(1) low-level radioactive waste generated within the State (other than by the Federal Government) that consists of or contains class A, B, or C, radioactive waste as defined by section 61.55 of title 10, Code of Federal Regulations, as in effect on December 27, 1982;

"(2) low-level radioactive waste described in paragraph (1) that is generated by the Federal Government, except that any State shall not be required to, but may, provide for disposal of any such waste that results from an activity of the Secretary or the research, development, testing, or production of any atomic weapon; and

"(3) low-level radioactive waste described in paragaphs (1) and (2) and required to be accepted for disposal under section 5.

"(b) FEDERAL RESPONSIBLITIES.—(1) The Federal Government shall be responsible for ensuring the safe disposal of—"(A) high-level readioactive waste and spent nuclear fuel, in accordance with the provisions of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10101 et seq.);

"(B) low-level radioactive waste generated as a result of any activity of the Secretary; and

"(C) low-level radioactive waste generated as a result of any research, development, testing, or production of any atomic weapon.

"(2)(A) Not later than the expiration of the 12-month period following the date of the enactment of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1985, the Secretary shall submit to the Congress a comprehensive report setting forth recommendations of the Secretary to ensure the safe disposal of any radioactive waste for which—

"(i) disposal is not provided under other Federal law in effect on the date of the enactment of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1985; and

"(ii) the Secretary determines that disposal as low-level waste may not be viable.

"(B) Such report shall include—

"(i) an identification of the radioactive waste for which neither the Federal Government nor the States have responsibility under existing Federal law, except for byproduct material as defined in section 11 e. (2) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2014(e)(2)), as in effect on January 1, 1985;

"(ii) an identification of Federal and non-Federal options for disposal of such radioactive waste;

"(iii) a description of the actions proposed to ensure the safe disposal of such radioactive waste;

"(iv) a description of the projected costs of taking such actions; and

"(v) recommendations of the Secretary for resolving the issues related to disposal of radioactive waste described in subparagraph (A).

"REGIONAL COMPACTS FOR DISPOSAL OF LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE

"SEC. 4. (a) IN GENERAL.—(1) It is the policy of the Federal Government that the responsibilities of the States under section 3 for the disposal of low-level radioactive waste can be most safely and efficiently managed on a regional basis.

"(2) To carry out the policy set forth in paragraph (1), the States may enter into such compacts as may be necessary to provide for the establishment and operation of regional disposal facilities for low-level radioactive waste.

"(b) APPLICABILITY TO FEDERAL ACTIVITIES.—(1)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), no compact or action taken under a compact shall be applicable to the transportation, management, or disposal of low-level radioactive waste generated by activities of the Secretary.

"(B) Low-level radioactive waste generated by the Federal Government that is disposed of a regional disposal facility or disposal facility within a State which is not a member of a compact shall be subject to the same conditions, regulations, requirements, fees, taxes, and surcharges imposed by the compact commission, and by the State in which such facility is located, in the same manner and to the same extent as any low-level radioactive waste not generated by the Federal Government.

"(2) Any low-level radioactive waste disposal facility established or operated exclusively for the disposal of low-level radioactive waste produced by the Federal Government shall not be subject to any compact or any action taken under a compact.

"(3) Nothing contained in this Act or any compact may be construed to confer any new authority on any compact commission or State—

"(A) to regulate the packaging or transportation of low-level radioactive waste in a manner inconsistent with the regulations of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission or the Department of Transportation;

"(B) to regulate health, safety, or environmental hazards from source material, byproduct material, or special nuclear material;

"(C) to inspect the facilities of licensees of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission;

"(D) to inspect security areas or operations at the site of the generation of any low-level radioactive waste by the Federal Government, or to inspect classified information related to such areas or operations; or

"(E) to require indemnification beyond the provisions of chapter 171 of title 28, United States Code (commonly referred to as the Federal Tort Claims Act), or section 170 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2210) (commonly referred to as the Price-Anderson Act), whichever is applicable.

"(4) Nothing contained in this Act or any compact may be construed to limit the applicability of any Federal law or to diminish or otherwise impair the jurisdiction of the Federal agency, including the regulatory responsibilities of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Department of Transportation.

"(c) EFFECTIVENESS OF AUTHORITIES UNDER COMPACT.—(1) Except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3), each compact shall take effect in accordance with the provisions of the compact.

"(2) Any authorty in a compact to restrict the use of the regional disposal facilities under the compact to the disposal of low-level radioactive waste generated within the compact region shall not take effect before each of the following occurs:

"(A) January 1, 1986; and

"(B) the Congress by law consents to the compact.

"(3) Any authority in a compact to restrict low-level radioactive waste generated within the compact region from being transported or disposed of outside the compact region shall not take effect before the Congress has by law consented to the compact.

"(d) CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW.—Each compact shall provide that every 5 years after the compact has taken effect the Congress may by law withdraw its consent.

"LIMITED AVAILABILITY OF CERTAIN REGIONAL DISPOSAL FACILITIES DURING TRANSITION AND LICENSING PERIODS

"SEC. 5. (a) AVAILABILITY OF DISPOSAL CAPACITY.—(1) Subject to the provisions of subsections (b) through (k), each State in which there is located a regional disposal facility referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) of subsection (b) shall make disposal capacity available for low-level radioactive waste generated by pressurized-water and boiling-water commercial nuclear power reactors in accordance with the allocations established in subsections (c) and (e).

"(2) Subject to the provisions of subsections (b) through (k), each State in which there is located a regional disposal facility referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) of subsection (b) shall make disposal capacity available for low-level radioactive waste generated by any source not referred to in paragraph (1).

"(3) Before the expiration of the 3-month period following the date of the enactment of the low-level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1985, the 3 States in which there is located a regional disposal facility referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) of subsection (b) shall enter into an agreement with each other to establish which disposal facility shall accept low-level radioactive waste from which generators of such waste. Under such agreement such States—

"(A) may assign generators to such regional disposal facilities individually, region-by-region, or by any other method such States determine to be appropriate; and

"(B) shall provide a method for assigning disposal capacity to any generator of low-level radioactive waste not specifically provided for in such agreement.

"(4) Such States shall submit the agreement entered into under paragraph (3) to the compact commission for each sited compact region for such approval as may be required under the terms of the respective compacts for the disposal of waste generated outside such compact region at the regional disposal facility located in such State.

"(5) The agreement entered into under paragraph (3) shall not be required to receive any additional consent of the Congress.

"(6) The allocation provisions of this section shall not affect the distribution of low-level radioactive waste before January 1, 1986, or 30 days after the States referred to in paragraph (2) enter into the agreement referred to in paragraph (3), whichever is later.

"(7) No provision of this section shall be construed to obligate any disposal facility or State referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) of subsection (b) to accept low-level radioactive waste from any source in the event that any such facility ceases operation.

"(b) LIMITATIONS.—The availability of disposal capacity for low-level radioactive waste from any source under subsection (a) shall be subject to the following limitations:

"(1) The regional disposal facility located at Barnwell, in the State of South Carolina, shall not be required to dispose of more than a total of 8,400,000 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste during the 7-year period beginning January 1, 1986, and ending December 31, 1992 (as based on an average annual volume of 1,200,000 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste).

"(2) The regional disposal facility located at Richland, in the State of Washington, shall not be required to dispose of more than a total of 9,800,000 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste during the 7-year period beginning January 1, 1986, and ending December 31, 1992 (as based on an average annual volume of 1,400,000 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste).

"(3) The regional disposal facility located at Beatty, in the State of Nevada, shall not be required to dispose of more than a total of 1,400,000 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste during the 7-year period beginning January 1, 1986, and ending December 31, 1992 (as based on an average annual volume of 200,000 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste).

"(c) UTILITY ALLOCATIONS DURING THE 4-YEAR TRANSITION PERIOD.—(1) Each commercial nuclear power reactor licensed to operate at full power before September 1, 1984, and in operation for not less than any 15-month period beginning on or after October 1, 1984, shall be allocated the following amount of disposal capacity available under subsection (b) for the 4-year period beginning January 1, 1986, and ending December 31, 1989:

"(A) Each pressurized-water reactor within a sited compact region shall be allocated 49,308 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(B) Each pressurized-water reactor, other than those referred to in subparagraph (A), shall be allocated 41,832 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(C) Each boiling-water reactor within a sited compact region shall be allocated 110,400 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(D) Each boiling-water reactor, other than those referred to in subparagraph (C), shall be allocated 93,662 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(2) Each commercial nuclear power reactor licensed to operate at full power after September 1, 1984, and in operation for not less than any 15-month period after issuance of the full power license beginning on or after October 1, 1984, shall be allocated the following amount of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity available under subsection (b) for each month of operation during the 4-year period beginning January 1, 1986, and ending December 31, 1989 beginning with the sixteenth month following the date such reactor received it's full power operating license:

"(A) Each pressurized-water reactor within a sited compact region shall be allocated 1,027 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(B) Each pressurized-water reactor, other than those referred to in subparagraph (A), shall be allocated 871 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(C) Each boiling-water reactor within a sited compact region shall be allocated 2,300 cubic feet of low-level capacity.

"(D) Each boiling-water reactor, other than those referred to in subparagraph (C), shall be allocated 1,952 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(3) For the purposes of this subsection and subsection (e), the term 'month of operation' shall include the entire sixteenth calendar month after a commercial nuclear power reactor receives its full power operating license and any month during which a commercial nuclear power reactor does not produce power by reason of ordinary maintenance.

"(4) The allocations of disposal capacity made under this subsection for any commercial nuclear power reactor may be used by the owner or operator of such reactor at any time during the 4-year period involved.

The owner or operator of more than one commercial nuclear power reactor may apportion the aggregate of its allocations under this subsection among such reactors as it determines to be appropriate.

"(5) Any State may, in accordance with its compact accept low-level radioactive waste in excess of the allocations described in this subsection * * * subsection (b), a State shall not reduce any allocation provided in this subsection.

"(d) REQUIREMENTS FOR ACCESS TO REGIONAL DISPOSAL FACILITIES.—(1) Each non-sited compact region, or State that is not a member of a compact region and does not have an operating regional disposal facility, shall comply with the following requirements:

"(A) By July 1, 1986, each such nonmember State shall ratify compact legislation or enact legislation indicating its intent to develop a site for the location of a low-level radioactive waste disposal facility within such State.

"(B) By January 1, 1988—

"(i) each non-sited compact region shall identify the State in which its low-level radioactive waste disposal facility is to be located and each compact region or the State in which its low-level radioactive waste disposal facility is to be located shall develop a siting plan for such facility and delegate authority to implement such plan; and

"(ii) each non-member State shall develop a siting plan for a low-level radioactive waste disposal facility and delegate authority to implement such plan.

"(C) By January 1, 1990, a complete application (as determined by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission or appropriate agency of an agreement State) shall be filed for a license to operate a low-level radioactive waste disposal facility within each non-sited compact region or within each non-member State.

"(2) If any non-sited compact region or non-member State fails to comply with any requirement of paragraph (1), any low-level radioactive waste generated within such non-sited compact region or non-member State may be denied access to the regional disposal facilities referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) of subsection (b).

"(3) Any access to a regional disposal facility that is suspended under paragraph (2) shall be restored after the non-sited compact region or non-member State involved complies with such requirement.

"(e) ALLOCATIONS DURING 3-YEAR LICENSING AND CONSTRUCTION PERIOD.—(1) During the 3-year period beginning January 1, 1990, and ending December 31, 1992, each generator of low-level radioactive waste located within a non-sited compact region, or within a State that is not a member of a compact region, shall be provided the disposal capacity described in paragraphs (2) and (3) for such low-level radioactive waste in the regional disposal facilities referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) of subsection (b) if a complete application (as determined by the nuclear Regulatory Commission or appropriate agency of an agreement State) has been filed for a license to operate a low-level radioactive waste disposal facility within such non-sited compact region or nonmember State.

"(2) Each commercial nuclear power reactor allocated disposal capacity under subsection (c) or licensed to operate at full power after September 1, 1988, and in operation for not less than any 15-month period beginning on or after October 1, 1988, shall be allocated the following amount of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity available under subsection (b) for each month of operation during the 3-year period referred to in paragraph (1), subject to the limitations in paragraph (4):

"(A) Each pressurized-water reactor within a sited compact region shall be alocated 934 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(B) Each pressurized-water reactor, other than those referred to in subparagraph (A), shall be allocated 685 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(C) Each boiling-water reactor within a sited compact region shall be allocated 2,091 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(D) Each boiling-water reactor, other than those referred to in subparagraph (C), shall be allocated 1,533 cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste disposal capacity.

"(3) In addition to the allocation described in paragraph (2), any such generator may use any capacity allocated to it under subsection (C) * * * December 31, 1989.

"(4) Commercial nuclear power reactors located within a non-sited compact region, or within a State that is not a member of a compact region, Shall not receive an allocation under paragraph (2) for any month before such compact region or State complies with the requirements of paragraph (1).

"(5) The allocations of disposal capacity made under this subsection for any commercial nuclear power reactor may be used by the owner or operator of such reactor at any time during the 3-year period involved. The owner or operator of more than 1 commercial nuclear power reactor may apportion the aggregate of its allocations under this subsection among such reactors as it determines to be appropriate.

"(6) A State may, at its discretion, accept waste in excess of the allocations described in this subsection. Notwithstanding subsection (b), a State shall not reduce any allocation provided in this subsection.

"(f) Inter-Reactor Assignment of Disposal Capacity Allocations.—Any commercial nuclear power reactor whose access to a regional disposal facility has not been suspended for noncompliance with the requirements of subsection (d) may assign any disposal capacity allocated to it under subsection (c) or (e) to any other commercial nuclear power reactor whose access to a regional disposal facility has not been suspended for noncompliance with the requirements of subsection (d). Such assignment—

"(1) shall be in writing (a copy of which shall be delivered to the affected compact commission and State and accompanied by the assignor's unconditional written waiver of any right to the allocation being assigned, within 10 days of the execution of such an assignment and at least 3 days prior the delivery of any low-level radioactive waste pursuant to the assignment);

"(2) may be made for valuable consideration;

"(3) shall be invalid if the low-level radioactive waste to be disposed of under such assignment is not—

"(A) of the same general type (as determined by the appropriate regulatory agency of the State in which the recipient regional disposal facility is located) as the low-level radioactive waste originally allocated disposal capacity under the interstate agreement under subsection (a)(3); and

"(B) delivered to the disposal facility to which the low-level radioactive waste referred to in subparagraph (A) was assigned under such interstate agreement; and

"(4) shall be nullified by any event rendering either the assignor-reactor or the assignee-reactor ineligible for an allocation under subsection (c) or (e) of subject to the denial of access to a regional disposal facility under subsection (d).

"(g) Additional Allocation for Unusual Volumes of Low-Level Radioactive Waste.—(1) In January of each year from 1987 through 1992, inclusive, the 3 States in which there are located the regional disposal facilities referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) of subsection (b) shall (in consultation with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and operators of commercial nuclear power reactors) enter into an agreement with each other for the allocation of disposal capacity in addition to that allocated under subsections (c) and (e) among commercial nuclear power reactors whose allocation under such subsections has been inadequate over the preceding 12 months due to—

"(A) increased waste volume resulting from operation of a reactor without discharge of radioactively contaminated water; or

"(B) necessary, but irregular, maintenance or safety procedures.

"(2) No low-level radioactive waste shall be accepted for disposal under paragraph (1) unless such waste has been reduced in volume to the maximum extent technologically feasible.

"(3) The total amount allocated under this subsection during the period beginning January 1, 1987, and ending December 31, 1992, shall not exceed 794,792 cubic feet.

"(4) The agreement entered into under paragraph (1) shall not be required to receive any additional consent of the Congress.

"(h) EMERGENCY EXEMPTION.—(1) If the Governor of any State (or, for any State without a Governor, the chief executive officer of the State) determines that there exists a threat to the public health and safety that may be mitigated by exempting the disposal of any low-level radioactive waste generated in that State from any limitation, allocation, or requirements established in this section, such Governor (or chief executive officer) shall notify the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Governor of the State in which any applicable regional disposal facility is located of such need for an exemption.

"(2) Within 30 days of the receipt of notification under paragraph (1), the Nuclear Regulatory Commission shall determine whether there exists a threat to the public health and safety that may be mitigated by exempting the disposal of any low-level radioactive waste from any limitation, allocation, or requirement established in subsections (a) through (e).

"(3) The Governor of the State in which the applicable regional disposal facility is located shall decide whether to grant the exemption requested and, in making such decision, may take the determination of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission into consideration.

"(4) Any agreement under section 274 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2021) shall not be applicable to the determination of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission under paragraph (2).

"(i) SURCHARGES.—The disposal of any low-level radioactive waste under this section (other than low-level radioactive waste generated in a sited compact region) may be charged a surcharge by the State in which the applicable regional disposal facility is located, in addition to the fees generally applicable for disposal of low-level radioactive waste in the regional disposal facility involved. Such surcharge shall not exceed—

"(1) in 1986 and 1987, $10.00 per cubic foot of low-level radioactive waste;

"(2) in 1988 and 1989, $20.00 per cubic foot of low-level radioactive waste; and

"(3) in 1990, 1991, and 1992, $40.00 per cubic foot of low-level radioactive waste.

"(j) ADMINISTRATION.—Each State in which a regional disposal facility referred to in paragraphs (1) through (3) of subsection (b) is located shall have authority—

"(1) to monitor compliance with the limitations, allocations, and requirements established in this section; and

"(2) to deny access to any low-level radioactive waste disposal facilities within is borders to any low-level radioactive waste that—

"(A) is assigned to a facility in another State under the agreement referred to in subsection (a)(3);

"(B) is in excess of the limitations or allocations established in this section; or

"(C) is not required to be accepted due to the failure of a compact region or State to comply with the requirements of subsection (d)(1).

"(k) NONDISCRIMINATION.—Except as provided in subsections (b) through (j), low-level radioactive waste disposed of under this section shall be subject without discrimination to all applicable legal requirements of the compact region and State in which the disposal facility is located as if such low-level radioactive waste were generated within such compact region.

"ASSURANCE OF FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY

"SEC. 6. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission and each agreement State shall ensure that each low-level radioactive waste disposal facility licensed by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission or by such agreement State is covered by bonding or other financial assurance (from the commencement of operations through decommissioning and long-term care) that provides that all financial requirements of operating a safe and environmentally sound facility will be complied with, including any requirement for site closure and decommissioning or corrective action prior to the expected time of license termination due to economic or health and safety reasons.

"FINANCIAL AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 7. The Secretary shall, to the extent provided in appropriation Acts, provide to compact regions, States that are members of compacts, and States that are not members of compacts, that are determined by the Secretary to require assistance for purposes of carrying out this Act—

"(1) continuing technical assistance to assist them in fulfilling their responsibilities under this Act; and

"(2) at least through the end of fiscal year 1992, financial assistance to assist them in fulfilling their resonsibilities under this Act.

"CONSULTATION AND COOPERATION OF FEDERAL AGENCIES

"SEC. 8. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Secretary of Energy, the Secretary of Transportation, and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall consult and cooperate with compact commissions and States in carrying out the provisions of this Act.

"PERIODIC REPORT OF SECRETARY

"SEC. 9. (a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall, not later than the expiration of each 5-year period following the date of the enactment of the Low-Level Radioactive Policy Amendments Act of 1985, prepare and submit to the Congress a comprehensive report regarding the operation of the national system for the management and disposal of low-level radioactive waste. Such report shall include an evaluation of the use by Federal agencies of each low-level radioactive waste disposal facility established under a compact or by a State, and an estimate of the anticipated use of each facility by all generators of low-level radioactive waste.

"(b) CONSULTATION REQUIREMENTS.—Before preparing the report required in subsection (a), the Secretary shall consult with each compact commission, the chief executive officer of each State, the operators of low-level radioactive waste disposal facilities licensed by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission or an agreement State, the principal generators of low-level radioactive waste, and the transporters of low-level radioactive waste.

"RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE COMMISSION AND AGREEMENT STATES

"SEC. 10. In order to ensure the timely development of new disposal facilities, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission or, as appropriate, Agreement State shall consider an application for a disposal facility license in accordance with the laws applicable to such application except that:

"(1) the Commission or Agreement State shall issue a final decision approving or disapproving the issuance of the license no later than 18 months after submission of the application; and

"(2) construction of the disposal facility may commence prior to issuance of the license.

"ALTERNATIVE DISPOSAL METHODS

"SEC. 11. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission shall within 12 months of the date of the enactment of this Act, by rule, promulgate criteria for the licensing of low-level radioactive waste disposal facilities that use disposal methods other than shallow land burial.

"RECLASSIFICATION OF CERTAIN RADIOACTIVE WASTE

"SEC. 12. Not later than December 31, 1986, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, pursuant to authority under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2011 et seq.) shall, by rule, promulgate minimal standards for the disposal of certain material classified as low-level radioactive waste. Such standards shall identify the low-level radioactive waste that is not required to be disposed of in a licensed low-level radioactive waste disposal facility due to its low radioactive material content and shall prescribe, as necessary, technical requirements and criteria governing the disposal of such waste to protect the public health and safety.".

"EFFECTIVE DATE

"SEC. 13. (a) EFFECTIVE DATE.—Sections 2 through 12 of this Act, as added by the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1985, shall take effect on the date on which the Congress consents to the last of the compacts listed in subsection (b) having previously consented to the other five.

"(b) COMPACTS.—The compacts subject to consent as provided in subsection (a) are the—

"(1) Southeast Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Management Compact;

"(2) Northwest Interstate Compact on Low-Level Radioactive Waste Management;

"(3) Rocky Mountain Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact;

"(4) Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact;

"(5) Central Midwest Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact; and

"(6) Midwest Interstate Compact on Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact.".

CIVIL RIGHTS REMEDIES EQUALIZATION ACT

CRANSTON (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 584

(Ordered referred to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.)

Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. KERRY, and Mr. RIEGLE) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (S. 1579) to clarify that the remedies available for the enforcement of certain civil rights statutes are applicable to the State; as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: That this Act may be cited as the "Civil Rights Remedies Equalization Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Except as otherwise expressly provided by Federal statute, all Federal remedies available for a violation of section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, or the provisions of any other Federal statute prohibiting discrimination by recipients of Federal financial assistance are applicable with respect to a State to the same extent as those remedies are applicable with respect to any public or private entity other than a State.

SEC. 3. The provisions of section 2 are effective with respect to a remedy as of the date on which the statutory provisions under which the remedy is sought became effective.

PRIMARY CARE INCENTIVES

HATCH (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 585

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. QUAYLE, and Mr. KENNEDY) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them; as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

INCENTIVES UNDER THE MEDICARE REIMBURSEMENT SYSTEM FOR GRADUATE MEDICAL EDUCATION IN PRIMARY CARE SPECIALTIES

SEC. . (a) Title XVIII of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"INCENTIVES FOR GRADUATE MEDICAL EDUCATION IN PRIMARY CARE SPECIALITIES

"SEC. 1890. (a) The Secretary shall pay an incentive payment for each fiscal year to each hospital which, for such fiscal year—

"(1) complies with—

"(A) the minimum percentage for such fiscal year established by the Secretary under section 799B of the Public Health Service Act; and

"(B) subsections (a) and (b) of section 799C of such Act; or

"(2) makes significant progress toward compliance described in subparagraphs (A) and (B) of paragraph (1).

"(b)(1) The amount of the incentive payment for a fiscal year for a hospital which meets the requirements of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) shall be equal to 10 percent of the amount of the payment under this title to such hospital for such fiscal year for reimbursement of direct costs of approved educational activities.

"(2) The amount of the incentive payment for a hospital which meets the requirements of paragraph (2) of subsection (a) shall be a portion of the incentive payment which would be paid under paragraph (1). Such portion shall be determined by the Secretary under regulations, and shall reflect the progress made by the hospital toward achieving full compliance described in paragraph (1) of subsection (a).

"(c) The Secretary shall reduce total payments to hospitals under this title for each fiscal year by a total amount equal to the total amount of the incentive payments made under this section for such fiscal year.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to fiscal years beginning with the first fiscal year for which the registry under section 799A of the Public Health Service Act is in effect.

COMPACT OF FREE ASSOCIATION

HOLLINGS AMENDMENT NO. 586

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. HOLLINGS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 187) to approve the "Compact of Free Association", and for other purposes; as follows:

At the appropriate place insert the following:

SEC. 2. POLICY.

The policy of this Act is—

(1) to prevent further disruption of the United States textiles and textile products markets, damage to United States textile and apparel manufacturers, and loss of jobs by United States workers by providing for orderly and non-disruptive growth of imports of textiles and textile products; and

(2) to implement the objectives of the Multi-Fiber Arrangement by requiring the effective enforcement of import levels of textiles and textile products contemplated by the Multi-Fiber Arrangement.

SEC. 3. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) the United States and most major textile producing countries are parties to the Multi-Fiber Arrangement, the purpose of which is to ensure the orderly growth of imports of textiles and textile products and to avoid disruption of the markets for textiles and textile products in importing nations;

(2) the Multi-Fiber Arrangement, which first entered into force on January 1, 1974, and which was most recently extended in December, 1981, through July 1986, contemplates a 6 percent annual rate of growth for imports for most exporting countries and provides for a lower rate of growth for imports from major exporting countries;

(3) since 1980, the objective of orderly growth of imports of textiles and textile products provided for in the Multi-Fiber Arrangement has not been achieved; from 1981 through 1984 imports of textiles and textile products into the United States have grown at an annual rate of 19 percent, far in excess of the 1 percent growth rate of the United States market for textiles and textile products during the same period and far in excess of the annual rate of import growth of less than 2 percent that prevailed during the period 1974 through 1980;

(4) the disruptive surge in imports of textiles and textile products which occurred from 1981 through 1984 resulted from the failure of the United States to enforce adequately its rights under the Multi-Fiber Arrangement and to extend coverage of the Multi-Fiber Arrangement to imports made of competing fibers;

(5) imports growth of apparel products has substantially outstripped the growth of the domestic market so that import penetration of the domestic market has more than doubled in the last 6 years, reaching a level of 50 percent in 1984;

(6) based on a nationwide audit of major retail outlets, the import penetration of such major items of apparel as trousers, blouses, shirts, suits, skirts and sweaters exceeds 50 percent of domestic consumption;

(7) since the most recent extension of the Multi-Fiber Arrangement, certain exporting countries have sharply increased their exports of textiles and textile products made in whole or in part from fibers not subject to the Multi-Fiber Arrangement with the effect of circumventing restraints agreed to under the Arrangement; the increased imports of these textiles and textile products have caused disruption of the United States market for textiles and textile products and have seriously undercut the effectiveness of the Multi-Fiber Arrangement;

(8) imports of textiles and textile products into the United States are predominantly the product of major exporting countries, with 5 large exporting countries now accounting for more than 50 percent of all imports of textiles and textile products;

(9) the domination of import trade by producers in the major exporting countries has limited participation in the United States market by other exporting countries, many of which share important trade and other national interests, and encourage mutually beneficial trade and investment, with the United States;

(10) a change in United States textile trade policy to afford the smaller exporting countries and countries in the Caribbean region a relatively greater share of imports of textiles and textile products would promote the national economic interests of the United States;

(11) the textile and apparel trade deficit of the United States was more than $16,200,000,000 in 1984, an increase of 53 percent over 1983, and accounted for 13 percent of the nation's overall merchandise trade deficit;

(12) the current level of imports of textiles and textile products, 9,800,000,000 square yard equivalents in 1984, represents over 1,000,000 job opportunities lost to United States workers;

(13) imported textiles and textile products now account for 38 percent (the equivalent of 3.2 million bales of cotton) of the annual cotton consumption in the United States; only one of five of the bale equivalents included in imported textiles and textile products is grown in the United States; the result of the massive increases in cotton textile and apparel imports has been a declining market share for, and a $1 billion loss to, domestic cotton producers in 1983 alone, which was only partially offset by Federal cotton program benefits; another result is that U.S. cotton producers, who are spending about $20 million annually in research and promotion efforts, have built markets not for themselves but for foreign growers;

(14) imports of wool products have doubled since 1980, creating major disruptions among domestic wool products producers and seriously depressing the price of United States produced raw wool; the United States has long recognized that imports of wool products pose particular problems for the wool products industries in the United States and has therefore adopted a policy of 1 percent import growth on wool products; this policy has been acknowledged in our bilateral agreements under the Multi-Fiber Arrangement and has been reviewed by the Textile Surveillance Body;

(15) as a result of this increased penetration and the very limited growth of the domestic market, the United States companies producing textiles and textile products identical, or similar, to those imported have been seriously damaged, many of them have been forced out of business, many have closed plants or curtailed operations, workers in such companies have lost employment and have been otherwise materially and adversely affected, and serious hardship has been inflicted on hundreds of impacted communities causing a substantial reduction in economic activity and lost revenues to local governments;

(16) the increase in imports and increased import penetration of the United States domestic market have occurred notwithstanding the fact that, through extensive modernization programs and investment in more modern equipment, productivity, as measured by output per man hour, in the textile mill products sector has increased in the last 10 years at the average annual rate of 4.2 percent and in the apparel sector at the average annual rate of 3.4 percent, as compared with the lower productivity growth of all manufacturing in the same period of 1.9 percent;

(17) the factors described above are causing serious damage, or the actual threat thereof, to domestic producers of textiles and textile products; as a result, market disruption exists in the United States requiring the new measures established under this Act;

(18) based on experience during the past ten years and on other factors, the growth of the United States market for textiles and textile products is unlikely to exceed an average annual rate of 1 percent during the next several years;

(19) if the rate of growth of imports of textiles and textile products into the United States that occurred since 1980 continues, plant closings will continue to accelerate, leaving the United Statres market with reduced domestic competition for imported products;

(20) in order to avoid further market disruption and deterioration of the situation confronting the United States industry producing textiles and textile products, which is already seriously damaged, it is essential—

(A) to require the establishment of import levels for textiles and textile products supplied by major exporting countries that reflect—

(i) the import level that would have occurred had imports from these countries grown since 1980 by the 6 percent or lower annual growth rate contemplated by the Multi-Fiber Arrangement, or 1 percent in the case of wool products, or

(ii) the actual import level resulting from restraints under a bilateral agreement with the United States providing for an annual growth rate of less than 6 percent.

whichever is the lesser,

(B) to require the establishment of import levels for textiles and textile products supplied by smaller exporting countries that provide a significant increase in their market shares to meet their development needs and to permit future growth in such shares consistent with the Multi-Fiber Arrangement, and

(C) to limit the future growth rate of imports of textiles and textile products into the United States to levels which reflect orderly growth as provided for in the Multi-Fiber Arrangement and the most recent Protocol extending the Multi-Fiber Arrangement;

(21) the establishment of import levels, and limitation of future import growth to levels, that reflect effective enforcement of the Multi-Fiber Arrangement and that also reflect the expected growth rate of the United States market for textiles and textile products will fulfill announced policy objectives of the United States regarding trade in textiles and apparel;

(22) as the Department of Defense has long recognized, a strong, viable and efficient domestic textile products industry is essential in order to avoid impairment of the national security of the United States;

(23) the developments that have led to the sharp increase in imports of textiles and textile products since 1980 may not have been foreseeable; nevertheless, the rights of the United States under international agreements should have been invoked in order to prevent increased quantities of textiles and textile products from being imported under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious damage to domestic producers of textiles and textile products in the United States; and

(24) the sharp increase in imports of textiles and textile products since 1980, and the effect of this increase on the United States textile and apparel industry and its workers, constitutes exceptional circumstances within the meaning of the Multi-Fiber Arrangement and its Protocol.

SEC. 4. AMENDMENTS TO AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1956.

Title II of the Agricultural Act of 1956 is amended by inserting immediately after section 204 of such title the folllowing new sections:

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 204A. For purposes of sections 204B through 204D of this Act—

"(1) The term 'textiles and textile products' includes, but is not limited to, all man-made fibers, tops, yarns, piece goods, made-up articles, garments, and other textile manufactured products (which derive their chief characteristics from their textile components) made in whole or in part from any natural or man-made fiber, or blend thereof, that are classified under Schedule 3, part 6 of Schedule 6, parts 1, 4, 5, 7, or 13 of Schedule 7, part 1 of Schedule 8, or part 1 of the Appendix to the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202);

"(2) The term 'category' means, with respect to textiles and textile products imported from each country, each of the following—

"(A) Each category of textiles and textile products idenfitied by 3-digit textile category number in the Department of Commerce publication 'Correlation: Textile and Apparel Categories with Tariff Schedules of the United States Annotated', dated January 1985;

"(B) A category consisting of the man-made fiber articles calssified under subpart E of part 1 of Schedule 3 to the Tariff Schedules of the United States; and

"(C) Each category consisting of each of the following products when, because of any fiber content, that product is not subject to the Multi-Fiber Arrangement:

"(i) yarn,

"(ii) fabric,

"(iii) apparel, and

"(iv) other textile products;

"(3) The term 'import sensitive category' means—

"(A) A category (other than a category applicable to textiles and textile products that are a product of a country in the Caribbean region) for which the ratio of imports to domestic production, as reported in the Department of Commerce publication "U.S. Production, Imports and Import/Production Ratios for Cotton, Wool and Man-Made Fiber Textiles and Apparel", equals or exceeds 40.0 for the preceding calendar year; or

"(B) A category covering wool products;

"(4) The term 'country' means a foreign country (other than Canada and the Member States of the European Economic Community as constituted on January 1, 1985), a foreign territory, or an insular possession of the United States;

"(5) The term 'major exporting country' means a country (other than a country in the Caribbean region) from which the United States imported an annual aggregate quantity of textiles and textile products under all categories that equalled or exceeded 1.25 percent of all textiles and textile products under all categories imported into the United States from all countries and from Canada and the Member States of the European Economic Community during calendar year 1984;

"(6) The term 'country in the Caribbean region' means the United Mexican States and a country eligible for designation as a beneficiary country under section 212 of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act (19 U.S.C. 2702);

"(7) The term 'wool product' means an article containing over 17 percent by weight of wool;

"(8) The term 'exporting country' means a country other than a major exporting country;

"(9) The term 'entered' means entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption in the customs territory of the United States;

"(10) The term 'imported' means entered; and

"(11) The term 'Multi-Fiber Arrangement' means the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles, as extended by the Protocol done at Geneva, December 22, 1981.34

"LIMITS ON TEXTILE AND APPAREL IMPORTS

"SEC. 204B. (a) Notwithstanding section 204 of this Act or any other provision of law, the aggregate quantity of textiles and textile products classified under each category that is entered during calendar year 1985 shall not exceed—

"(1) in the case of textiles and textile products that are a product of a major exporting country, the lesser of an amount equal to 101 percent (A) of the aggregate quantity of such products from such country classified under such category that would have entered during calendar year 1984 if the aggregate quantity of such products from such country classified under such category entered during calendar year 1980 had increased by six percent annually, or 1 percent annually in the case of a category covering a wool product, during calendar years 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, or (B) if the United States has an agreement with such country providing for an annual growth rate for such category of less than six percent, of the aggregate quantity of such products from such country classified under such category that entered during calendar year 1984;

"(2) in the case of textiles and textile products that are a product of an exporting country, an amount equal to the aggregate quantity of such products from such country classified under such category that entered during calendar year 1984, plus an amount equal to (A) fifteen percent of such quantity, in the case of a category that is not an import sensitive category, or (B) one percent, in the case of a category that is an import sensitive category.

For purposes of this section, if during any calendar year after 1984 the United States imports from a country, other than a country in the Caribbean region, that is not a major exporting country an aggregate quantity of textiles and textile products under all categories that equal or exceeds 1.25 percent of all textiles and textile products under all categories imported into the United States from all countries and from Canada and the Member States of the European Economic Community during such calendar year, then such countries shall be considered to be a major exporting country for all succeeding calendar years.

"(b) For calendar years after 1985, the aggregate quantity of textiles and textile products classified under each category that may be entered during each such calendar year shall—

"(1) in the case of such products that are a product of a major exporting country, be increased by an amount equal to one percent of the aggregate quantity that could be entered under such category during the preceding calendar year; and

"(2) in the case of such products that are a product of an exporting country, be increased by an amount equal to—

"(A) in the case of a category (other than an import sensitive category), six percent of the aggregate quantity that could be entered under that category during the preceding calendar year, and

"(B) in the case of an import sensitive category, one percent of the aggregate quantity that could be entered under that category during the preceding calendar year.

"(c) If, under subsection (a) or (b), the aggregate quantity of textiles and textile products from a country that may be entered during a calendar year under a category is—

"(1) less than 1,000,000 square yard equivalents, in the case of a category covering yarn, fabric, made-ups, and miscellaneous products, other than wool products;

"(2) less than 700,000 square yard equivalents, in the case of a category covering apparel, other than wool products apparel; or

"(3) less than 100,000 square yard equivalents, in the case of a category covering wool products, then, notwithstanding subsection (a) or (b), the aggregate quantity of textiles and textile products that may be entered from such country under such category during the calendar year shall be 1,000,000, 700,000 or 100,000 square yard equivalents, respectively. The amount prescribed in the preceding sentence shall be accorded growth subject to the provisions of subsection (b) beginning the first calendar year after the aggregate quantity of imports from such country under such category equals the minimum quantity prescribed under this subsection.

"(d) The Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe such regulations governing the entry, or withdrawal from warehouse, for consumption of textiles and textile products as may be necessary to carry out sections 204A through 204D of this Act.

"IMPORT LICENSING

"SEC. 204C. In order to ensure the equitable and efficient administration of section 204B of this Act, the Secretary of Commerce shall, within six months after the date of enactment of the Agricultural Act of 1956 Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Amendments Act of 1985, establish and administer an import licensing system under which an importer of any textiles and textile products from any country and from Canada and the Member States of the European Economic Community, will be required to present an import permit as a condition of entry. The Secretary shall charge a fee for import licenses in such amount as may be necessary to cover the cost of administration of the system.

"ANNUAL REPORT

"SEC. 204D. Not later than March 15, 1986, and March 15 of each calendar year thereafter, the President shall submit to the Congress a report on the administration of sections 204A through 204C of this Act during the preceding calendar year. Such report shall include detailed information about the implementation and operation of the limitations established under section 204B. All departments and agencies shall cooperate in preparation of this report as requested by the President."

SEC. 5. EFFECTIVE DATE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The amendments made by section 5 of this Act shall apply to textiles and textile products entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption after ——— —, 1985.

(b) CALENDAR YEARS 1985 AND 1986.—The Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe by regulation the aggregate quantity, if any, of textiles and textile products that may be entered under section 204B(a) or (c) of the Agricultural Act of 1956 as amended by this Act from each country under each category during the period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act and ending December 31, 1985. Notwithstanding subsection (a), to the extent that the aggregate quantity of imports of textiles and textile products from a country under a category entered after December 31, 1984, and before the date of enactment of this Act exceeds the quantity permitted entry for such country and such category during calendar year 1985 under section 204B(a) or (c) of such Act, the limit that would otherwise apply under section 204(b) for such category for such country for calendar year 1986 shall be reduced by the amount of such excess quantity.

EXCLUSION OF CERTAIN NET CAPITAL GAIN OF INSOLVENT TAXPAYERS

GRASSLEY (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 587

(Ordered referred to the Committee on Finance.)

Mr. GRASSLEY (for himself, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. ZORINSKY) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (S. 418) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to exclude certain net capital gain of insolvent taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax; as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SECTION 1. CERTAIN NET CAPITAL GAIN OF INSOLVENT TAXPAYERS EXCLUDED FROM ALTERNATIVE MINIMUM TAX.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (9) of section 57(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to items of preference) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(E) EXCEPTION FOR GAIN OR LOSS FROM CERTAIN TRADE OR BUSINESS PROPERTY.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), in the case of property used in the trade or business of the taxpayer, gain or loss from the transfer of such property to a creditor in cancellation of a debt or from the sale or exchange of such property under threat of foreclosure shall not be taken into account in computing net capital gain if—

"(i) the taxpayer is insolvent (as defined in section 108(d)(3)) as of the time of such transfer or sale or exchange, or

"(ii) the taxpayer is, during periods immediately preceding such transfer or sale or exchange, generally not paying such taxpayer's debts as such debts become due (determined in a manner similar to the manner under section 303(h) of title 11).".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982.

WESTWAY HIGHWAY PROJECT

LAUTENBERG (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 588

(Ordered referred to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.)

Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. HUMPHREY) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 826) to direct the Secretary of Transportation not to expend or obligate any Federal funds for design and construction of the westway landfill in New York City, NY; as follows:

On page 3, after line 20, add the following:

SEC. 4. SUBSTITUTION PROJECTS.

Subsection (e) of section 103 of title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(10)(A) Notwithstanding paragraph (4) and any other provision of law, the Secretary shall withdraw approval of that portion of Interstate Highway 478 located in the State of New York that is know as 'Westway' if—

"(i) the Governor of New York and the appropriate officials of the local governments which are to be served by such portion of Interstate Highway 478 request the Secretary to withdraw such approval, and

"(ii) the Governor of New York provides assurance that the State of New York does not intend to construct a toll road in the traffic corridor that would be served by such portion of interstate Highway 478.

"(B)(i) Subject to the fiscal year limitation imposed by clause (ii), the Secretary is authorized to incur obligations for the Federal share of substitute highway or mass transit projects approved under this paragraph in an aggregate amount equal to the amount approved by law as the 1983 cost estimate of the portion of Interstate Highway 478 for which approval is withdrawn under subparagraph (A).

"(ii) There are authorized to be appropriated out of the Highway Trust Fund for the fiscal year in which approval of the portion of Interstate Highway 478 described in subparagraph (A) is withdrawn by the Secretary, and for each fiscal year thereafter, $220,000,000, for the purpose of paying the Federal share of substitute highway or mass transit projects approved under this paragraph. Such sums shall remain available until expended. The aggregate amount authorized under this clause shall not exceed the aggregate amount of obligations the Secretary is authorized to incur under clause (i).

"(iii) Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(I) the provisions of section 104 of the Highway Improvement Act of 1982 and of any other law imposing a limitation on obligations incurred for highway or mass transit projects shall not apply to obligations incurred with respect to any substitute highway or mass transit project approved under this paragraph, and

"(II) such obligations shall not be taken into account under section 104 of such Act or under such other law, unless such other law specifically limits the applicability of this clause.

"(C)(i) A substitute highway or mass transit project may be eligible for Federal assistance under subparagraph (B) only if such project has been approved by the Secretary in accordance with such procedures as the Secretary may prescribe.

"(ii) The approval of the Secretary under this paragraph of the plans, specifications, and estimates for any substitute highway or mass transit project shall be treated as creating a contractual obligation of the United States to pay the Federal share of such project.

"(D) The Federal share of any substitute highway or mass transit project shall be 85 percent of the cost of such project.

"(E)(i) For purposes of this paragragh, the term substitute highway or mass transit project means any project described in clause (ii) which—

"(I) serves the same area that the portion of Interstate Highway 478 described in subparagraph (A) would serve,

"(II) is selected by the appropriate local officials of such area, and

"(III) is submitted by the Governor of New York to the Secretary for approval under this paragraph.

"(ii) The projects referred to in clause (i) are—

"(I) public mass transit projects involving the construction of fixed rail facilities or the purchase of passenger equipment (including rolling stock) for any mode of mass transit, or

"(II) projects authorized under any highway assistance program conducted under this chapter.

"(F) The provisions of paragraph (4) shall not apply with respect to the portion of Interstate Highway 478 described in subparagraph (A).".

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, today I am submitting, along with Senators BRADLEY, HUMPHREY, and PROXMIRE, legislation to facilitate the trade-in of the Westway highway project in New York City. I do not believe that the project, as presently designed, should be built. I do, however, believe that improvements to surface transportation on the West Side of Manhattan and in New York's extensive subway system are vital, not only to New Yorkers, but also to those who live in New Jersey and throughout the region.

To ensure that New York will be able to improve its transportation facilities, I favor a trade-in of the Westway highway project under section 103(e)(4) of the Federal highway statute. New York has until September 30 of this year to declare that they want to trade-in Westway. At present, they cannot build Westway, because they are enjoined from doing so by the U.S. District Court in Manhattan. There are proposals in Congress to stop this project, such as S. 826 introduced by Senator PROXMIRE of which I am a cosponsor. New York is therefore at the 11th hour to consider a trade-in. If they play chicken with the courts and Congress and lose, they stand to lose $1.71 billion in transportation improvement funding. I am offering this legislation to insure that New York will have the resources to make those improvements on a timely basis.

On April 21, I outlined in a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my opposition to the Westway Highway project. Technically, the project is the construction of a 4.2-mile segment of I-478 from Battery Park to 42d Street on the West Side of Manhattan. As of today, the project cost is $2.25 billion, twice as large on a per-mile basis as any other segment in the Nation. The project, referred to as Westway, is designed to tunnel through more than 200 acres of landfill which will fill in the Hudson River. The State of New York is presently in U.S. District Court in New York, which has enjoined the start of the project. At issue is whether the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which issued a construction permit for this project, adequately assessed the environmental damage to the striped bass habitat in the Hudson which will result from Westway's construction.

My opposition to Westway is threefold: its cost to the highway trust fund far exceeds the transportation benefits to be derived from its construction; the benefits are perhaps primarily to real estate creation, an inappropriate use of Federal transportation dollars; and its construction will do permanent and irretrievable damage to a valuable striped bass habitat.

From the perspective of New Jersey, I have never been able to secure assurances from either the Corps of Engineers or the Environmental Protection Agency, that the construction of Westway will not ultimately lead to the curtailment of development of waterfront property in New Jersey.

Mr. President, opposition to the Westway project is not limited to Members of Congress from New Jersey. Given the potential that Westway's construction might lead to curtailment of development along the New Jersey shoreline, we from New Jersey have reason to be concerned. But, Mr. President, opposition to Westway did not originate nor is it limited to New Jersey citizens or legislators. Westway is a matter of national concern.

Earlier this year, the Environment and Public Works Committee reduced the obligation ceiling on all highway projects throughout the Nation. The budget, as passed by the Senate, assumes an obligation ceiling $1.7 billion below current program levels. We took this action to reduce outlays and the Federal deficit.

The Congressional Budget Office has testified before the Environment and Public Works Committee that the highway trust fund will not be able to pay for all the existing authorizations on the books. One way they suggest dealing with this potential crisis is to eliminate segments which are not of national significance. The Federal Highway Administration has determined that Westway is not an essential link in an interconnected system of Federal highways.

Mr. President, Congress passed the Atlantic Striped Bass Conservation Act to conserve the striped bass populations on the Atlantic coast. States have joined together in this conservation effort in the Atlantic States Marine Fisheries Commission. The Commission testified before the Environment and Public Works Committee in opposition to the Westway project. States from Maine to Florida urged the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers not to issue a permit for this project and for the Environmental Protection Agency to veto the permit if it was issued.

Westway is not a local project, nor is it merely a part of some interstate dispute. It is a matter of national concern. Westway is a relic of past transportation planning. It is a product of an era of grand designs and unlimited resources. It is not the era in which we live today.

Mr. President, it is not enough simply to oppose the construction of the Westway project. To do so would ignore the legitimate needs of New York City for better transportation. Hundreds of thousands of New Jersey residents travel into New York City every day to work, shop, recreate or go to school. They know all too well the need for better transportation in New York City.

It would be a tragedy for New York to lose an opportunity to improve its transportation because it played chicken with the Federal courts and the Congress. The legislation I am introducing today addresses the practical issues that arise from a Westway trade-in. I hope that New York will embrace this approach so that the region will get what it wants and needs: better transportation on the West Side of Manhattan.

Mr. President, if Westway was traded in today under current law, the State would be called upon to designate which alternative highway and mass transit projects it wished to construct. The State would be eligible over time for $1.71 billion in interstate transfer highway and mass transit funds. New York would compete for its funding along with the many States still drawing down funds from these two programs.

As a practical matter, the trade-in of Westway would come too late and be too large to be handled easily under current law. Because States receive their formula money through apportionment factors determined by the value of their trade-in versus all others in the country, the trade-in of Westway, which dwarfs all other trade-ins in terms of size, would cause other States to lose money. Funds for Illinois, Maryland, and Rhode Island would, to name just three States, be crowded out in an effort to give New York its just due under the formulas. In addition, the limit on interstate transfer expenditures would stretch out New York's payments well beyond the time that all other trade-ins should be funded.

To address these practical problems, this amendment would provide that the Westway trade-in be treated separately from all other trade-ins. I propose this to assure that States waiting for funding through the trade-in programs will stand a chance of getting their money and do not have to compete with Westway to do so. Funding to liquidate the Westway trade-in would be authorized under a special account. Over 8 years, some $220 million per year would be authorized until no more than $1.71 billion, the trade-in value of Westway under the 1983 interstate cost estimate, was expended. The Westway trade-in therefore would be treated in the manner assigned the Metropolitan Washington, DC, transit system under the Stark-Harris Program.

The $1.71 billion is a lot of money, but it is money New York is entitled to under current law. It is also far less money than the ultimate cost of building Westway. The current cost estimate of $2.25 billion is subject over time to cost overruns. Conservative estimates of its ultimate costs range from $3.5-4 billion. The monetary cost of Westway does not account for the damage done to the environment by its possible construction.

Mr. President, when the Senate takes up S. 826, sponsored by Senator PROXMIRE to prevent construction of the Westway highway, I hope it will act favorably on this amendment to that bill. I believe this amendment can ultimately save New York from a dangerous and counterproductive game of chicken with the Westway tradein deadline. This amendment will prove less costly to the Federal Government, more sensitive to the environment and more is Sync with current transportation needs in New York and throughout the Nation.

Mr. President, the Newark Star-Ledger has provided excellent coverage of the trial conducted by Judge Thomas Griesa in U.S. district court on the matter of the Westway permit. I believe my colleagues will be enlightened by this reporting on a most controversial project. I therefore ask unanimous consent that a series of articles regarding the Westway trial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CORPS, EPA CALLED TO DEFEND WESTWAY

(By J. Scott Orr)

WASHINGTON.—Top officials at the Army Corps of Engineers and the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) told a Senate subcommittee yesterday that they did not feel additional review needed before the Corps issued its decision to allow the filling of 200 acres of the Hudson River for New York's Westway project.

Robert Dawson, acting assistant secretary of the Army for civil works, said in response to a question from Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) that he felt additional review of the decision to permit the Westway landfill would have been duplicative.

"I think a collective judgment was made that, after 10 or 12 years of study and restudy, little if anything would be gained by additional review," Dawson told the Senate subcommittee on environmental pollution chaired by Sen. John Chafee (R-R.I.).

"This issue will rise or fall in the U.S. District Court," Dawson added, referring to hearings before Judge Thomas Griesa in Manhattan to review the propriety of the Corps' decision.

"I remain unconvinced," Lautenberg said, "that EPA, the Corps or other agencies involved based their final decision on sound scientific findings. This is exactly the issue Judge Griesa has before his court, but it he gives the go ahead, Congress is going to have to take a hard look at whether this project should go forward."

The committee was looking at the Army Corps' record of issuing permits for dredging and filing of wetlands under Section 404 of the Clean Water Act. The Army Corps recently issued a permit for a landfill in the Hudson River for Westway, an estimated $6 billion highway planned for Manhattan's West Side.

"Review of the Westway project through the 404 process has been vitally important. It has highlighted significant problems with the project which, unfortunately, have been ignored." Lautenberg said.

"Westway is a prime example of the problem prompting these hearings, erosion of protection afforded by Section 404 of the Clean Water Act," he added.

"The federal agencies with responsibilities under Section 404 have historically opposed this project. Yet, after years of study, in a matter of days, their recommendations were summarily reversed in Washington. To my mind, there has never been a satisfactory explanation," Lautenberg said.

Also testifying yesterday was Josephine Cooper, assistant EPA administrator for external affairs, who said the agency also felt additional study of the proposal was unnecessary.

Lautenberg questioned Cooper on the agency's decision to reject EPA Regional Administrator Chris Daggett's recommendation that the EPA oppose the project. In addition, Lautenberg asked why the EPA did not seek a review of the plans by the Council on Environmental Quality (CEQ), a Reagan Administration advisory panel for environmental policy.

"A referral to the CEQ would very likely not have gained any more information with regard to the Westway situation," Cooper said. She added that Daggett's recommendation was not rejected, so much as "not accepted at headquarters."

Cooper added that the White House was interested in the status of Westway, but that there was no recommendation passed down to the agency.

"There were phone calls, mainly to ask what's going on, what's the status of the decision, where are you in the process, where are the other agencies, but that was the extent of the conversation, finding out what was going on," Cooper said.

She added that it is unlikely that the Administration had any role in recommending action on the issue. "I would have been privy to that kind of information," she said.

Joining Lautenberg in condemning the Corps' handling of wetlands permits was Brian Unger of the Sea Bright-based Clean Ocean Action, who attended the hearing but did not testify.

Unger condemned the Corps and the EPA for allowing the project to go forward without sufficient study of the migratory habits of striped bass, which use the Hudson River as a spawning grounds.

Unger, who has joined in calling on Congress to remove the Corps' authority to issue wetlands permits, said it is "ludicrous" to assume that the one-year study performed in the Hudson River could yield enough information about the bass population to decide on the projects effects on the habitat.

He added that he was not satisfied with Dawson's testimony. "We would certainly recommend that Mr. Dawson's nomination to be assistant Secretary of the Army should be throughly reviewed and question," Unger said after hearing the testimony.

CONFLICTING STATISTICS IRK WESTWAY JUDGE

(By David Schwab)

NEW YORK.—The federal judge who will decide whether to give the go-ahead to the controversial Westway project expressed some frustration yesterday at the differing statistics concerning the highway's potential environmental consequences.

During a hearing to determine whether to allow construction, U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Griesa said statistical measures of the potential harm to striped bass in the Hudson River are "extremely important."

But he expressed frustration at the different estimates presented by the Army Corps of Engineers and by environmental experts testifying for those opposing the project.

"The cross-examination of this witness indicated to me such enormous uncertainty with these figures that what does one do?" the judge asked. "The fish are not there lining up to be counted.

The judge's remarks followed a day of testimony from one environmental expert who was questioned by attorneys for both sides, as well as by the judge. The witness was asked about complex statistical techniques used to estimate the percentage of striped bass that swim in the portion of the Hudson River that would be filled in under the Westway project.

Griesa has been holding hearings to determine whether the most recent environmental impact statement prepared by the Army Corps is adequate. In 1982, he put a halt to the Westway project because the environmental impact statement was insufficient.

The estimated $8 billion Westway project would create a highway and 200 acres of new land for development, by filling in 240 acres of the Hudson River between 42d Street and Battery Park City. The Federal Highway Administration will pay for 90 percent of the project.

A crucial issue in determining whether to permit filling in part of the Hudson is whether the Corps had a "method in determining the percentage of striped bass affected before it approved a permit, Griesa said.

The figure used by the Corps in its final environmental impact statement is lower than initial estimates produced by the Corp's own computer models. The higher figures are cited by opponents of the project.

According to the federal government, 26 to 33 percent of the striped bass would be affected by the Westway project. opponents claim the number affected could be as high as 40 percent.

Yesterday, Douglas Heimbuch, an environmental scientist with Martin Marietta Environmental Systems of Columbia, Md., completed his testimony.

Heimbuch helped to develop a sophisticated statistical model for the Corps to determine the impact of the Westway project on juvenile striped bass. He later resigned his position when a proposed two-year study of the fish population was curtailed.

Testifying on behalf of a coalition of environmentalists opposing Westway, Heimbuch said the Corps has underestimated the percentage of bass that would be affected.

He noted the statistical evidence obtained by the Corps was mixed but added there was no basis for the government to select statistics that showed less of an impact.

Heimbuch also said a two-year study as originally contemplated would have produced more accurate results than the four-month study conducted early last year by the Corps.

Attorneys representing the Corps and the New York State Department of Transportation have argued that the Corps properly rejected initial, higher estimates of the effect on the striped bass population in the Hudson. They said these figures were distorted because of problems with the testing procedures.

For example, the attorneys have argued that the model created by Heimbuch presumed the number of striped bass would remain constant as scientists took their samples. Instead, they said the evidence indicates the number of fish fluctuated during these periods.

Samples were taken from the Hudson River every 10 days during the first four months of last year. They were taken by the New Jersey Marine Science Consortium at various locations from Newark Bay to Peekskill, N.Y. including the site of the proposed Westway project.

WILDLIFE OFFICIAL SAYS WESTWAY COULD THREATEN EXISTENCE OF BASS

(By David Schwab)

NEW YORK.—an official of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service testified yesterday that the agency oposed building Westway because it believed that filing in a portion of the Hudson River could destroy important stocks of striped bass, and possibly endanger the species existence in the region.

Frank DeLuise, assistant chief of the branch of federal permits and licenses said filling in about 240 acres of the river, now a temporary home to a portion of the juvenile striped bass population, could kill off many of the fish.

"The only conclusion we could reach was that the removal of the Westway habitat would have a significant impact on the Hudson River stocks." DeLuise testified during a federal court hearing.

DeLuise, who until last July headed the agency's Long Island regional field office and was responsible for reviewing Westway project matters, rejected the lower estimates of the project's environmental impact prepared by the Army Corps of Engineers.

In February, the Corps issued a permit for the landfill over the objections of the wildlife service, as well as the federal Environmental Protection Agency and the National Marine Fisheries Service.

The objections by the service came in a Jan. 4 letter DeLuise wrote that he said was reviewed by Interior Secretary William Clark. The wildlife service is a part of the Interior Department.

The Corps determined that the landfill would not have a significant environmental impact, saying that most likely only about 26 percent of the juvenile stiped bass population could be found in the Westway area and the fish would move to other areas of the river.

Of this possibility, DeLuise said, "I don't believe the species can absorb that kind of impact."

DeLuise's testimony came during a trial presided over by U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Griesa, who will decide whether to permit construction of Westway to begin.

In 1982, Griesa blocked construction of the massive highway and development project after finding that environmental impact statements were insufficient.

Following additional studies, the Corps issued a new permit and government attorneys asked Griesa to lift his injunction. A coalition of environmentalists, however, filed suit claiming the new permit was improperly issued and that alternatives to Westway have not been considered.

In a related development yesterday, two New York congressmen announced they are organizing a fact-finding trip to Manhattan's West Side for members of the Senate and House committees that are considering legislation that would cut off funding for the controversial project.

The Federal Highway Administration would pay 90 percent of the estimated $6 million project cost.

During the court hearing, DeLuise testified that the impact on the striped bass in the Hudson is particularly significant because the species is threatened throughout the East.

Under direct examinaiton by Mitchell Bernard, an attorney representing Westway opponents, he said the fish have not been able to withstand many natural and manmade obstacles they have faced in recent times.

As a result, there has been a "precipitous decline" in striped bass stocks in the Chesapeake Bay and elsewhere and this "heightens our (the agency's) concern," he said.

DeLuise also testified that the Corps appeared to underestimate the percentage of striped bass that would be affected by the project by overlooking some of the experimental data that suggested otherwise, including that produced by the Corps' own sophisticated model.

The percentage of young bass affected by the landfill is one of the central issues in the trial. The Corps maintains that 26 to 33 percent might be displaced while opponents claim as many as 44 percent would be affected, with many perishing.

"In our estimate they (the Corps) looked at those things that would drive the number down. We were concerned some issues might drive it up," he said.

In addition, he said the agency found several flaws in the limited four-month study the Corps relied on in approving the landfill permit.

DeLuise said the study, shorter than the two-year study initially proposed by the Corps, did not measure the numbers of fish from October through December, when they appeared to be rising.

Without a second year of study, the Corps was unable to determine what might happen to those fish displaced by the landfill, he added. He said he "could not see the logic" in the Corps' assumption that the impact would be minimal.

The conclusions the Corps reached about the impact on the striped bass were also questioned yesterday by a second expert witness called by Westway opponents.

Joseph Mibursky, a University of Maryland professor who served as a consultant to the Corps, said the Corps underestimated the impact and should have conducted further studies.

Meanwhile, the Westway area is to be the destination of a congressional fact-finding trip being organized by New York Reps. Guy Molinari and Ted Weiss of Manhattan.

EPA POINTS TO DANGER OF WESTWAY LANDFILL

(By David Schwab)

NEW YORK—The federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) opposed the Westway project because the agency feared that filling in a portion of the Hudson River would have an "adverse impact" on significant numbers of striped bass and because other alternatives were not considered, an agency official testified yesterday.

Jay Benforado, who was responsible for assisting the EPA in its lengthy review of the controversial project, said the agency disputed the assertions of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. In February the Corps issued a landfill permit over the objections of EPA and two federal wildlife agencies after finding that Westway's environmental impact would be minimal.

During a hearing in federal court, Benforado, who works in the agency's office of research and development in Washington, testified that the Corps "underestimated" Westway's impact on the bass. In addition, the Corps' findings were "not justified by their presentation of the data," he said.

Benforado also said Westway would have an especially significant effect because stocks of striped bass have been declining in virtually all areas of the East Coast except the Hudson River. Westway construction calls for filling in 240 acres of the river that researchers say are frequently used by the fish during the winter months.

Called as a witness by opponents of Westway, Benforado gave testimony that was largely a summary of a Jan. 21 letter he helped to draft. In it, the EPA notified the Corps that there was no legal basis for issuing the landfill permit. The substance of the letter is considered essential to the case being presented by Westway opponents.

His testimony came during a trial presided over by U.S. Circuit Court Judge Thomas Griesa.

Griesa blocked the highway project in 1982 after finding that the environmental impact statements were insufficient.

Based on further studies, the Corps issued a new permit, but efforts to begin construction have been blocked by a coalition of environmentalists. They have filed suit claiming that the new permit was improperly issued and that alternatives to the highway were not considered.

In addition to commenting on the project's effect on the fish, Benforado briefly touched on two themes being presented by Westway opponents.

First, he testified that the EPA considered Westway primarily a transportation project and therefore believed that there were other alternatives that would pose less of a danger to the environment.

He said this was a "common sense" conclusion because 90 percent of the project is being funded by the Federal Highway Administration. The cost of the project is estimated at about $6 billion.

The Corps and Westway proponents, however, have argued that the project provides for more than a new highway and therefore there are no alternatives. They say this is because the landfill would also result in the creation of some 200 acres of real estate for future development.

Second, Benforado testified that he could find little explanation for changes the Corps made in its final environmental impact statement.

In its preliminary draft issued in May 1984, the Corps said Westway would have a "significant adverse impact" on the environment, especially considering the striped bass problem mentioned by the EPA and other agencies. This language was modified and toned down in the final draft issued in November.

Under questioning by Mitchell Bernard, an attorney representing Westway opponents. Benforado said these differences were discussed by EPA officials in Washington and New York.

He testified that he was not aware of any "substantive contact" between the Corps and the EPA during this period or of any new data the Corps might have used to change its conclusions.

The EPA's objections to Westway were detailed in a letter sent to the Corps' district engineer Col. Fletcher Griffis, before he approved the crucial landfill permit. A cover letter signed by EPA regional administrator Christopher Daggett was followed by 15 pages of technical comments.

The letter said the Corps had failed to prove that the project would "not inflict an unacceptable adverse effect on the environment because of the loss of the striped bass habitat.

In his letter Daggett said the Corps had left "unanswered many crucial questions." He added that it is clear there would be an adverse impact" on a "significant proportion of the striped bass population that spends the winter months in the shallow waters that would be filled in by Westway.

He also said it was "unclear" whether a number of these fish would simply be displaced by the landfill as the Corps predicted or whether many would perish.

The letter said that the questions surrounding the striped bass were of "national importance" because of the decline in stocks throughout the East Coast.

WESTWAY BIOLOGIST TIED TO ROCKEFELLER

(By Arthur K. Lenehan)

The biologist on whom the Army Corps of Engineers relied in deciding to issue a construction permit for New York's Westway project admitted in court yesterday that while giving the Corps ostensibly independent advice, he was being paid a salary by the Rockefeller family, who have been among Westway's most ardent supporters.

Biologist William Dovel testified that he went to the Rockefeller offices in Rockefeller Center and consulted with a family representative about his analysis of Westway's environmental impact "in order to get paid."

He conceded that while continuing his relationship with the Rockefellers, he furnished "expert" advice to the New York regional office of the federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), and did not inform EPA officials the Rockefellers were paying him.

Dovel traced his involvement with Westway to the fall of 1983, when the Corps of Engineers asked him to serve as a part-time consultant. Dovel was one of the key participants in a Corps study of Westway's potential impact on Hudson River stocks of striped bass in early 1984. He was the only outside consultant who worked full time on the Corps' four-month bass study, a study cut short at the insistence of New York Gov. Mario Cuomo.

It was Dovel who later devised and promoted the "migratory theory" to explain the dense concentrations of young bass found in the area of the proposed Westway landfill. The study had shown that at times the Westway area attracted as many as 44 percent of the young striped bass in the river.

Essentially, Dovel's migratory theory held that the young fish were just "passing through" the Westway area, and thus would not be harmed if the area were filled in. The Corps eventually adopted that theory and made extensive use of Dovel's rationale in an environmental impact statement that largely absolved Westway of environmental problems.

The theory was credited and used by the Corps despite the protests of fisheries biologists in three federal agencies.

Yesterday, it was revealed that the migratory theory was developed, at least in part, at Rockefeller Center, about the same time the Rockefeller family was pressuring the White House and federal agencies to approve Westway. The fully developed migratory theory, together with accompanying documentation paid for by the Rockefellers, later was passed to the Corps of Engineers through Dovel, without notation as to its origin.

Dovel testified in Manhattan before U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Griesa, who is holding hearings to decide whether the Corps' environmental impact statement on Westway was prepared according to law.

The biologist told the judge that following the end of the bass study in May 1984, he handled another part time assignment for the Corps continuing into last summer. He said his consulting contract with the Corps lapsed in September. At that point, he said, he returned to his work as an "independent consultant" in marine biology, a business in connection with which he could cite only two clients, the Corps and the Rockefellers.

Dovel first mentioned the Rockefeller family under examination by Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Mastro, one of the federal attorneys representing the government.

The witness said he had received "three months' salary" from a Rockefeller representative named George Lamb. He said he had understood Lamb to represent Laurence Rockefeller, brother to both Nelson Rockefeller, the late vice president, and David Rockefeller, former head of the Chase Manhattan bank and now a leading proponent of the Westway project.

Mastro quickly left the subject of the Rockefellers, but the topic came up again when Dovel was cross-examined by Mitchell Bernard, who represents a coalition of environmentalists opposed to the Westway project. Bernard had developed his own information about the relationship between Dovel and the Rockefellers, and he got Dovel to explain the relationship in some detail.

On Monday, Bernard produced copies of letters and memoranda bearing on the efforts of David Rockefeller to convince the Washington-based leadership of the EPA that the agency's New York regional officials were biased against Westway, favoring New Jersey interests. Those efforts were made between last September and January, according to the documents. Much of the material Bernard produced yesterday pertained to the same period, when the Westway decision hung in the balance.

Bernard elicited from the consultant testimony that Dovel had initiated contact with the Rockefeller family himself, soon after leaving his assignment with the Corps of Engineers. Dovel said he called Lamb at Rockefeller Center last September and set up an appointment to speak with him about Westway and the striped bass question.

At the time, Dovel had submitted no written analysis of his work on the bass study to the Corps, nor had he been asked for one, he testified. He said he had always believed Westway would have no impact on the fish and had seen no point in elaborating on that view.

Dovel added, however, that he had for several years unsuccessfully sought funding for a major academic paper on the striped bass, exclusive of its importance in Westway. Dovel has written papers in scientific journals and said he holds a bachelor's degree in biology from Bridgewater College.

He said the idea occurred to him that the Rockefellers might pay for his bass paper. He said he was aware that Lamb handled some "environmental matters" for the family.

"I remember telling George, and I will try to give you the essence of the conversation." Dovel testified, "that I was convinced no issue in the lower Hudson should be addressed without the availability of a good summary of the life history of the striped bass. And, in all probability, since Westway was a major issue, I may well have said it could be most beneficial for the Westway concern."

Bernard then read from an account of Dovel's conversation with Lamb, in what appeard to be a deposition.

"Do you remember telling him, and I quote. "'It was my feeling we needed this interpretation badly and that Westway could use it?' Do you remember telling that to Mr. Lamb?"

"That sounds familiar," Dovel responded.

"And Mr. Lamb agreed to fund your work right than and there, didn't he?" Bernard asked.

"He encouraged me to go ahead and start the work and said he probably would be able to arrange funding." Dovel answered.

The consultant recounted that, in September and October 1984, he spent eight weeks writing a first draft of a report on his migratory theory. For this work, Lamb paid him eight weeks' salary. Dovel said. He said he consulted with Lamb at least three times regarding the progress of the work, each time visiting Lamb at his office in Manhattan. If he had prepared a graphic or chart for the report, he routinely showed it to Lamb and explained it, Dovel said.

"I had discussions relative to the progress of my work in order to get paid," Dovel testified.

About December, Dovel said, he showed the draft of his report to Leonard Houston, the Corps of Engineers chief biologist on the Westway project. The migratory theory was nothing new to Houston, Dovel said, as he kept Houston posted on its evolution.

"Did you ever advise the Corps of Engineers that you were receiving payments from Laurence Rockefeller?" Griesa asked.

"I probably did," Dovel said.

"Whom did you tell?" Bernard asked.

"Probably Len Houston, said Dovel.

"When did you tell him?"

"I probably told him in early September that George Lamb had encouraged me to go ahead, and I would probably get funding," Dovel said.

A moment later the judge asked, "Did you tell Mr. Houston who Mr. Lamb was?"

"I assumed Mr. Houston knew who Mr. Lamb was," Dovel said.

Bernard produced a letter from Lamb to Col. Fletcher Griffis, the Corps officer who approved the building permit for Westway late in January.

The letter was dated Jan. 15 and was written on the stationery used by the Rockefeller brothers. The letterhead on the stationery refers not to any business or charitable concern, but only to the brothers' office address, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, Room 5600. Letters from David Rockefeller to the White House and the EPA on the subject of Westway were typed on the same stationery.

"I am writing in support of the Westway project," Lamb said in his letter to Griffis. At the end of the letter, he urged Griffis to provide funding for the work of a biologist Lamb expressly chose not to name.

"I will identify this biologist by noting that he was the one who found the fish," Lamb said, perhaps referring to earlier work Dovel had done on striped bass.

But Griffis would provide no funding for Dovel. Dovel testified that Lamb soon agreed to provide additional funds himself. Dovel said he received from Lamb another four weeks' salary toward finishing his report.

"That was to make final subtle changes, get it typed, that sort of thing," Dovel testified.

Only in connection with the final payments did Dovel hint at any discussion of a possible conflict of interest.

"I was aware that Mr. Lamb felt that this sort of work should be funded by environmental agencies," Dovel said. "But he felt so strongly that the work should be done that, if funds could not be found elsewhere, he would provide them.

Dovel explained that he spoke to New York officials of the EPA on Jan. 14, a time when the EPA's regional office was wrestling with the question of whether it should continue its longstanding opposition to Westway. David Rockefeller had been in EPA headquarters in Washington less than two weeks earlier, complaining to officials there that EPA's New York regional administrator, Christopher Daggett, was opposed to Westway solely because he favored New Jersey, Daggett's home state, over New York.

Records introduced in the Westway hearings show that Daggett attended the Jan. 14 meeting with Houston and others and questioned Houston closely about the adequacy of the Corps' bass study. The records show that Dovel told Daggett the studies were adequate in every respect. No mention was made of Lamb.

WESTWAY BIOLOGIST CONTRADICTS HIS OWN REPORT

(By Arthur K. Lenehan)

The biologist responsible for the analysis that led to federal approval of New York's Westway project testified in federal court in Manhattan yesterday that there were numerous errors and misstatements in his crucial report on Westway's potential impact on the Hudson River stocks of striped bass.

Under cross-examination by a lawyer representing Westway opponents, biologist William Dovel uniformly disavowed statements in his report that seemed to indicate Westway might cause environmental damage, as well as statements indicating there had been insufficient study of the project.

Referring to the bulk of his 130-page report, which favored Westway, Dovel said it was erroneous only in being stated too weakly. He said he would now use the word "conclusion" instead of the word "hypothesis" in numerous arguments favoring Westway. He said he would strengthen his endorsement of the project in other ways as well.

Dovel's repeated disavowals of statements in his striped bass report led U.S. District Court Judge Thomas P. Griesa to call his testimony "a bizarre situation."

The judge referred to Dovel's testimony of Wednesday, when the biologist admitted that he had accepted about three months' salary from the Rockefeller family in connection with work on his Westway report. The Rockefellers have been among Westway's most outspoken supporters. But their role in the preparation of Dovel's bass report was not publicly disclosed until Wednesday.

Dovel testified he had received two set of payments from Laurence Rockefeller, brother of the late Vice President, and New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller. In his comments about Dovel's testimony, made while the witness was outside his courtroom, the judge referred to the final payments.

"When Mr. Dovel got another payment from Laurence Rockefeller, to have the thing typed up," the judge said of the report, "he didn't have it typed up with his conclusions, he had it typed up with something other than his conclusions."

At times, Dovel admitted spotting errors in his report as he reviewed it on the witness stand. He admitted that tenacious cross-examination was causing him to revise his report as he spoke. At other times, he claimed to have spotted errors months ago, and to have kept corrections in mind for months, without having written them down anywhere.

Of some three dozen changes Dovel said he would now make in his report, which was typed only three months ago, all were favorable to Westway.

Griesa recessed the hearings until Monday midway through the cross-examination of Dovel.

WESTWAY BIOLOGIST CONTINUES TO QUALIFY

(By Arthur K. Lenehan)

The biologist whose advice persuaded the Army Corps of Engineers to grant a construction permit for Westway continued to qualify and amend a critical report on the project while testifying yesterday at a federal court hearing in Manhattan.

Biologist William Dovel maintained through a second day of cross-examination that a report he wrote regarding the highway's impact on striped bass in the Hudson River did not reflect his own outlook at the time he wrote it.

Dovel has disavowed dozens of statements in his report that seemed to indicate he remained uncertain about the project's impact, at least in March when he last revised his report.

For example, Dovel rejected his earlier statement that the Westway area might be "uniquely beneficial" for young striped bass born in the upper reaches of the Hudson River.

"Now on page 49 of your report you talk about certain habitats being uniquely beneficial, is that right? asked attorney Mitchell Bernard, who represents environmentalists opposed to the project.

"Yes, but my definition of uniquely beneficial would be couched quite differently now," Dovel said.

"You've changed your definition of uniquely beneficial?" Bernard said.

"My definition of uniquely beneficial does not mean that areas natural or manmade are uniquely beneficial to the survival of the species," Dovel explained. "It means in this particular case of manmade areas that could be considered uniquely beneficial by some people simply increase the total area that is useable by the fish during the winter, and that these areas possess no special attribute."

Dovel's unwavering adherence to a line of analysis that favors the Westway project, even when that position has involved rejection of his own statements, prompted U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Griesa to question the witness's point of view.

"You're totally impartial on that point, aren't you?" Griesa asked after another of Dovel's disavowals. "You're not in any way acting as an advocate of the Corps of Engineers position, are you?"

"No," the witness said.

Dovel again answered questions about his acceptance of payments from the Rockefeller family in connection with his report on Westway. He conceded that, in the past three years, his one-man business as a consulting marine biologist has had only two clients, the Army Corps of Engineers and the Rockefellers. The Rockefellers have been among the most vigorous promoters of Westway.

Dovel has said he hopes to obtain further "grants" to complete his work on Hudson stocks of bass, and has not ruled out taking more money from the Rockefeller interest. He has said he has received about "three months' salary" from the family so far.

While the questions asked of Dovel have focused on those portions of his report that raise questions about Westway, by far the greater portion of the report is favorable to the project.

DOCUMENTS TRACE ROCKEFELLER ROLE IN FINANCING WESTWAY BASS STUDY

(By Arthur K. Lenehan)

Federal attorneys yesterday produced a sheaf of documents detailing how the Rockefeller family paid for and participated in the preparation of the environmental study that persuaded the Army Corps of Engineers to approve construction of Westway, a project with which the wealthy New York family has been closely associated.

The documents produced in U.S. District Court, Manhattan, showed that critical changes were made in the environmental study shortly after the author delivered a draft copy to the Rockefeller family offices in Rockefeller Center and collected a fee from a representative of the family. Without exception, the changes made in the document favored the Westway project.

The document's author, consulting biologist William Dovel, denied on the witness stand that Rockefeller representatives had discussed particular changes with him. But Dovel could not explain why certain key changes had been made. He again conceded on the stand that he views the Rockefeller family as a possible source of research funding in the future.

Discussing a related topic, Dovel testified that he went to Rockefeller Center and reported to Rockefeller representative George Lamb immediately following his delivery of a verbal report on Westway in the New York offices of the Federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). In his appearance before the EPA, Dovel presented himself as an unbiased, independent expert on fisheries.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Howard Wilson produced the Rockefeller documents at the start of yesterday's session before U.S. District Court Judge Thomas P. Griesa. Wilson indicated he had obtained the documents from the Rockefeller family offices. Wilson suggested he was producing them not for any purpose of his own, but rather to comply with Griesa's general instruction that the U.S. Attorney's Office produce all available information pertinent to Westway.

Immediately after the material was produced, the attorney representing environmentalists opposed to Westway seized on it as a basis for questions regarding the integrity of the author. For more than two hours, Mitchell Bernard grilled biologist Dovel on his relations with the Rockefellers and the manner in which he had revised his report.

It was Dovel who devised what is now known as the "migratory theory" on Hudson bass. In essence, the migratory theory holds that dense concentrations of young bass found in the area of the proposed Westway landfill are just "passing through" the area, and thus would not be harmed if the area were filled in for construction of Westway. The Westway project would require the filling of some 200 acres of the Hudson on the West Side of Manhattan between 42d Street and Battery Park City. The threat of a serious environmental impact has delayed the road project for years.

Yesterday, Bernard pointed out that a draft of the Dovel report delivered to Rockefeller Center last December, and turned over by the Rockefellers this week, contained statements indicating that Dovel had regarded his migratory theory as speculative at the time he prepared the draft. Bernard read from Dovel's early draft. "At the present time, there is no way to determine the duration of stay for individual fish in the metro area." The attorney then went on to ask a series of questions relating to the statement.

"Would you say that is an important sentence in terms of evaluating the impacts of the Westway landfill on striped bass?" Bernard asked.

"I believe I answered that as yes before." Dovel said, referring to earlier testimony.

Bernard established that Dovel's theory presumed a rapid movement of fish into and out of the Westway area, and Dovel concurred. Then Bernard returned to the assertion in the draft given the Rockefellers. Finally, Bernard pointed out that the sentence in question had been removed from a second draft of Dovel's study, one that was prepared shortly after Dovel visited Rockefeller Center and delivered the first draft to Lamb.

"When did you decide to take that sentence out?" Bernard asked.

"I don't remember," Dovel said.

"So you just dropped that sentence out?"

"At this point, I can't tell you why I dropped it out," Dovel said.

Bernard pursued the topic, referring to the original draft of the report by the initials O-O-O, the designation given the draft for purposes of identification in court.

"Is it just coincidence that there is a series of crossouts and revisions of material from O-O-O that might impart some special importance to the Westway area?" Bernard asked.

"I think it is. I know it is," Dovel replied.

"I don't understand the answer," the judge interjected.

"The answer is it's purely coincidental," Dovel continued.

"Is it also just purely coincidental that you were being funded to make these revisions by Mr. Lamb or Mr. Lamb's funding source?" Bernard asked.

"Purely coincidental?" Dovel said.

"Is that relevant?" said Bernard. "Is it relevant that you were being funded to make these revisions by Mr. Lamb, or Mr. Lamb's funding source?"

"Absolutely not," Dovel said.

Shortly, thereafter, Dovel explained that in revisions of his report he had succeeded in working out a comprehensive description of bass movements in the lower Hudson, notwithstanding his own statement in the Rockefeller draft that his task was impossible. The scheme he worked out came to be known as the migratory theory.

"You had concluded from the available data what you say in his previous sentence was impossible to determine: is that correct?" Bernard asked.

"That's correct," said Dovel.

Dovel had testified previously that he received about "three months' salary" from Lamb, in payments that bracketed a period during which Dovel was frequently conferring with Corps of Engineers officials and occasionally explaining to them the contents of his evolving report on the bass. That period lasted from last autumn until January, when the Corps of Engineers announced its approval of Westway.

During the winter and spring of 1984, Dovel had been employed by the Corps as a field supervisor for a survey of Hudson bass. He was the only full-time consultant employed on the survey. He had testified earlier this week that he had approached Lamb in Rockefeller Center just after leaving employment with the Corps, and had proposed that the Rockefellers finance development of the migratory theory because the theory might be a key element in any decision on development in the lower Hudson.

Yesterday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Howard produced among the other Rockefeller papers a copy of a written proposal Dovel mailed to Lamb last October, shortly after Dovel's initial meeting with Lamb. In the proposal, referring to the expected results of work agreed upon, Dovel told Lamb. "I appreciate the applicability of such results to the current concerns in the lower Hudson and anticipate no delay in accomplishing the goal."

The U.S. Attorney's Office also produced a letter that Dovel sent to Lamb last Dec. 20. In the letter, Dovel referred to meetings with Lamb in Rockefeller Center to discuss the progress of work on his report.

"You have seen the rough graphics but not the text," Dovel told Lamb in the letter. "The text is ready and, regardless of additional efforts to improve the graphics concept, the text material should remain essentially in the current state. I believe the need for this contribution in the next few months compels us to move ahead promptly."

Bernard asked Dovel, "What was the compulsion?"

"First off, because the product was long overdue," Dovel said, referring to his own analysis. "Second, because there was a concern in the lower Hudson regarding Westway, it was appropriate to finish the product."

Dovel said several times that he did not know how George Lamb felt about Westway, or how the Rockefeller brothers felt. He testified that, as a result of his letter to Lamb on December 20, Lamb sent him money "probably by return mail." A draft of the report was being typed by year's end, Dovel said. He said that this first typed draft was delivered to the Rockefeller offices in January. This was the draft produced in court yesterday, and disavowed to a great extent.

"You said to Mr. Lamb that the text should remain in its current state. Did you mean that?" Bernard asked Dovel, in connection with the December letter describing the report.

"I'm sure that the first time I read the document, I saw that it would need some further work," Dovel said. He then went on to reject the draft's statements that evidence on the migratory theory was "circumstantial," that other important data he used were "limited" in scope and that there was "no obvious way to anticipate how fish activity would change" in the event Westway was built.

With respect to the last of the three assertions. Bernard wanted to know whether Dovel had believed the statement in question when he wrote it.

"Yes," Dovel said, "but I don't consider it important to the Westway situation."

"Why not?" Bernard asked.

With respect to the last of the three assertions. Bernard wanted to know whether Dovel had believed the statement in question when he wrote it.

"Yes." Dovel said, "but I don't consider it important to the Westway situation."

"Why not?" Bernard asked.

"I think there is an obvious way to anticipate how fish activity would change." Dovel said.

"Isn't that the exact opposite of what you have written here?" Bernard exclaimed, brandishing some of the original pages delivered to Rockefeller Center.

"Yes." Dovel said.

Bernard noted that the letter to Lamb last Dec. 20 coincided with the Army Corps of Engineers' final analysis of Westway. The Corps of Engineers' final environmental impact statement on Westway had been published in November. The Corps was to announce its decision on a construction permit for Westway in January.

Bernard pointed out that the letter to Lamb included a list of expenditures necessary to complete the report and concluded. "Please advise me as to your response to this approach and the willingness of your source of financial support to cover these items."

There was also a postscript that read: "George, I have just reviewed the Corps' final impact statement. That statement uses my theory of migration as the only concept of organized movement of the young bass. Obviously, the final product is going to be criticized by a lot of experts. If you would like to talk about this. I'll call you.

Bernard hammered away at the significance of the postscript, referring to the Corps' final supplemental environmental impact statement by its acronym, FSEIS.

"Isn't it fair to say that you were appealing to Mr. Lamb for this new funding in order to defend, on behalf of the Corps, the anticipated criticism of the FSEIS?" Bernard asked.

"Absolutely not," Dovel said.

"It just has nothing to do with that?" Bernard said.

"Nothing whatsoever," Dovel said.

Dovel testified that Lamb paid him with checks from Jackson Hole Preserves, one of the Rockefeller brothers' philanthropic interests. He said he had received about $9,000 in salary from the Rockefellers in all. He explained that he and Lamb had agreed to defer some of the payments into 1985 in order to reduce Dovel's 1984 income tax liabilities.

"And what did you know at the time about Jackson Hole Preserves?" Bernard asked.

"Only that it was an interest of Laurance Rockefeller," Dovel said, referring to the brother of both the late Vice President Nelson Rockefeller and David Rockefeller, former head of the Chase Manhattan Bank in New York.

David Rockefeller has been one of Westway's key supporters. Lamb himself once wrote to the Corps of Engineers to endorse the project, using the stationery of the Rockefeller family offices.

Dovel testified that last January while he was at work on revisions of the report he had given Lamb, the New York regional office of the EPA sought his views on the striped bass question. The EPA at the time was deciding whether it should persist in its longstanding opposition to Westway.

Dovel said the request came from EPA Regional Administrator Christopher Daggett. Previous testimony in the Westway hearing has indicated that about the time Dovel received Daggett's request. David Rockefeller visited Washington and complained to ranking EPA officials that Daggett was biased on the Westway question, in favor of his home state of New Jersey.

Dovel said yesterday that within hours of reporting to Daggett, he went to Lamb's office at Rockefeller Center and told Lamb about his talk with Daggett.

Bernard asked Dovel what he told Lamb.

"It was a passing of friends in which I said I had a flight back to Florida in a few minutes," Dovel said.

"I said I'm simply stopping by to say that, at the request of Chris Daggett, I have given a copy of the work I am doing to the EPA workshop."

"You just stopped by to say that?" Bernard said.

"That's exactly right," Dovel said.

* * * * *

The marine biologist explained that he may seek further funding from the Rockefeller interests in the future. He said he last talked to Lamb in April and left the question of further funding in abeyance.

"In this case we have an understanding," Dovel said. "Since Mr. Lamb feels that this should really be the interest of federal environmental agencies, I would like him to hold off until we can see whether some more appropriate agency will be willing to fund the work."

"So you don't want further funding from Mr. Lamb?" Bernard asked.

"When I get ready to do the final graphics, I will want funding from anyone who will give it to me," Dovel said.

ARMY BIOLOGIST ADMITS ROCKEFELLER CONSULTANT GUIDED WESTWAY STUDY

(By Arthur K. Lenehan)

The Army Corps of Engineers biologist who handled the Corps environmental analysis of Westway admitted yesterday that he based his study on advice of an outside consultant he knew to be receiving money from the Rockefeller family, which has been among the project's most enthusiastic supporters.

According to Corps biologist Leonard Houston, fisheries consultant William Dovel informed him of his relationship with the Rockefellers during the final Corps review of Westway last fall. Houston said Dovel told him he was receiving money from "the Rockefeller Foundation." Houston said he knew then that the Rockefellers were outspoken advocates of Westway, and had seen letters from them to the Corps in defense of the project.

Houston said he mentioned the relationship between Dovel and the Rockefellers to his superiors, but heard no objection from them, and attached no significance to it himself.

"I didn't think it was anything special," Houston said.

Houston was testifying at continuing hearings on the Westway project at the federal courthouse in Manhattan. In earlier testimony, Dovel had said he had received at least $9,000 from a Rockefeller family representative named George Lamb over some six months. The payments from the Rockefellers bracketed the period of final Corps review of Westway, in which Dovel was a key adviser.

According to Dovel's earlier testimony, Lamb paid him to prepare a paper on the migratory movements of striped bass in the Hudson, a paper that was later to lay the basis for approval of the Westway project. The paper's critical rationale, eventually adopted by the Corps of Engineers, was that construction of Westway could not hurt young bass found in the area of the proposed landfill, since the fish were only "passing through" the area.

Yesterday, Houston said Dovel's rationale was so important to the decision to approve Westway he had recommended that the Corps append copies of the report to its enviromental impact statement. Houston said that suggestion was rejected by his boss, Col. Fletcher H. Griffis, because inclusion of the Dovel report would have taken too long.

"Ultimately I think it was Col. Griffis who said, 'No, I want you to go ahead. You know what Bill (Dovel) is saying. You have done your analysis. I don't want you to wait for Bill,' " Houston said.

In the latter hours of yesterday's hearing Houston became enbroiled in a lengthy analysis of his own written comments, as printed in the draft of the environmental impact statement published in May 1984. U.S. District Court Judge Thomas P. Griesa asked him to identify comments in the draft that were erroneous, and Houston picked out more than a score, all of which ascribed to the Westway area a special importance in the life cycle of the bass.

The main thrust of the opponents case against the project has been that the draft conceded Westway was environmentally unsound, and that this judgment was reversed in a final environmental impact statement on account of political pressure brought in the interim by the Rockefellers, Sen. Alfonse D'Amato and others.

JUDGE GRILLS ARMY CORPS BIOLOGIST ON WESTWAY STUDY INCONSISTENCIES

(By Arthur K. Lenehan)

The Army Corps of Engineers biologist who recommended approving New York's Westway project yesterday underwent a second day of technical cross-examination on inconsistencies in various drafts of the Corps' environmental impact statement on Westway.

The biologist, Leonard Houston, conceded at the federal courthouse in Manhattan that the rationales he used in the drafts and the conclusions he drew from those rationales did not always agree. Houston's explanation of the inconsistencies was that, in many cases, he had been thinking one thing and writing another.

U.S. District Court Judge Thomas P. Griesa became involved in discussion of the inconsistencies, as he had in such discussions previously during the current hearings on Westway. Noting that he was now six weeks into the Westway hearings, Griesa said yesterday he is still not satisfied with government explanations as to how the Corps could have predicted dire consequences from Westway in a draft environmental impact statement published in May 1984, then reversed that judgment in a final impact statement only six months later.

"Despite the fact that witnesses have been testifying here day after day after day after day, that question remains unanswered," Griesa said.

Environmentalists opposed to Westway have argued in court that the change in the Corps' analysis came about largely on account of political pressures brought by the Rockefeller family, New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, and U.S. Sen. Alfonse D'Amato (R-N.Y.), among others.

In a memorandum submitted to Griesa about a week ago, Assistant U.S. Attorney Howard Wilson, the lawyer representing the Corps, tried to dispose of this issue. In the memo Wilson argued that the changes in question were made because Houston had adopted one ecological theory over another and thus interpreted identical data differently.

Wilson proposed in his memorandum that Houston and the Corps at first expected severe harm to Hudson River stocks of striped bass because Houston initially accepted what he calls the "staging area" theory to explain dense concentrations of young bass found in the area of the proposed Westway landfill. As both Houston and Wilson have explained it, the staging area theory held that the fish needed the Westway area as a kind of halfway slop between the upriver spawning grounds where they are born and the coastal sea where they spend their adult lives.

Such a stop was necessary to the fish, the Corps said in its draft impact statement, because it afforded them rest, food and an opportunity to acclimate themselves to the marine environment before pushing out to sea.

The second theory Wilson mentioned in his memorandum was the "migratory theory," which held that the Westway area was not important to the fish found there because they were just "passing through" the area, or migrating.

Essentially, Wilson argued in his memorandum that the adoption of the migratory theory over the staging area theory naturally led the Corps to a reduced estimate of Westway's environmental impact.

Yesterday, Griesa interceded in the cross-examination of Houston after attorney Mitchell Bernard, who represents the environmentalists opposed to the project, introduced several unpublished drafts of the environmental impact statement and established that, long after Houston had abandoned any notion that Waterway was used as a "staging area," he continued to predict that it would have drastic effects on the Hudson bass.

Picking up on Bernard's line of questioning, the judge asked the witness to step outside, and explained to the attorneys that, in his view, Houston's testimony seemed to contradict Wilson's memorandum.

Griesa commented that the apparent contradiction, considered together with other questions regarding Corps practices, presented "a web of issues about the bona fides of all this activity that went on at the Corps.

Cross-examination of Houston will continue today.

WESTWAY FOES SHOW EVIDENCE OF SELECTIVE EDITING ON KEY EPA ADVISORY

(By David Schwab)

NEW YORK—Westway opponents tried to show yesterday that federal environmental officials in the region toned down their criticisms of the project at the direction of superiors in Washington.

During a hearing in federal court, attorneys representing a coalition of environmental groups presented a series of documents in an attempt to show that some of the harshest criticisms made by Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) officials in New York were subsequently deleted from documents later reviewed in Washington.

The changes concerned a Jan. 21 letter EPA officials in New York sent to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in which the EPA opposed the granting of a landfill permit. Over its objections, and those of two federal wildlife agencies, the Corps issued a permit in February to allow the filling-in of 240 acres of the Hudson River.

Government attorneys representing the Corps concede there were some changes made in the letter before it was sent to the Corps. They say these changes were irrelevant because there was no change in the agency's basic opposition to the project.

But attorney Mitchell Bernard, who represents Westway opponents, told U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Griesa that without these changes the Corps would not have been able to grant the permit. This is because of the EPA's initial finding that Westway would have a "significant adverse impact" on striped bass in the Hudson River.

"At the last minute, at what appears to be the highest level of the EPA, that criticism was cleansed." he said. "There was a recognition by the EPA that the conclusion of significant impact meant the permit had to be denied."

In an effort to show how these changes came about, Bernard questioned for a second day, Jay Benforado, an EPA official who helped to review in Washington initial drafts of the EPA comment letter. The final letter was issued by Christopher Daggett, EPA regional administrator in New York.

Of the changes in the documents, Benforado testified that it was his "general impression" that officials in Washington considered "the tone of the (initial) letter was strong" and that "you could get to the same place by not taking such a strong position."

When asked who was responsible for the final changes, Benforado said it was done "at the senior level."

According to the documents, there were several differences between the initial drafts of the letter and the final version, which were obtained through Freedom of Information requests.

For instance, initial drafts said the Westway project would have a "significant adverse impact" on striped bass in the Hudson River; the word "significant" was removed from the final version. Westway opponents say this is important because by law the Corps would have had to reject the permit if it resulted in a "significant" impact.

Also, the EPA's initial drafts of the letter noted that the Corps had changed its own mind about the project's impact on the population of striped bass with little or no data to support it. In the final version, these comments by the EPA were eliminated, according to the documents cited by Westway opponents.

These changes by the Corps are considered an essential issue in the trial. Griesa, who will decide whether to permit construction of Westway to begin, has called upon the Corps to provide a full explanation of the documents.

In its preliminary environmental impact statement, the Corps found Westway would have a "significant adverse impact" on the striped bass that use the shallow waters that would be filled in by Westway.

In its final version of the impact statement, the Corps concluded the project would most likely have a "perceptible" effect that would have a "minor impact."

WESTWAY FOES CHARGE CORRUPTION

(By Arthur K. Lenehan)

The attorney representing environmentalists opposed to New York's huge Westway project charged yesterday in federal court in Manhattan that the Army Corps of Engineers' decision to approve the project was tainted by political corruption.

Attorney Mitchell Bernard recalled that a published draft of the Corps' environmental impact statement on Westway foresaw grave damage to Hudson River stocks of striped bass. He suggested that the Corps reversed that finding in its final impact statement, calling Westway's impact "minor," because in the interim Corps offficials had buckled under political pressures brought by Westway advocates.

Bernard referred to documents from the federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), introduced as evidence during hearings on Westway. The documents described conversations between ranking EPA officials in Washington and financier David Rockefeller, a leading Westway proponent. Related testimony at the hearings established that the Rockefeller family had paid $9,000 to the biologist on whose advice the Corps relied in approving Westway.

"The corruption point is in my mind an added point, an inference that can reasonably be made based on the EPA documents, the chronology of events, and particularly from the absence of any rational explanation for the changes that were made," Bernard said.

Bernard asked U.S. District Court Judge Thomas P. Griesa to reverse the Corps' approval of Westway. The judge reserved decision. He had explained previously that he intends to decide the Westway case toward the end of this month.

Yesterday, Griesa rejected the main defense of the Corps offered by Assistant U.S. Attorney Howard Wilson in his own summation. Wilson told the judge that, in the minds of Corps officials, there was no substantial difference between the Corps' draft impact statement and the final version. Wilson argued that although the Corps, indeed, had predicted an "important" or "significant adverse impact" in the draft, Corps officials had always believed that Westway's impact would be "minor." Any appearance to the contrary was due to the Corps' inadvertent misuse of words, Wilson said.

The Corps' use of the term "significant adverse impact" in its draft environmental impact report, and the subsequent elimination of the term from the final report, has been one of the major issues in the Westway case.

The term is a standard of federal environmental law and in itself virtually would have compelled denial of a construction permit for Westway, had it remained in the final impact statement.

"I'm the first person to admit, your honor, that a lay person reading that document and seeing 'significant adverse impact' would think that meant a major impact," Wilson told the judge. He went on to argue that the opposite was true. Then Griesa interrupted.

"Does important mean minor?" the judge asked.

"Yes, your honor," Wilson said. "In the context of this case, it does. Important means you can't even see it. That's not the way you and I talk, but that's the way the document is written. I understand your honor's frustration with the language in this document. It doesn't always say what the author says it says."

The judge said he found Wilson's explanation "unrealistic."

"If we recognize that the draft environmental impact statement built up a picture of what was clearly a significant impact, in any normal usage of the word . . . the words are all there . . . and we recognize that there was a substantial change in the final, then we'll be dealing with the issues. We're not dealing with the issues now," the judge said.

Griesa said he thought it was "beyond any argument" that the Corps had radically changed its position on Westway. Wilson responded that he would have trouble continuing his summation if that was the judge's conviction. Wilson did continue only after Griesa encouraged him to do so.

Both Wilson and Paul Curran, who represented the State of New York before Griesa, sharply disagreed with Bernard's assertion of undue political influence or, as Bernard put it more than once, a "fix" of the Corps' decision.

"I say to your honor that that is a smear," Curran said, "because there is no evidence of that in this record."

Wilson noted that Col. Fletcher Griffis of the New York office of the Corps of Engineers wrote his Washington superiors of his intention to approve Westway two days before he announced his decision publicly.

"Certainly if the fix was in, how come the people in Washington don't even know the outcome of the colonel's decision two days before?" Wilson asked rhetorically.

"I don't like the word fix," Griesa said, a moment later. "I could be dealing with some very serious issues here. We're talking about impugning the integrity of officials in Washington."

The judge then went on to explain that he himself was puzzled by the Corps' reversal of its Westway analysis, and particularly concerned about meetings between Griffis and his Washington superiors just before the reversal.

"Why were they there? What was the meaning of their being there?" the judge wondered aloud.

Griesa also expressed doubts about the testimony of the biologist paid by the Rockefellers. The biologist, William Dovel, worked on a Corps study of Westway's impact on striped bass, then took money from the Rockefellers to prepare an analysis that minimized that impact. Dovel's study which was uniformly rejected by other fisheries biologists, eventually became the pivotal element in the Corps' decision in favor of Westway.

"I've got to ask you," the judge told Wilson yesterday, "whether an important decision like this one, a decision important for the community, the state, and the nation, should rest in any degree on the testimony of an individual who has testified in this courtroom the way he (Dovel) has, and produced the documents he has produced."

Wilson argued that the credibility of the government witnesses was beyond question. Griesa said he had his doubts.

"Suppose that I do not accept the testimony that the impact analysis was unchanged," the judge said. "Suppose I don't accept that. As a juror, I would then have to consider the reliability of the other phases of the testimony, I think the same applies to a judge."

Griesa will decide whether the Corps' final environmental impact statement was prepared according to law. He threw out an initial impact study three years ago, and forbade any construction work on Westway pending the submission of an adequate new study.

Westway would be built on a 240-acre landfill in the Hudson, on the West Side of Manhattan between 42d Street and Battery Park City. Besides a new highway, it would provide about 200 acres of new parkland and commercial property. It would cost about $6 billion, of which 90 percent would be paid from federal highway funds.●

ALASKA NATIVE CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT AMENDMENTS

MURKOWSKI AMENDMENT NO. 589

Mr. DOLE (for Mr. MURKOWSKI) proposed an amendment to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 444) to amend the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act; as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

SECTION 1. The Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (85 Stat. 688, 43 U.S.C. 1601-28), as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections.

SEC. 34. (a) For purposes of this section the following terms shall have the following meanings:

(1) the term "The Agreement" or "Agreement" means the agreement entitled "Terms and Conditions Governing Legislative Land Consolidation and Exchange between NANA Regional Corporation, Inc., and the United States" executed by the Secretary of the Interior and the President of NANA Regional Corporation, Inc., on January 31 and January 24, 1985, respectively.

(2) the term "transportation system" means the Red Dog Mine Transportation System described in Exhibit B of the Agreement.

(3) the term "NANA" means NANA Regional Corporation, Inc., a corporation formed for the Natives of Northwest Alaska pursuant to the provisions of this Act.

(b) Except as otherwise provided by this section, the Secretary shall convey to NANA, in accordance with the terms and conditions set forth in the Agreement, lands and interests in lands specified in the Agreement in exchange for lands and interests in lands of NANA, specified in the Agreement, upon fulfillment by NANA of its obligations under the Agreement, provided, however, that this modified exchange is accepted by NANA within 60 days of enactment.

(c)(1) The Secretary shall convey to NANA, pursuant to the provisions of paragraph A(1) of the Agreement, the right, title and interest of the United States only in and to those lands designated as "Amended A(1) Lands" on the map entitled "Modified Cape Krusenstern Land Exchange," dated July 18, 1985. The charges to be made pursuant to paragraphs B(1) and D(27) of the Agreement against NANA's land entitlements under this Act shall be reduced by an amount equivalent to the difference between that acreage conveyed pursuant to this subsection and the acreage that would have been conveyed to NANA pursuant to paragraph A(1) of the Agreement but for this subsection.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph A(3) of the Agreement, the Secretary shall not convey to NANA any right, title and interest of the United States in the lands described in such paragraph A(3) and the Secretary shall make no charge to NANA's remaining entitlements under this Act with respect to such lands. Such lands shall be retained in federal ownership but shall be subject to the easement described in Exhibit D to the Agreement as if the lands had been conveyed to NANA pursuant to paragraph A(3) of the Agreement.

(d)(1) There is hereby granted to NANA an easement in and to the lands designated as "Transportation System Lands" on the map entitled "Modified Cape Krusenstern Land Exchange," dated July 18, 1985, for use in the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of the transportation system. Use of the easement for such purposes shall be subject only to the terms and conditions governing the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of the transportation system, as set forth in Exhibit B to the Agreement.

(2) The easement granted pursuant to this section shall be for a term of 100 years. The easement shall terminate prior to the 100-year term:

(i) if it is relinquished to the United States; or

(ii) if construction of the transportation system has not commenced within 20 years of the enactment of this subsection. Computation of the 20-year period shall exclude periods when construction could not commence because of force majeure, act of God or order of a court; or

(iii) upon completion of reclamation pursuant to the reclamation plan required by Exhibit B to the Agreement.

(3) Within 90 days after enactment of this section the Secretary shall execute the necessary documents evidencing the grant to NANA of the easement granted by this section.

(4) Except as regards the trail easement described in Exhibit D to the Agreement (to which the "Transportation System Lands" shall be subject as if such lands had been conveyed to NANA pursuant to paragraph A(1) of the Agreement), access to the lands subject to the easement granted by this section shall be subject to such limitations, restrictions or conditions as may be imposed by NANA, its successors and assigns, but NANA and its successors and assigns shall permit representatives of the Secretary such access as the Secretary determines is necessary for the monitoring required by this section.

(e) The easement granted by this section makes available land for the transportation system, and is intended to be sufficient to permit NANA to comply with the laws of the State of Alaska which may be necessary to secure financing of the construction of the transportation system and the operation, maintenance or expansion thereof by the State of Alaska or by the Alaska Industrial Development Authority.

(f) The easement granted to NANA by this section may be reconveyed by NANA, but after any such reconveyance the terms and conditions specified in Exhibit B of the Agreement shall continue to apply in full to the easement.

(g) NANA is hereby granted the right to use, develop and sell sand, gravel and related construction materials from borrow sites located within the easement granted pursuant to this section as required for the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of the transportation system, subject to the terms and conditions specified in Exhibit B of the Agreement.

(h)(1) The construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of any portion of the transportation system on any of the lands subject to the easement granted to NANA by this section shall be governed solely by the terms and conditions of the Agreement, including the procedural and substantive provisions of Exhibit B to the Agreement, as if the lands covered by the easement granted to NANA by this section had been conveyed to NANA pursuant to Paragraph A(1) of the Agreement.

(2) The Secretary of the Interior, acting through the National Park Service, shall monitor the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of the transportation system, as provided in the Agreement. Any complaint by any person or entity that any aspect of the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion or reclamation of the portion of the transportation system on the lands subject to the easement granted to NANA by this section is not in accordance with the terms and conditions specified in the Agreement shall be made to the Secretary in writing. The Secretary shall review any such complaint and shall provide to NANA or its successors or assigns and to the complainant a decision in writing on the complaint within 90 days of receipt thereof. If the Secretary determines that the activity made the subject of a complaint is not in accordance with the terms specified in the Agreement, and NANA or its successors or assigns disagrees with that determination, the dispute shall be resolved according to the procedures established in Exhibit B to the Agreement.

(i) The Secretary shall make available to NANA and its successors and assigns the right to use sand, gravel and related construction materials located in Sections 23, 24, 25, 26, 35, and 36 of Township 26 North, Range 24 West, Kateel River Meridian, Alaska, if the Secretary determines either (1) that use of such sand, gravel or related construction material is necessary because there is no other sand, gravel or related construction material reasonably available for the construction, operation, maintenance expansion or reclamation of the transportation system; or (2) that use of such sand, gravel or related construction material is necessary in order to construct, operate, maintain, expand, or reclaim the transportation system in an environmentally sound manner, consistent with the requirements of Exhibit B of the Agreement. The right to use such sand, gravel and related construction material shall be subject to the terms and conditions of Paragraph A of Exhibit B of the Agreement and such other reasonable terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe.

(j) Notwithstanding Paragraph D(23) of the agreement, the Secretary shall not agree to any amendment to the Agreement without first consulting with the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and shall transmit copies of the text of any amendment to the Agreement to those Committees at the time of his agreeing to any such amendment.

SEC. 35. (a) The terms and conditions of this section are solely applicable to the lands described in paragraph A(1) of the agreement, which is defined by section 34(a)(1) of this Act and modified by section 34, and shall not affect the relinquishment by NANA described in section B(1) of such Agreement.

(b) NANA Regional Corporation, Inc. ("NANA"), may convey by quit-claim deed to the United States all of its interest in the surface and subsurface estate in any lands described in subsection (a) of this section, provided, however, NANA can relinquish only lands that are compact and contiguous to other public lands within the Krusenstern National Monument and, if the lands to be relinquished have been disturbed by NANA, the Secretary * * *

(c) NANA may relinquish any interest it has under selection applications filed pursuant to this Act, as amended, in the surface and subsurface estate in lands described in subsection (a) of this section by formally withdrawing such application pursuant to this section, provided, however, NANA can relinquish only interests in lands that are compact and contiguous to other public lands within the Krusenstern National Monument and, if the lands have been disturbed by NANA, the Secretary must first determine that such disturbance has not rendered the lands incompatible with Monument values. Whenever NANA formally withdraws a selection application pursuant to this section, it shall be entitled to designate and have conveyed to it lands outside the boundaries of Cape Krusenstern National Monument and any other conservation system unit, as established and defined by the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (Public Law 96-487; 94 Stat. 2371, et. seq.) pursuant to any of its pending selection applications filed under either section 12(b), 12(c) or 14(h)(8) of this Act. Lands conveyed to NANA under this subsection shall be of a like estate and equal in acreage to the interest which NANA relinquished, and when the lands are conveyed to NANA, the conveyance shall be charged against the same entitlement of NANA as if the lands had been conveyed pursuant to the relinquished selection applications. Lands received by NANA pursuant to this subsection are Settlement Act lands.

(d) The provisions of this section shall remain in effect only until December 18, 1991.

(e) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to alter or amend in any way NANA's selection rights or to increase or diminish NANA's total entitlement to lands pursuant to this Act.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I would like to announce that the Small Business Committee will hold a series of field hearings on the impact of the various tax reform proposals on small business. On August 16, 1985, there will be a hearing at the Clark County PUD Building, in Vancouver, WA, convening at 9:15 a.m. On August 19, 1985 there will be a hearing held at the Jackson Federal Building, in Seattle, WA. It will begin at 1:30 p.m.

On August 26, 1985, the Small Business Committee will hold a hearing in West Memphis, AR, and on August 27, 1985 there will be another hearing in Fort Smith, AR. A time and place for these two hearings will be announced at a later date. In the meantime, if anyone needs more information they can call Stewart Hudson, of the committee staff at 224-5175.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the Public that the Subcommittee on Energy Research and Development of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will conduct a hearing to discuss the Department of Energy's "Mission Plan for the Civilian Radioactive Waste Management Program," which was released on July 10, 1985. The hearing will take place Thursday, September 12, 1985, beginning at 9:30 a.m. in SD366 in the Senate Dirksen Office Building in Washington, DC.

Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Subcommittee on Energy Research and Development, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510.

For further information regarding this hearing, please contact Ms. Marilyn Meigs on the subcommittee staff at 202-224-4431.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY REGULATION AND CONSERVATION

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public, that the Subcommittee on Energy Regulation and Conservation of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has scheduled an oversight hearing on Tuesday, September 24, 1985, beginning at 9 a.m. in room SD-366 in the Senate Dirksen Office Building in Washington, DC.

Testimony will be received on innovative approaches in industrial energy efficiency. Those wishing to testify or submit a written statement for the hearing record should write to the Subcommittee on Energy Regulation and Conservation, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510.

For further information regarding this hearing, please contact Mr. Al Stayman 202-224-2366.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs will hold a series of hearings on S. 1527, the Civil Service Pension Reform Act of 1985 beginning on Monday, September 9 at 10:00 in room 106 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. The committee will continue the hearings on Wednesday and Thursday, September 10 and 11 at 10:00 a.m., in room 342 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

For further information regarding these hearings, please contact Wayne Schley at 224-4751.

SUBCOMMITTE ON ENERGY REGULATION AND CONSERVATION

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public, that the Subcommittee on Energy Regulation and Conservation of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has scheduled an oversight hearing on Thursday, September 19, 1985, beginning at 9:30 a.m. in room SD-366 in the Senate Dirksen Office Building in Washington, DC.

The purpose of the hearing is to review the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's notice of proposed rulemaking on regulation of natural gas pipelines after partial wellhead decontrol, RM85-1-000.

Those wishing to testify or submit a written statements for the hearing record should write to the Subcommittee on Energy Regulation and Conservation, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510.

For further information regarding this hearing, please contact Mr. Howard Ussem 202-224-2366.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, August 1, at 4:30 p.m., to mark up S. 616, the Farm Bill, provided that when the budget resolution is brought up in the Senate, the committee will no longer be authorized to meet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

EXPANDED CAPITAL OWNERSHIP

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, today I am inserting the third of three statements on expanded capital ownership for the benefit of my colleagues and the American people. This final statement by Senator RUSSELL B. LONG is also taken from his floor comments on November 17, 1983, in support of the Employee Stock Ownership Act of 1983. His full testimony on that date, with the assistance of his aide Jeff Gates, is probably the best practical description ever prepared on the operations, history, and rationale of expanding capital ownership in the United States. Making it possible for virtually all Americans to have a stake in the action where they work is the essence of the American dream. What better way to end conflicts between workers and owners than enabling all workers to earn a growing share in the equity growth and profits in the companies for which they work. I highly commend to your attention these new tools for making the American free enterprise system work more efficiently and more justly for all. The ESOP demonstrates how we can finance faster rates of investment, while offering a new labor deal that can be a model of justice for workers everywhere.

I ask that the statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

TECHNOLOGY FOR IMPROVING THE QUALITY OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY

(By Hon. Russell B. Long)

Our private property approach to economic matters recognizes the indisputable interplay between economic rights and political rights. Our Founding Fathers recognized that individual liberties and a democratic form of Government cannot long endure unless the majority of citizens have a high degree of economic independence. Thus, protection of the concept of private property was embodied in the Bill of Rights.

This forward-looking group also recognized that a private enterprise system was the most natural economic structure—a structure that evolved from the actions of a free people. It had not been forced; it had grown. It had not been enforced; it had come on its own.

As the 1980 Republican platform reminds us:

The widespread distribution of private property ownership is the cornerstone of American liberty. Without it neither our free enterprise system nor our Republican form of Government could long endure.

Consequently, the 1980 Republican platform pledges the Reagan administration "to help millions of Americans . . . to share in the ownership of the wealth of their nation."

If a Nation is to be politically free, it must structure its social contract to first insure economic freedom. Economic freedom implies the right to participate freely in the economy and the right to a just return for one's participation. Our concern for equality of economic opportunity is closely linked to those ideals. . . ."

In a capital-intensive economy such as ours, the right to earn a living involves more than the right to work and the right to a just return for work done. True economic opportunity involves the right to economically participate by means consistent with the existing state of technology.

At our labor-saving, cost-containing insistence. American engineers, scientists, and managers have been remarkably successful at destroying the very employment that Governments—again, at our insistence—have been directed to promote.

Rather than break the relationship between effort and reward or, more accurately, between input and outtake, the expanded ownership concept suggests that we recognize—and adjust to—the increasingly dominant role that capital inputs play in the productive process.

Our full employment approach—both to providing economic opportunity and also to solving the income distribution problem—simply does not reflect the extent to which productive capital is now the factor most fully employed in providing the basic goods and services of a modern economy.

THE BENEFITS OF GROWTH

A century ago, President Lincoln understood the importance of widespread ownership, and he signed legislation insuring that the opportunity to own capital was within the reach of all. The philosophy underlying the Homestead Act of 1862 should be applied at every step of the Federal Government's relationship with its people. Why not use the public sector to build productive capital in reasonable-sized holdings into the vast majority of American households who presently own little if any?

President Reagan, in a July 1974 speech to the Young Americans for Freedom, explained the historical precedent for a national policy of expanded ownership and endorsed the uniquely American opportunity that such a policy would represent.

In a similar vein, Senator Hubert Humphrey explained his support of expanded ownership in a letter to the editor of the Washington Post not long before his death:

Throughout my career as a public servant, I have viewed full employment as a top priority goal for this country. And I continue to do so. But I recognize that capital, and the question of who owns it and therefore reaps the benefit of its productiveness, is an extremely important issue that is complementary to the issue of full employment.

I see these as twin pillars of our economy. Full employment of our labor resources and widespread ownership of our capital resources. Such twin pillars would go a long way in providing a firm underlying support for future economic growth that would be equitably shared.

Attention must be given to new ways to distribute the benefits of this growth more widely. Despite all the fine populist oratory and good intentions of great men like Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Harry Truman, Dwight Eisenhower, John Kennedy, and Lyndon Johnson, the distribution of wealth among Americans in relative terms, is about the same today as it was when Herbert Hoover succeeded Calvin Coolidge.

The already-rich of this Nation should warmly welcome this new dimension to our free enterprise economy. ESOP-type financing techniques are designed to avoid the redistribution of ownership of existing capital for the simple reason that we cannot build a broadly based private property economy on the expropriation of anyone's property.

The aim is to strengthen, not to further erode, the rights of private property ownership, and certainly we would not need to tax the rich nearly so much if we worked harder at broadening the base of those who have an opportunity to become rich.

The American people need and deserve a chance to own a stake in the U.S. economy—an economy of their own making. It is time to acknowledge the important role of the individual in our capital-intensive economy, and provide working Americans with access to ownership of the productive capital with which they work.

CREATING A WELCOME CONTEXT FOR TECHNOLOGY

Expanded capital ownership is a type of corporate responsibility that is consistent with the goals of American business. The free enterprise system is based on production for profit, not for employment. The concern is for the rational, efficient production of goods and services, generally with little thought given to just how consumers are to get the purchasing power to buy those goods and services.

The need for economy and efficiency is indisputable. U.S. business holds a franchise from the American public in large part because we believe that we can best achieve our economic goals by relying on private initiatives.

However, if we are to create a self-sustaining economic system and one in which Government plays only a minor role, as the business sector suggests it should, then the private sector itself must play a greater role in solving the economy's income distribution problem. This will become increasingly important once the private sector begins to take advantage of the recently enacted supply-side tax incentives to apply the latest advances in technology.

One of the market's greatest strengths is its ability to stimulate and harness new technologies and resources, and to direct innovation into socially desirable directions. The historically demonstrated power of market incentives to influence the pace and direction of technological change warrants every effort to retain such incentives as part of our economic and tax policy.

However, while these technological changes on balance create gains in the form of higher living standards, almost every one of them causes a loss of income to some firms and individuals.

A Carnegie-Mellon study, for example, indicates that industrial robots have the potential to eliminate 2 million jobs in the metal-working industry by 1990, and the Upjohn Institute for Employment Research contends that robots in Michigan will replace three times as many workers as they will provide new jobs. The trend toward increased automation seems likely to continue. Indeed, the Commerce Department insists that batch manufacturing companies must automate if they are to compete successfully in international markets.

With the advent of microelectronics, the jobless growth already apparent in agriculture, which now employes only 3.2 percent of the U.S. work force, is spreading beyond agriculture and manufacturing and into the economy's tertiary sector-finance, insurance, government services, et cetera.

According to Department of Labor statistics, from 1960 to 1980, the service sector accounted for more than 85 percent of new jobs. It is in the service sector, however, that most experts are predicting that the chief impact of this new technology will be felt. Moreover, it is those with low-level clerical and analytical skills who will be most affected, particularly women and minorities.

As a nation, the American people have greatly benefited from the remarkable labor-saving advances of the past century. As individuals, however, they have not fared as well. Due to the way in which those advances were financed, they continue to find themselves left with only their labor as their stock in trade.

Thus, each round of new investment further threatens their power to earn a living. Instead of being part owners of the system, they find themselves pitted against it. If this new technology is to have a welcome context for its use, we must begin to strike a new balance between social and economic objectives.

Our present supply-side, investment-based strategy can make the U.S. economy more successful-more growth oriented and less redistribution oriented. However, unless the benefits of this new growth are widely shared, for example, through a combination of employee ownership and job sharing, we may find ourselves 10 to 20 years from now with a population even more in need of governmental transfer payments.

WHY ESOP FINANCING?

Capital ownership is most emphatically a social opportunity, indeed, a socially created opportunity. It is the institutions of society and, more specifically, the institutions and conventions of finance that determine who will be the owners of productive capital that has yet to be created.

Capital ownership, however, is an opportunity historically reserved for a relative few. That is due to the simple fact that the ownership of new wealth is largely a function of the ownership of existing wealth. The current structure of our most widely used financing techniques insures that the rich will, in fact, continue to get richer.

The vast majority of Americans cannot afford capital ownership. Most working Americans owe rather than own: they accumulate debts rather than assets. Daily economic survival, not savings and investment, is their primary concern, and the less our technologically advanced economy needs their labor, the less they are able to save their way to capital ownership. Inflation, of course, further penalizes their thrift.

Concentrated wealth holdings contirbute to the cumulative and self-reinforcing nature of the concentration of wealth and income. The concentration of stock ownership leads to a situation where those who currently own stock are those best able to save significant amounts and, thus, best able to make additional investments, thereby increasing their stock ownership.

What the individual needs is access to the financial logic of self-liquidating debt—the logic used every day by businesses in borrowing to invest in productive assets that will pay for themselves. Most Americans lack assets to pledge as security for a loan to acquire income-producing capital; consequently, those who do not now own are unlikely to own in the future. Access to this type of financing simply is not available to the enormous number of Americans born into families without substantial capital assets.

Lacking access to cash or credit, they are instead encouraged to save their way to capital ownership. Thrift, they are told is their financial opportunity. I think of this as the Marie Antoinette approach to expanded ownership. Only instead of suggesting. "Let them eat cake," they recommend, "Let them buy stock." That financial philosophy brought us the concentrated pattern of ownership that we have today and, unless that philosophy is changed, our ownership pattern will remain largely unchanged.

If we are to break this monopoly of participation in the ownership of productive assets, we must first resolve the financial "catch-22" that requires accumulated savings or assets as a condition of capital ownership. ESOP type financing suggests that we approach this dilemma by broadening access to the financial logic of self-liquidating corporate debt.

The very purpose of corporate debt is to enable a business to acquire productive assets before it has saved the funds to pay for them. Instead, the acquisition is made on terms where the newly acquired assets will pay for themselves out of the earnings they generate.

Widespread access to this type of credit must be distinguished from the widespread access to consumer credit. Consumer credit produces no marketable wealth; rather, it is simply an advance against future purchasing power. Although originally developed to narrow the purchasing power gap, in the long run it only widens it; the end result is to mortgage future purchasing power, not to increase it. . . .

ESOP-type financing is of a different sort. It is producer credit—credit for the acquisition of productive assets rather than for consumer articles.

ESOP financing involves access to credit for the financing of assets which are calculated to generate earnings with which to repay the debt incurred over a reasonable period of time, and which can then go on to generate purchasing power for their owners, their productiveness preserved by reserves set aside for depreciation, or, as it is now termed, "cost recovery."

This approach puts the concept of thrift in a new and more workable context. Capital ownership is still attained by the individual in lieu of consumption. Only now the income generated by newly acquired productive capital is saved and applied to repay the debt incurred. . . .

A MODEL OF WORKABILITY

If we continue to rely solely on traditional techniques of finance, those techniques will continue to allocate productive credit primarily to the already wealthy. With that approach, the concentrated ownership of newly created capital is virtually assured, and the rich-get-richer legacy of U.S. capitalism will continue unabated.

That would show a great failure of foresight on our part, because not only will we continue to have an unworkable form of capitalism here in the United States, we will also have a form of capitalism unsuitable for imitation abroad.

We need a more hopeful model, a working model of what we would advocate for other nations. We need to be able to show people all over the world how the increasing prosperity of our private property economy spreads out and reaches Americans in all walks of life. Unless we have such a model, other nations will continue to see the false promises of socialism as a more attractive alternative.

By encouraging widespread employee ownership in the United States, we would be making good on our promise of a better life for our people and challenging other nations to do likewise. Such an approach could provide the leadership that is needed to encourage other nations to move our way rather than follow the Socialist path.

Although some nations continue to move in the direction of nationalized ownership, I do not believe that they do so because they necessarily think that State ownership will solve their problems. Rather, I see it as an act of desperation; they simply cannot think of a better solution.

State ownership has enormous drawbacks; experience has taught us that time after time. All too often, both freedom and efficiency are sacrificed in the name of equity. Yet even basic equity is sacrificed as a privileged bureaucratic elite emerges in place of the property-owning elite that socialism and communism claim they are designed to replace.

Socialism and communism are not alternatives; rather they are largely a reaction to the abuses of early models of capitalism.

A PRINCIPLED APPROACH TO FOREIGN POLICY

In recent testimony before the Finance Committee, Secretary of State Shultz suggested that what the United States needs is policies and programs "to get ahead of history." Employee stock ownership is just such a program. It not only increases the constituency for a private property economy, at the same time it undercuts the primary rationale for communism.

The path that expanded ownership takes faces in exactly the opposite direction from that taken by those who favor ownership by the State. Expanded ownership financing seeks to steadily increase the number of capital owners instead of preventing anyone from owning capital by making the State the only owner.

Employee ownership has far-reaching implications for those who share the democratic vision. By advocating employee ownership abroad, we can take a more principled approach to foreign policy, an approach that stands a far better chance than others to insure that a nation will realize its democratic ideas.

It is difficult to imagine an enduring democracy without widespread private property. Democracies are stable because people participate in them. A dictatorship—whether it be a dictatorship of the left or of the right—is unstable because people do not participate. Participation in ownership can contribute to stability by providing a broad base of support for economic and political reforms.

A principal objection to private property development is that not enough people own some of it. That has been a primary criticism of American capitalism throughout history.

Unfortunately, in many parts of the world capitalism is portrayed simply as an economic system in which a nation's productive wealth is concentrated in the hands of a privileged few.

It is a remarkably shortsighted strategy for us to expect other nations to move in the direction of a private enterprise economy when we ourselves have failed to set the U.S. economy on a sure path toward widespread capital ownership.

In an address to the American Legion convention in Washington, D.C., on February 22, 1983, President Reagan touched on this point in outlining America's foreign policy strategy. As the President explained:

There is no more damaging misconception than the notion that capitalism is an economic system benefiting only the rich. Economic freedom is the world's mightiest engine for abundance and social justice

. . . . Developing countries need to be encouraged to experiment with the growing variety of arrangements for profit sharing and expanded capital ownership that can bring ecnomic betterment to their people.

The encouragement of employee ownership abroad could become a crucial factor in the U.S. foreign policy, particularly in resolving the developmental paradox of stability versus growth. It is difficult to have economic growth without stability; yet stability is elusive without a strong economic base. And, of course, where Marxism succeeds, or is seen as likely to succeed financial capital flows out of the country, further compounding the problem of financing development.

The coupling of development financing with employee ownership could provide an environment in which assistance is more likely to succeed and in which more people in the assisted country have an opportunity to share in that success.

It has also come to my attention that Pope John Paul II issued a papal encyclical on September 15, 1981, title "Laborem Exercens" (On Human Work), that addresses this subject. In this letter to Roman Catholic bishops, the pontiff places particular emphasis on the dignity and the rights of workers and gives special attention to the question of ownership of the means of production.

In addition to defending the right of workers to form labor unions as an "indispensable element" of modern society and as a vehicle "for the struggle for social justice," the encyclical suggests that each person, on the basis of his work, should be "* * * fully entitled to consider himself as a part owner of the great workbench at which he is working with everyone else. A way toward that goal could be found by associating labor with the ownership of capital, as far as possible * * *."

This farsighted and outspoken church statesman then goes on to cite the "need for ever new movements of solidarity" and suggests that union demands "can and should also aim at correcting—with a view to the common good of the whole of society—everything defective in the system of ownership of the means of production or in the way these are managed."

American's free enterprise system has been on the defensive for 65 years in a struggle that, it seems, cannot be won with simple neutrality. If we expect other nations to follow our lead, we should take the ideological offensive. We need to demonstrate how a government can operate to insure that its working people have an opportunity to become active partners in a nation's economic progress.

If we hope to prevail over those we oppose, we need to confront them with an idea that is better. In this battle for people's minds, we must make it clear not only what we are against but also what we are for. Employee ownership is the type of idea that we can all be for.

In a democratic nation in which only a few people are citizens, the solution is not to destroy citizenship but to make it possible for all to become citizens. Similarly, in an industrialized nation in which only a few people are owners of capital, the solution is not to destroy private ownership but to make it possible for all to become owners.●

SINKING HOMES

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I saw a United Press International story the other day about Mr. and Mrs. Jack Phillips, of Sesser, IL whose home is sinking because of a coal mine 600–700 feet below their home.

This Nation is going to find that happening more and more, and the sooner we face up to this problem, the better.

Some years ago, I tried to get an amendment adopted putting a tax of 3 cents per ton on coal. That money would have been set aside to pay up to 50 percent of the cost of private or public loss caused by coal subsidence.

We still need to do that.

I recognize that in the present atmosphere, such a bill could not pass, but I ask to have printed in the RECORD the story of Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, to remind us that here is a problem that has not been faced, that must be faced sooner or later.

The article follows:

FAMILY'S HOME DROPS IN ON COAL MINE

SESSER, Ill.—Jack and Stacie Phillips and their four children spent Tuesday night in a motel because their $350,000 "dream home" south of town is sinking.

The Phillips were unsuccessful in their efforts in court and before the Illinois Department of Mines and Minerals to stop Old Ben Coal Co. from using the longwall mining system in extracting coal 600 to 700 feet below their home.

Mrs. Phillips said cracks began appearing in their 2½-story, 12-room home on July 6, just four years after they moved in.

"You can stick your fist into one crack in the steel-reinforced basement and see daylight through it." Mrs. Phillips said.

Cracks have appeared in walls throughout the house, she said. One of two 60-foot chimneys is crumbling, and the other is cracking, she said.

The 108-foot-long house has dropped about six inches on the east end, and the worst is yet to come, she said. "An engineer has predicted it will drop two feet on the west end and five feet on the east end," she said.

"It's unbelievable," Mrs. Phillips said. "There are cracking, popping and ripping noises."

She said they had to abandon a building used in the grave monument business they operated on their 80-acre farm.

Springs have developed along a creek that runs through the property because of the sinking.

Old Ben uses the longwall mining system that permits almost complete recovery of coal at its No. 21 mine near Sesser in Franklin County. Old Ben, which employs about 2,000 miners, also has applied for longwall permits at three other mines it operates in the county. It says the system is more efficient and permits it to remain competitive in the coal business.

Old Ben is the only mining company in Illinois using the longwall technique, in contrast to the room-and-pillar system of mining, which leaves pillars of coal to support the roof. Subsidence in room-and-pillar is more gradual, sometimes occurring years after a mine is abandoned.

Coal industry observers in Illinois say other mining companies are watching closely the outcome of the Phillips case.

The Phillipses and their attorney, Ivan Elliott, Jr., of Carmi, contend that the mineral rights obtained by Old Ben around 1910 were based on the room-and-pilar mining system.

"They can say that it's legal for them to take that coal and disturb the surface, but I'll never believe it," Mrs. Phillips said.

The Phillipses were denied a temporary restraining order against the longwall system. Elliott said a permanent injunction request hearing is pending, as is another administrative hearing next Tuesday in Springfield before the Department of Mines and Minerals.●

ENVIRONMENTAL AND ENERGY STUDY CONFERENCE ORGANIZES TASK FORCE ON TOXIC EMERGENCIES

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, as cochairman of the Environmental and Energy Study Conference, I am proud to announce today the formation of a Task Force on Toxic Emergencies to examine the readiness of our local communities to respond to accidents involving hazardous materials.

We need only look to recent headlines to appreciate the increasing frequency—and the serious threat—of accidental releases on hazardous materials. A train derails in Arkansas, forcing the evacuation of 1,200. Some 10,000 are evacuated in California during a fire at a pesticide facility. Firefighters in Washington, DC are forced to let a hotel fire burn for nearly 2 hours while they await information on whether deadly PCB's are present.

The threat to our health and safety is not limited to a few high risk areas. Virtually every community in the country needs at least some level of preparation for an emergency involving hazardous materials. It will be the job of the Task Force on Toxic Emergencies to assist local communities in reaching a prudent level of readiness.

The members of the Task Force on Toxic Emergencies will work with local officials and industry representatives to assess emergency response procedures. The task force will also examine the risks posed by local manufacturing and storage facilities and by the transport of hazardous materials. The study will also review, for the benefit of the local communities involved, Federal emergency assistance programs, State programs and regulations, and private industry efforts to promote planning and training.

Most accidents are dealt with by local firefighters and police. The decisions they make in the first few minutes can often make the difference between life and death, between a quickly contained incident and severe environmental contamination. These incidents can be as difficult to control as they are dangerous. For their own safety, and for the safety of the communities they protect, it is critical that "first responders" have the information, training and equipment they need in those first few minutes.

My cochairman, Representative BILL GREEN, and I have asked the study conference's covice chairmen, Senator ALBERT GORE, JR. and Representative BOB WISE, to head the task force. Their experience with this issue both in their home States and here in Congress make them particularly well qualified to head this effort.

The task force itself is a bipartisan group representing every region of the country:

Congressman Thomas R. Carper.
Congressman Don Edwards.
Congressman Dante B. Fascell.
Senator Albert Gore, Jr.
Congressman John J. LaFalce.
Congressman Mel Levine.
Congressman Bob Livingston.
Congressman Lynn Martin.
Congressman George Miller.
Congressman John R. Miller.
Congressman Bruce A. Morrison.
Senator Claiborne Pell.
Congressman Don Ritter.
Congressman Jim Saxton.
Congressman Peter J. Visclosky.
Congresswoman Barbara F. Vucanovich.
Congressman Bob Wise.

I am proud that the study conference has initiated this effort and I look forward to sharing our findings with our colleagues.●

STAR WARS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, on July 11 a large majority of the University of Illinois physics faculty and graduate students signed a statement condemning the SDI Program as being "technically dubious and politically unwise." Their hope is that their scientific colleagues across the country will refuse to accept funds to work on star wars development projects. I support the physicists' statement, and I endorse their right to petition their fellow scientists.

The physics faculty is near-unanimous in their support for this statement: to date, those who have not signed are not now on campus and no one has refused to sign. These are not people who are reacting to unfounded fears of nuclear devastation, or people who are attempting to mask their political concern with technical credentials. Their political opposition is openly stated. Their technical backgrounds and experience leads them to conclude that, however well individual components or technical systems might work by themselves, it will never be feasible to integrate such a massive undertaking in the face of Soviet countermeasures. The director of the University's new National Center for Supercomputing Applications—one of four such centers—signed on to the statement as well, warning that the kind of computer software programs necessary to make SDI work is not even close to the horizon of technological developments.

These physicists are not saying anything new. Ever since the President's proposal, qualified physicists and engineers have repeatedly argued that the kind of strategic defense sought by the President could not be achieved except through enlisting the aid of the Soviet Union. Such a proposition, however, is made ever more unlikely by the shape and direction of the SDI Program as now conceived: radical reductions in Soviet offensive nuclear arms do not seem likely, and prospective violations of the ABM Treaty ensure that both countries will not be idle as their adversary forges ahead in these new arms race technologies. The end result is a vicious cycle in which both offensive and defensive weapons are researched, tested, developed and produced. The only defense we have in the nuclear age comes to us not in the form of orbital laser battle-stations, but in our willingness to engage in political courage and negotiate fair and equitable treaties limiting and reducing nuclear weapons and weapons tests.

Mr. President, I ask that the physicists' statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT ON STAR WARS

The Congress is a present considering a massive expansion of the Strategic Defense Initiative (Star Wars Program). It seems likely that large amounts of money will soon be made available for scientific research under the Program. University-based scientists are already being invited to apply for funding under this program.

We believe that the Star Wars Program is technically dubious and politically unwise. Anti-ballastic missile defense of sufficient reliability to defend the population of the United States against a Soviet first strike is not technically feasible in the foreseeable future. A system of more limited capability will only serve to escalate the arms race by encouraging the development of both additional offensive overkill and an all-out competition in anti-ballistic missile weapons. The Program will make arms-control negotiation even more difficult than it is at present. The Program is a step toward precisely the type of weapons and strategy most likely to trigger a nuclear holocaust.

For these reasons, we believe that the Star Wars Program represents, not an advance towards genuine security, but rather a major step backwards. Accordingly, as working scientists, we will not apply for or accept support from the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization, which funds Star Wars research. We encourage other sceintists and technical personnel to join us in this refusal. We hope, together, to presuade the public and the Congress not to support this deeply misguided, dangerous, and enormouly expensive program.●

NEW EXTRADITION TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, in the past months the forces of terrorism—of fear and violence—have been on the increase. The forces of law and civilization have seemingly been unable to cope with the rising tide of bombings, hijackings, and killings which have swollen to over 500 incidents per year.

Far more disturbing than the actual number of terrorist attacks has been the increasing level of coordination and cooperation among terrorist groups and the nations which sponsor them. It is time that those nations which are committed to the preservation of international peace and security take steps toward working together to stop this campaign of murder and fear.

A step in this direction has already been taken with the signing of the supplementary extradition treaty with the United Kingdom. Traditionally, criminals have been able to avoid extradition by claiming that their crimes were political in nature. This exemption, meant to protect those whose only real crime was to disagree with the policies of their governments, could easily be twisted into providing a legal haven for terrorists. This supplementary treaty removes violent crimes from the list of "political" offenses and so removes the protection of the law from those who are its sworn enemies. I am pleased to see that a hearing is being held today on this constructive measure and I urge its speedy ratification by the Senate.

Mr. President, I would hope that President Reagan would continue this type of endeavor with all our friends with whom we have extradition treaties.

National frontiers must not be barriers to the prosecution of known terrorists. That is why, in a further step in this direction, I am cosponsoring S. 1373, which my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] authored, to extend U.S. legal jurisdiction to cover terrorists who attack or murder U.S. citizens on foreign territory. Thus, regardless of the attitude of the government of a country where a terrorist act occurs, the United States has a legal basis for bringing the terrorist back to the United States to face justice. It is imperative that we act now to reduce the legal obstacles to prosecuting terrorists.

We can no longer afford to lurch from crisis to crisis, each time swearing that we are now going to, once and for all, cure the cancer of terrorism and then letting our resolve and initiative slip away.

The legal framework for prosecuting terrorists and making them pay for their actions will make progress toward controlling this virulent disease. However, more international cooperation and greater national determination are needed. The democratic countries of the world must act with unity and confidence in demonstrating to these merchants of fear that there is no room for their barbaric and dastardly acts in or civilization. A long struggle lies ahead of us, but by acting promptly and decisively, we can and shall win out.●

ECONOMIC CANCERS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I guess we all like to read things we agree with.

But David Broder's column on the cancers that we face in our economic picture seems to me so obvious, and yet it is not obvious to many in the House and Senate and to many in the administration and to many in the public.

We can continue to skip along, blindly ignoring reality, or we can face it.

Obviously, I hope we will face it and heed David Broder's advice.

Just in case my colleagues in the House and Senate have not read this hard-hitting, straightforward column, I submit it for the RECORD.

The column follows:

THE COUNTY HAS ITS OWN CANCER

WASHINGTON.—George F. Will is exactly right in saying that President Reagan's illness will save the lives of thousands of potential cancer victims by ending their procrastination in getting tests and treatment for their own cases.

If this were a rational world, it would also end the government's mindless procrastination in dealing with the problem of runaway federal deficits.

Those deficits are the cancer in our economic system, and the longer they are left untreated, the more certain and painful will be the end of our current prosperity.

It must have struck someone that four days after the President's surgery and two days after the diagnosis of colon cancer, Federal Reserve Chairman Paul A. Volcker was issuing the same diagnosis for the economy.

"When you operate on borrowed money to the extent that we have," he said in congressional testimony, "you are living on borrowed time." It is exactly the same point—indeed, almost a word-for-word paraphrase—that Walter F. Mondale made in his Democratic convention acceptance speech a year ago last week and that many others of both parties have made before and since.

There is no serious challenge to that proposition among those businessmen, bankers and economists who look seriously at the picture or, for that matter, among many of the administration and congressional officials who are struggling with it.

Yet Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., one of those who clearly understands the threat, has said that the government is "surrendering to the deficit."

Dole expressed that bitter view in criticizing the unwise budget concessions Reagan made just before his hospitalization. The White House has mismanaged this year's budget process starting with the unrealistic defense spending numbers of last January and continuing up through the cave-in on Social Security cost-of-living adjustments of which Dole complained.

But there is no one so blame-free in this process that he can walk away from responsibility if it collapses—as it recurrently has threatened to do. For the congressional budget-makers to quit in disagreement would be exactly as indefensible as it would have been for the President's doctors to throw up their hands when they found the new—and cancerous—polyp.

The basic strength of the American economy is being sapped by three cancers, closely linked and feeding each other. The first is the budget deficit, brushing $200 billion a year. When added to the existing trillion-dollar-plus national debt, it guarantees that a multiplying share of each year's tax collections will be consumed simply in paying runaway interest payments on the debt.

The second cancer is the rising tide of foreign borrowing—$100 billion a year from now until at least 1990, according to the latest Congressional Research Service estimate. This year, that borrowing has made the United States a debtor nation for the first time in 70 years.

By next year, we may be the world's biggest debtor. The rapid growth of that foreign debt almost strips us of control of our own economic future. More and more of our future income will be sent abroad to pay those foreign creditors, and if they put the squeeze on us by withdrawing their funds, we could in truth be "a pitiful, helpless giant."

The third cancer is the steadily worsening foreign trade deficit, estimated by Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige in the mind-boggling $140-$150 billion range this year. That measures the inability of the American economy to hold its own in international competition. It explains why, in a time of seeming prosperity, we are continuing to lose jobs in manufacturing, and seeing industry after industry overwhelmed by foreign competitors.

None of these facts is in dispute—any more than the President's diagnosis was subject to debate. Yet we continue to be lulled by stock-market highs and summer sloth into thinking there will not be a day of reckoning.

Ignoring these economic cancers is as stupid and criminal as it would have been to say of Ronald Reagan, "Hell, he can't be sick. Look at that tan he's got."

When Reagan's problem was diagnosed, his doctors did not hesitate or procrastinate. They did the surgery. He accepted the pain and discomfiture in order to achieve what should be a cure.

Every diagnosis of our economic cancer leads to the recommendation that the budget deficit must be cut—with whatever short-term pain and discomfiture—by dealing with defense, domestic spending, entitlements and taxes.

If Reagan's doctors had shrunk from doing what his life and health required, they would have been denounced and replaced. If this administration and Congress attempt to sneak off on vacation in August without acting on the budget deficit, they deserve no better treatment.

If they—and we—can't read the message we've been sent, and summon the will to act on it, we deserve the fate we will surely suffer.●

JUDGE PICKING

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, one of the tasks which the Senate has is approving judges. I serve on the Judiciary Committee where that responsibility is even more pointed.

I confess, I am less than completely satisfied with the job that we are now doing. I have conveyed to members of the American Bar Association some concerns I have in this area.

Recently, I read a speech by my former colleague in the Illinois General Assembly and later my former colleague in the U.S. House of Representatives, U.S. Circuit Judge Abner J. Mikva, on the whole question of judicial selection.

It does not provide any magic formulas, for none exists. But it does contain common sense that can be helpful to us.

I ask unanimous consent that Judge Mikva's remarks be inserted at this point, and I urge my colleages to read them.

REMARKS BY U.S. CIRCUIT JUDGE ABNER J. MIKVA TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BAR ASSOCIATION

JUDGE PICKING

At the Constitutional Convention, legend has it that Ben Franklin suggested that Supreme Court nominations be made by lawyers. Fraklin thought that lawyers would want to eliminate their strongest competitors, and so would nominate only the ablest lawyers. If a keen intellect were the only quality sought in judges, Franklin's suggestion may have had some merit. But the Convention opted for a judicial selection procedure that incorporates more than simply judgments of ability, giving the power to the President, to be exercised "by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate."

I confess that even after my years in the Congress, I overlooked the significance and the complexities of that nomination process. I remember the day, over five years ago, that I was called by the Attorney General to tell me that President Carter was going to nominate me for one of the new judgeships on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. I remember wondering what the President's timetable was, and how long it would be before I moved to my new offices down the street.

What naivete! At the time I thought the only cause for delay would be the period of time required for the ABA and the FBI to review my credentials and past. I saw no reason for worry—after all, I had spent 25 years in the fishbowl we call electoral politics. I had no ghosts in my closet that campaign opponents had not previously exposed. My financial affairs were uncomplicated, current and public—I was broke, but out of debt. Everything I had said and done was in the unrelenting limelight of a public forum—first as a member of the Illinois State Legislature, and then, for five terms, as a Member of the United States Congress.

The nomination process began to operate as I had envisioned. From time to time, I would hear from lawyers, former classmates, and neighbors that the FBI has spoken to them about me. I was teased by my friends in the Senate about how they would finally give me a plurality that was larger than my election pluralities of the last few years. I was asked to fill out some lengthy questionnaires for the FBI and for the American Bar Association. None of the questions were embarrassing. On the contrary, I enjoyed the opportunity to brag about past experiences that I thought qualified me for my new job—the time I had spent practicing law before I came to Congress, my law clerk days to Supreme Court Justice Sherman Minton, my oral advocacy days before the Supreme Courts of the United States and of Illinois, as well as various Courts of Appeals and District Courts.

To complete my feeling good symphony, I was a member of the fraternity-sorority we call the Congress of the United States—the Congress always did well by its own. All in all, I was feeling pretty good.

The excitement began to crumble when a friend advised me that the National Rifle Association was considering opposing my appointment. My first reaction was puzzlement—not that the NRA and I had not previously clashed. We had on many occasions. But I had not made gun control a high priority of mine for several years, even though I had continued to sponsor a bill banning the sale and distribution of handguns. In any event, I could not understand why the NRA would rather see me stay in Congress where I could raise their hackles than go to the court where I would have no influence or voice about the policy issues of gun control. When I thought hard about the role of judges, the NRA's opposition seemed to pose little threat.

Unfortunately, I was wrong. Regardless of what I had been taught and what I believed about the role of judges in deciding issues of social policy, the NRA began pressing its views. In May of 1979, the executive director of the NRA's lobbying arm announced I was "unfit for judgeship," that my views were "those of a Fascist," and my attitudes those of a "tin-pot dictator." It began to appear that he was not really for me. While I continued to receive support from the media and from friends on the Hill, the NRA was producing results. One Senator who earlier had volunteered his support, embarrassedly explained that he had not been aware of the NRA's opposition, and told me there was no way he could support me. The Senator candidly said, "You have to understand the folks back home. They would take after me with no mercy if I supported someone whom the NRA opposed." The same scenario unfolded in Senate office after office. I became a household word in little towns in Mississippi and Montana and Idaho.

The story came out all right for me. The Senate gave me an enthusiastic sendoff, by a vote of 58 to 31—I was confirmed. Not quite the overwhelming plurality I had anticipated—but better than any constituents had given me in Congress. The NRA reportedly spent a million dollars in their effort to prevent my confirmation. But the memories of that battle, and the oddity of single issue opposition to a candidate for a nonelectoral role has remained close. Unfortunately, the process is neither new nor diminished. Indeed, the current political challenges to important constitutional cases—abortion, busing, prayer in the schools,—have caused the selection of judges to become a hot political issue. In the last campaign the Democratic candidate tried to make Supreme Court selections a capaign issue. While it didn't fly, it did focus some attention on the institution—and how it gets its judges. In 1980, the Republican party included in their platform a plank pledging to "work for the appointment of judges at all levels of the judiciary who respect traditional family values and the sanctity of innocent human life."

This new, or revived attention is beginning to make a difference. Take, for example, Joseph Rodriguez, New Jersey's Public Advocate. Following his nomination, he was subjected to a test of his "liberal" philosophies. Some members of the Senate Judiciary Committee sent an eight page questionnaire to Rodriguez, asking him to spell out his opinions on the Equal Rights Amendment, abortion, the death penalty and school prayer. The questions did not address Rodriquez's general philosophy, but rather sought answers that would indicate the way Rodriguez would decide cases that raised certain issues.

For example, question 9 asked:

"Is it unconstitutional for state or local governments to give tuition vouchers to parents of all children who attend nonpublic schools? Does it make any difference whether most of these children attend religious school, provided that the law makes no distinction between religious and nonreligious schools?"

Another question asked:

"Keeping in mind that unions are private associations rather than governments, do you think that the granting of exclusive representation powers to unions by the National Labor Relations Act is unconstitutional?"

The Senators also sought a list of all political contributions Rodriguez had ever made as well as a list of all organizations to which Rodriguez had ever belonged. Rodriguez deftly filled out the questionnaire without answering a single question. Suprisingly, the Senators backed off, possibly sensing that the questionnaire raised more serious questions about judicial independence than about Mr. Rodriguez's qualifications. Rodriguez was eventually confirmed.

One local nominee was blocked, however, even though his professional credentials were impeccable, and even though he had performed brilliantly in a public office, building a deserved reputation as a hardliner in the criminal justice field—because he had contributed to gun control organizations and financially supported pro-choice candidates for public office. Another potential judicial nominee was shot down early, even though both of his state's Senators supported him, apparently because he had served too well as a public defender.

Is this substantive screening by the Senate and by other political forces a new phenomenom? Only since 1795. George Washington was unable to obtain the confirmation of one of his nominees to the Supreme Court for interesting reasons. Washington nominated former Justice John Rutledge for Chief Justice of the United States. Rutledge had left the Court before the seat of the Chief Justice became open. Washington nominated Rutledge to the Chief Justice position, and assumed that his nomination of the man who was an author of the Constitution as well as a former Supreme Court Justice would meet no resistance. The Great Communicator of his time had enjoyed remarkably successful relations with the Congress, and had every reason to assume that Rutledge would be the new Chief Justice.

Unfortunately, a few weeks after his nomination, Rutledge attacked the Jay Treaty, which was designed by Washington to ease tensions with Great Britain. To the Federalists, who strongly supported the treaty, Rutledge's opposition called into question his views on foreign policy—whatever that had to do with his capacity to serve as Chief Justice of the United States. After a bitter debate, the Senate refused to confirm Rutlege.

The desire to install likeminded judges also transcends party and political labels. During the confirmation hearings of Justice John Paul Stevens, Senator Kennedy pressed Stevens for his views on numerous topics. At one point he asked: "As a private citizen, what are your views on the Equal Rights Amendment?" Contrast this to question 11 of the questionnaire sent to Rodriguez which asked: "Would you give your present personal opinion with regards to the Equal Rights Amendment?"

Like the Equal Rights Amendment, the question of race has been raised at confirmation hearings by people on both ends of the political spectrum. Harold Carswell's name did not make it through the Senate once his 1948 campaign pledges to support white supremacy surfaced. Taking a different view of race relations, some Southern Senators delayed the confirmation of Justice Potter Stewart for four months in 1959 after he admitted to the Judiciary Committee that he had no intention of voting to overturn Brown v. Board of Education.

Is this a politicization of the Court system? Is it bad? Is it new, or getting worse? Is it avoidable? The answers are as complicated as the interplay between the three branches of government, and I cannot give you any precise answers. Let me give you instead some highly obiter dicta.

First of all, the questions raise another question. What kind of a judiciary do we want? The major pronouncements of our federal courts—the ones that most directly affect the social and economic life of the nation—those decisions unavoidably have political impact. Over 100 years ago, Alexis de Tocqueville commented that "there is hardly a political question in the United States which does not sooner or later turn into a judicial one." We expect judges to be impartial, but our courts are not isolated from the political domain.

The Washington Post once ran an editorial deploring the view that a person with political beliefs is unfit to serve as a judge. The Post suggested that if we really want to avoid judges who have been exposed to politics, we should breed a class of judges. These judges would be selected in early childhood, trained to make decisions as Little League Umpires, and would be shielded from the pressing questions of our times. The editorial pointed out that this system might well improve the quality of baseball umpires but it would not do much for the judiciary.

We do not want judges who are completely devoid of political content, for that means they have spent no time in the mainstream of American life and have no connection with the hearts and minds of the American people. Being detached from day-to-day partisan affairs is one thing; being wholly divorced from the world of real people is something else. Judges need to know something about legal theory, but they also need to know something about the real world. Justice Rehnquist recognized this when he said:

"Proof that a Justice's mind at the time he joined the Court was a complete tabula rasa in the area of constitutional adjudication would be evidence of lack of qualification, not lack of bias."

If we acknowledge that politics and the judiciary have some enduring connection, why not use litmus tests—like abortion, prayer in the schools, the Equal Rights Amendment—to determine the political leanings of potential judges? Many people argue that litmus tests are simply a new way of doing what Presidents and Senators have always done. The problem with litmus tests is that they aim at much more than just an assessment of political views or preferences.

A president may certainly nominate judge who share his world view. What a president may not do is use the nomination process as a means to amend the Constitution or recast important constitutional precedents. A President may want judges who start out sharing his values. What he ought not seek is judges who forget or are willing to forego the anti-majoritorian purpose of the Bill of Rights. During the 1980 Presidential campaign, then-candidate Reagan said:

"Time and again in recent years, we have seen the Supreme Court override public opinion concerning school prayer, forced busing, the treatment of criminals . . . There must be new justices on the Court, women and men who respect and reflect the values and morals of the American majority. I pledge to make such appointments."

President Reagan's goals in appointing Justices are very similar to those of President Roosevelt when the Supreme Court began to strike down his New Deal Legislation:

"[If the Supreme Court strikes down the Wagner Act, the Social Security Act, and other pieces of New Deal legislation], Congress can enlarge the Supreme Court, increasing the number of justices from nine to twelve or fifteen."

While the specific court packing plan FDR proposed died aborning, FDR did get to appoint Justices who shared his New Deal views, including Hugo Black. Justice Black met opposition from all quarters when he was nominated, due to his advocacy of New Deal legislation while a Senator and his alleged membership of the Ku Klux Klan as a young lawyer in Alabama. Upon Black's confirmation, former President Hoover remarked, "The Court is one-ninth packed." The media was equally critical of Black: the Chicago Tribune dubbed his nomination "the worst [the President] could find," while the New York Herald Tribune called it "a nomination as menacing as it is unfit." We all know that Justice Black went on to a long and distinguished career of confounding his critics. The line we are concerned about in judicial selection is between a judge who constantly remembers who appointed him and a judge who remembers that popular decisions can be made easily by the popular branches of government, but that his function is to protect minority rights from majority passions. By minorities I mean not only racial, religious and political groupings—I include every defendant in every criminal case—by definition a minority is one who the public-square judges of the French Revolution would guillotine first and try later. Think of any important criminal law precedent where a constitutional right was upheld. Every one of these cases would have been decided differently if the decision had been by referendum—Miranda, Monte Durham, Mapp versus Ohio, Escobedo, Gideon.

And that is why the Senate, as the reflector of popular will, must also be circumscribed in its inquiries. What the Senate ought not do is determine, through questioning, a nominee's views on emerging constitutional doctrine, on issues likely to face courts in the near future. Why? Because these questions are really a signal to a nominee that he will become a judge only if he promises to be obsequious, to be a yes man to the powers that be. During Justice Thurgood Marshall's confirmation hearings, he was asked by Senator McClellan whether society must always sacrifice its security and safety in order to provide every conceivable right to suspects in criminal cases. Marshall answered that he did not believe that a society should give up its security. The question may have sounded innocent, but Senator McClellan's rejoinder makes clear that it was intended as a sharp warning to Marshall to cut back on the rights of the accused; Senator McClellan told Marshall:

"I hope that [belief] will have some influence with you, as you weigh some of these cases. It is one man's decision that often determines what the Constitution is."

The Constitution clearly does not permit the judiciary to be a subdivision of the Senate, nor judges to serve as inferior officers to the President. Just as the President must not seek to impact the independent and frequently unpopular judgments of the judges, the Senate also cannot use its confirmation power to create judicial I.O.U.'s. Justice Rehnquist has said that:

"For [a nominee] to express any but the most general observation about the law would suggest that, in order to obtain favorable consideration of his nomination, he deliberately was announcing in advance, without benefit of judicial oath, briefs, or argument, how he would decide a particular question that might come before him as a judge."

I am also disturbed by another message of these judicial I.O.U.'s. I think that when we ask prospective judges their views on an issue likely to arise in the future, we are locking those judges into a position. Today's litmus tests tell nominees that when the question is abortion, the answer is no, and when the question is prayer, the answer is yes. Do we want judges who have decided the outcome of a case even before looking at its facts? Do we want judges who disregard statutes and regulations to reach a particular result? The constitutional prohibition on advisory opinions tells us that justice is achieved by well-informed, concrete decisions, rather than by mere hypothetical speculation.

There is still another defect to the litmus test approach to picking and confirming judges. The test is always about a single ailment—a single cause. It tells you little about the rest of the corpus. What must be avoided is the selection of a nominee based solely on how he or she would decide a particular issue. Judges are appointed for life. No one can really predict what issues will be important in ten or twenty years. Andrew Jackson wanted to appoint a justice who would oppose the Bank of the United States. He found him in Roger Taney. Twenty years after President Jackson left office, Chief Justice Taney was still around to author the Dred Scott opinion. President Jackson's appointee almost succeeded in throwing out the Union with the Bank.

I would like to raise one last difficulty with the overinvolvement of popular concerns and institutions in judicial selection. We can agree that Judges and the appointment process are not without political content, but to be effective, courts must operate outside of the political sphere. There is a tendency, I think, to become so mesmerized by the awesome trappings of the judiciary and its historical power that we overlook just how fragile the court's power is. The legislature controls the money, the executive the army; all the judiciary has is its own moral authority. The Supreme Court's mandates are obeyed not because of police in the streets but because of public perceptions of the Court's legitimacy. When the Court is perceived as an apolitical, wise and impartial tribunal, the American people have evinced a willingness to abide by its decisions. But if the Court is viewed as simply a Congress in black robes, the Court's ability to perform its constitutional function is threatened. Former ABA President William Reece Smith, Jr. said:

"Attempts to politicize the judiciary lend legitimacy to the notion that federal judges make the law solely according to their own private viewpoints and prejudices. . . That implication . . . confounds the public's perception of the legal system and encourages disrespect of the vital role that judges play in our government."

What should a wise President and a forebearing Senate do in the best of worlds? I believe close examination should be made of a potential jurist. As Senator Ervin once remarked about nomination hearings:

"[If the Senate] ought not to be permitted to find out what [a nominee's] attitude is toward the Constitution, or what his philosophy is, [then] I don't see why the Constitution was so foolish as to suggest that the nominee for the Supreme Court ought to be confirmed by the Senate."

It is perfectly fair for presidents and senators to seek judges who share their view of the role of government in American life, who in the long run will do what presidents and senators believe is best. But to assess this compatibility, it is not merely unnecessary, it is patently offensive, to ask of a potential judge what he or she will decide in a future case. Nominees usually have made a public record, whether in past decisions, in writings, or in speeches. I do not believe there is an inherent impropriety in a nominee appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, although until fairly recently, nominees, including my former boss, Justice Minton, regularly declined the invitation. Some limits on a nominee's questioning by the Committee are required. Perhaps Felix Frankfurter, in refusing to answer certain questions in his confirmation hearings, said it best:

"My attitude and outlook on relevant matters have been fully expressed over a period of years and are easily accessible. I should think it is not only bad taste, but inconsistent with the duties of the office for which I have been nominated for me to attempt to supplement my past record with present declarations."

Justice O'Connor, at her 1981 confirmation hearings, was asked a litany of abortion-related questions. Numerous Senators attempted to extract her views on abortion in general and the Supreme Court's decision in Roe versus Wade in particular. Justice O'Connor consistently refused to respond to these inquiries, believing them to be beyond the scope of permissible questioning at a confirmation hearing. Justice O'Connor's approach seems to have been fair and correct: the Court's integrity remained intact, and she was confirmed by a vote of 99 to 0.

The litmus test, then, of a good appointment and confirmation procedure is restraint. There ought to be executive restraint—while the President is entitled to appoint people he likes and respects, he ought not exact or expect any pledge of fealty to the Chief. Some of the best of Justices and judges have confounded their appointees, whether we talk of John Marshall or Earl Warren, or William Brennan. There ought to be Senatorial Restraint. The Senators may have understandable curiosity about the candidates views on the hot issues of the day. They can look but they better not touch. As Senator Eastland said, "If the nominee thinks that the question is improper, he can decline to answer. And that when he declines his position will be respected." Satisfying a Senator's curiosity is not the way to enhance judicial independence.

And the nominees themselves must exercise restraint. Knowing which questions are properly posed to a nominee, and which are not, is perhaps the best litmus test of the qualities we want in a judge—the ability to judge and the exercise of good judgment. What a nominee will decide in a particular case tells us nothing about the nominee's judgment. But the refusal to respond to improper questions, invoking, as Senator Ervin once said, the "judicial fifth amendment," tells us that this nominee possesses the independence and courage we ought to want in our judges. And history tells us that when Senators display restraint and respect, and when nominees display good judgment, confirmation will not be denied. Felix Frankfurter, Sandra Day O'Connor, Thurgood Marshall, and Joseph Rodriguez all refused to answer certain questions; all were confirmed.

Mostly, we come back to the questions of the beginning. Do we really want a "popular" judiciary? Do we want a judiciary that has no strong views on anything, except the importance of being confirmed? I think not. What we want are women and men with integrity, with wisdom, with good judgment, and with the strength to take unpopular positions. I think that nominees who would answer the current breed of litmus tests lack these necessary qualities. Perhaps we can all take a lesson from Judge Bork of the D.C. Circuit. In a recent interview published in the District Lawyer, he was asked whether he could identify any Supreme Court doctrines that he regards as particularly worthy of reconsideration in the 1980's. His response? "Yes I can, but I won't." I think Abraham Lincoln would have liked Judge Bork, and not just because they both spent their formative years in Illinois. When Lincoln sought to appoint a Justice, he wanted a person with certain views, but he knew better than to ask. Instead, Lincoln said:

"We cannot ask a man what he will do, and if we should, and he should answer us, we should despise him for it."●

PARENTS EDUCATING PARENTS

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I would like my colleagues to know of a special recognition received by the Parents Educating Parents Program of the Association for Retarded Citizens of Georgia. On June 11, 1985, PEP received a Distinguished Service Award from the National Council on Communicative Disorders [NCCD], which is 22 national professional and consumer organizations concerned with communicative disorders. NCCD seeks to provide recognition to companies, unions, organizations, and individuals who have made outstanding contributions to the cause of improving the lives of individuals with communicative disorders. These disorders cover a very wide range of conditions from the loss of language which can follow a stroke, to hearing loss which affects millions of Americans, to the communicative problems of individuals who have had their larynx or voice box surgically removed and to individuals with cleft palate, cerebral palsy, and many other conditions which affect the ability to communicate in society. PEP received the award for the important work they do in educating parents about the handicapping condition of their child, about the school's responsibilities, and about appropriate professional services.

I am pleased to have been involved with the Association for Retarded Citizens of Georgia for a number of years, and I am especially glad that NCCD has given national recognition to Parents Educating Parents, a project that Georgians have been proud of for quite some time. I would like to commend Mildred Hill, the executive director of the ARC of Georgia, and Bonnie Webb, the coordinator of Parents Educating Parents, for their hard work and dedication to assisting children with disabilities. Parents Educating Parents is a statewide project that is funded by a grant from the U.S. Department of Education, Department of Personnel Preparation, to provide information and training to parents of handicapped children. Approximately 75 to 90 percent of the targeted parent population have children with some type of communicative disorder. Through a newsletter, the Education Update, and a series of annual workshops, Parents Educating Parents shares information with thousands of concerned parents and professionals in Georgia, other States, and seven foreign countries.

In the past, the NCCD has provided awards to Bell Laboratories for their research accomplishments in computer responses to speech, to Johns Hopkins University Applied Physics Laboratory and the National Science Foundation for conducting a national search for applications for personal computing to aid the handicapped, and to the National Head Injury Foundation for focusing national attention on the problem of head injuries.

In addition, they have provided awards to Malcolm Fraser, a successful businessman and stutterer who created the Speech Foundation of America, to the Trace Center at the University of Wisconsin for its research and development of computer assisted communication for severely handicapped individuals, and to the Cerebral Palsy Research Foundation of Kansas for its multifaceted work in the provision of services to thousands of multiply handicapped young adults in Kansas. This award was presented last year by my colleague, Senator NANCY KASSEBAUM, who is very familiar with this center and its director, John Jonas.

NCCD has also recognized Gov. William Winter of the State of Mississippi for his work in improving that State's educational services. NCCD tries to particularly highlight the contribution made by businesses in providing greater access and accommodation to individuals with communicative disorders. It has honored IBM for its long-standing commitment to hiring the handicapped as well as to Union Carbide Corp., Nuclear Division, and Integrated Microcomputer Systems, Inc., of Rockville, MD. All of these companies have fine records in seeking out, hiring and accommodating to the needs of individuals with communicative disorders.

NCCD has also provided for individual recognition to persons who can provide all of us with a model for overcoming one's own disabilities. The winners in this category have included Clyde Cochran Berger, who is a elderly gentleman who grew up in Kansas with cerebral palsy and struggled to complete his education. Mr. Berger is a speech-language pathologist at the Institute of Logopedics in Wichita, KS, and an active writer and speaker describing to others his own struggles and accomplishments. In 1983, the award was given to Ross Milheiser, a top executive with Philip Morris, Inc., who provided access for employees of Philip Morris to effective treatment for stuttering and who was the creator of a film on the problems faced by stutterers in society and the rehabilitation services that are available. Winners in 1984 included Geri Jewell, the actress-comedienne, and Ken Levinson, an accounting executive with Northrop Corp., an advocate for deaf individuals.

At the awards banquet for 1985, Hyatt hotels was recognized for their program of providing television captioning equipment in all 75 of their hotels to facilitate the mobility of hearing impaired travelers. Also receiving an award was AT&T for their efforts in accommodating to the needs of handicapped employees and providing leadership in the accommodation that employers can make to workers with communication impairments. The United Auto Workers was also awarded for their successful efforts in achieving the first nationally negotiated labor union contract to cover both hearing aids for all of their workers and retirees and speech-language pathology services for the children of their employees.

Receiving the award for outstanding individual accomplishment in overcoming a handicap was Mrs. Esther Kratzer Everett of Williamsville, NY. Mrs. Everett had her larynx surgically removed but has learned to speak both with and without an electronic assistive device. In spite of the laryngectomy, she serves as president of her own insurance, investment, and real estate firm and is vice chairman of the New York State Republican Party and president of the New York State Federation of Republican Women. She is an active speaker and advocate for the employability of alaryngeal speakers and is truly a model for other individuals who must suffer this type of operation and who fear for how they can continue to communicate as effectively as they did before this type of surgery.

Mr. President, I am very proud that Parents Educating Parents was welcomed into this impressive list of organizations and individuals. The awards program of NCCD is meant to provide recognition for the very hard work that is being done by thousands of individuals around the country to make sure that individuals with speech, language, and hearing handicaps are fully integrated into the mainstream of American life. This involves a great deal of both public and private activity. In the public sector, the National Institute of Neurological and Communicative Disorders and Stroke, part of the National Institutes of Health, plays a leading role in providing for basic research in this area. The Department of Education's Office of Special Education and Related Services led by Assistant Secretary Mrs. Madeleine Will plays a crucial role in providing for a range of activities for those with communication impairments in our Nation's schools. The Medicare and Medicaid Programs also have crucial roles to play in getting services to these individuals. I congratulate NCCD on bringing to our attention those corporations and unions and other organizations who are actively involved in doing what public programs are often unable to do.

The member organizations of NCCD include: the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association; the Academy of Rehabilitative Audiology; the Division of Children With Communicative Disorders, Council for Exceptional Children; the National Association for Hearing and Speech Action; the Council of Graduate Programs in Communications Sciences and Disorders; the Alexander Graham Bell Association for the Deaf; Speech Communication Association; National Easter Seal Society; the Association for Children and Adults With Learning Disabilities; the National Black Association for Speech, Language and Hearing; the National Council of State Boards of Examiners for Speech-Language Pathology and Audiology; the Society of Medical Audiology; the Association of Service Programs in Communicative Disorders; Consumers Organization for the Hearing Impaired; the National Council on Stuttering; the American Society for Deaf Children; the Orton Dyslexia Society; Self-Help for Hard of Hearing People, Inc.; Psi Iota Xi; Audiological Resource Association; the American Association for Mental Deficiency; and the National Head Injury Foundation.●

MEDICAL RESEARCH

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I was in the State of Oregon the other day to attend my high school reunion. High school reunions are both a joyous occasion and a dramatic reminder that time is moving on all of us.

While I was there, I read an inspiring story in the Eugene Register-Guard about a Mrs. Jan Brehm and her unusual conditon in which her brain is manipulated by a certain biochemical condition to cause panic attacks.

I am inserting the article in the RECORD for my colleagues to read.

But it reminded me that either the Federal Government or some drug company had to do research to make possible this family having hope.

Those who would reduce our research dollars, whether it is for the National Institute of Mental Health, or for systic fibrosis, or arthritis, or any one of a host of problems our civilization still faces, are doing a great disservice.

While I was at the high school reunion, I learned that two of the members of our classs are now fighting the battle against cancer. What if we spent a few dollars less on weapons of destruction and a few dollars more on cancer research? Would we be better off? Of course we would.

I am grateful to Bill Bishop, the reporter who wrote the story, and to Mrs. Brehm and her family and to her psychiatrist, Dr. Tom Foster, who noted the condition. I want future generations to be appreciative of our efforts to conquer sickness and disease. I do not want future generations to look back and say, "These were leaders of little vision."

Mr. President, I ask that the article to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

ILLNESS SPURS PANIC BOUTS FOR VICTIMS

(By Bill Bishop)

One minute, Jan Brehm was immersed in the routine of dinner dishes in the kitchen of her Eugene home.

Moments later, she was running around the block—adrenaline pulsing through her shaky, sweaty body—fleeing in panic from nothing at all.

Brehm, 31, suffers from panic disorder.

Because of a biochemical condition, her brain triggers full-blown panic reactions for no apparent reason at all. Luckily, medication can correct the problem, and Brehm was able to get help soon after her first panic attack last October.

Since then, though, she has heard of other cases that have gone untreated for years and now she openly discusses her condition so that others who have panic disorder may seek help.

"It is the most frightening thing I've ever been through," says the 31-year-old mother of two. "The worst part is, you think you are losing your mind. You think you are going crazy. You think you're mentally ill. But you aren't. It's physiological. I am one of the fortunate ones who got help early. Many people don't get help because they are so afraid."

Help, for Brehm, is a tiny purple pill called Xanax. It is one of several medications that correct the chemical imbalance that triggers panic disorder. With Xanax, Brehm's life has returned to normal, except for one relapse in July after she began to cut down on her dosage.

"The drug does not make you feel good; it's not an upper, it's a normalizer," she says. "You can still feel all normal emotions. But it (the brain) just does not trigger the panic."

Sufferers of panic disorder who go without treatment frequently develop phobias that amplify the effects of the disorder, says Dr. Tom Foster, a psychiatrist at the Eugene Hospital and Clinic.

"I would guess there are a lot of people out there who are suffering and who aren't coming forward," Foster says "This is part of the larger problem of all psychological distress. It's a stigma that our culture has on all psychological matters. We have this idea that these things are not real conditions, that they are not equal to 'real' illness.

"I can think of several people who went five, six, seven years from the onset (of panic attacks) until the time they got something done about it."

The disorder has been described and recorded throughout medical history. It was called "Soldier's Heart" during the Civil War, Foster notes.

But only in the past five years have researchers begun to understand the disorder and to develop treatments.

"I think five years ago it was less well-understood and therefore, less diagnosed," Foster says. "There is something different, biologically, about these people.

"The statistics vary about what percentage of people have this," he says. "According to the people doing the research, the disorder is apparently common. They report good success (in treating the disorder). This is a condition with hope to it. You can make a difference. No one, of course, can promise, but it's not a pessimistic condition at all. People often have substantial improvement (after treatment)."

Foster says the difference between panic attack and normal anxiety is like the difference between a thunderstorm and a lawn sprinkler. The jitters you might feel before speaking in public won't even register on the panic attack scale.

"The panic attack is a very intense, attack-like wave of both physical and psychological symptoms," he says. "The attack will last several minutes, rarely longer. The person will have a tightening in the chest. They will sweat. They will have trouble breathing. They will just feel awful. At the same time, they often will feel like there is impending doom. They feel like they are going to die, that they are going crazy, that they are losing control. It looks like what it sounds like. Imagine the worst thing you can; this is it. The big one. The end. It's really bad."

After the attack subsides, the sufferer will continue feeling upset, edgy, anxious and depressed. Because of the intensity of the experience, sufferers of panic disorder frequently are ashamed of their behavior and refuse to seek help. Some of them develop agoraphobia; they stay away from places or situations that have triggered panic previously or may trigger it.

Sometimes the agoraphobia becomes so dominant that the sufferer will refuse to leave the house, to mingle in crowds or to go anyplace from which they cannot easily flee if panic sets in, Foster says.

"For some reason we don't understand well, there is a female predominance—80 percent of the persons with this were women. The onset (of attacks) can be between the ages of 15 and 35," says Foster, who estimates he has treated 75 to 100 panic disorders in his nine-year career.

"A friend of mine goes through it real bad," Brehm says. "She's gone through it for five years. She used to call me, crying, and I used to say to her, 'Get yourself together. You're in control of your life,' and all those kinds of things. And she would say to me, 'You will never know the pain of this until you experience it.'

"My faith has had a lot to do with this. At first I thought God had dealt me a bad card. I believe in healing and I realize that He is using this to bring out good in my character. I believe the suffering has caused more good than bad for me because it has given me compassion for the people who go through it," Brehm says.

The disorder also drew her closer to her husband, Chris.

"It was real hard for him," she says. "He had to handle the kids. He had to take care of everything. In a way it has brought us much, much closer because I am so strong and independent and I've always been that way. All of a sudden, when I was sick, I was so dependent on him and it did a really neat thing in our relationship."

On top of the added family duties, Chris also had to cope with his wife as she worked her way back to normalcy.

"You can't really expect the person to get well on their own," he says. "You can't put that much pressure on them. You find yourself frustrated."●

FRESH THINKING AND THE ILLINOIS ECONOMY

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, for our Nation to compete on the international trade scene, we need to encourage people to think creatively. For our domestic economy to thrive, we need innovation and fresh thinking. In a weekly column I write for newspapers in my home State, I have told about a man who keeps coming up with new ideas at an age when others have retired from inventive thinking. I ask that the column be reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The column follows:

FRESH THINKING AND THE ILLINOIS ECONOMY

On July 15, one of my neighbors in Southern Illinois will turn 89. We can all learn from him.

He is Wayman Presley, who retired at age 65 as a mail carrier and started a travel business in rural Southern Illinois. It is now the fourth largest travel agency in the nation, doing many millions of dollars worth of business each year.

But that is not what is remarkable about Wayman Presley. He is one of the most creative persons I know. He erupts with ideas like Mt. St. Helens erupts with lava. Some are good; some are not so good. But the flow continues, and if you separate the good from the not-so-good, the result is fresh thinking on a whole range of subjects—thinking that is tempered with the wisdom that only time can provide.

His latest idea I at first dismissed as one of his weaker ideas, but there is a good possibility I was wrong.

This idea grew out of his childhood.

When he was a boy he would run a stick along a picket fence and he found he could count the clicks, even when he ran full-speed along the fence. He found he could count the stitches as his mother worked on a sewing machine. And in some way that he did not understand—and still does not—he found it helped him with his school work.

He has invented a simple plastic "Klickerstick" where students can do the same. He tested it with some students and it helped their school work.

A group called Applied Research Consultants had Professor Jack McKillip of Southern Illinois University test it.

They tested 508 fourth and fifth graders, half of whom used the Klickerstick and half of whom did not. After five weeks, the users tested 16.2 percent better than the nonusers, and a year later they tested 29.3 percent better.

Listening scores were much higher; logic was somewhat higher; and self-esteem had grown more.

Why?

I don't know the answer, nor does the professor at SIU, nor does Wayman Presley.

I am asking the National Institute of Education, the nation's federal education laboratory, to do further evaluation. It could be that Wayman Presley at the age of 88 has made his most significant contribution.

But even if it should not work out, Wayman Presley's example of thinking creatively is what we need as a nation, and what we particularly need in Illinois.

It is easy for a nation or a state or individual to "get in a rut."

We did not get a man to the moon by sticking to all of the old ideas; we had to venture forth.

If the United States is to stay competitive with the rest of the world, if we are to provide jobs for people, if we are to improve the quality of our education, part of the answers will come from new ideas, from fresh thinkers, from the Wayman Presley of this nation.

I'm proud to have him as an Illinois citizen.●

CABLE COMMUNICATIONS POLICY ACT OF 1984

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I was one of the cosponsors of section 705 of the Cable Communications Policy Act of 1984. I worked closely with Senator GOLDWATER, Congressmen ROSE and TAUZIN and others, to include this section which was intended to promote the greatest possible public access to the benefits of satellite technology.

I have been informed recently of two satellite program services, CNN and ESPN. At these prices home Earth station viewers are being charged a 1,000-percent markup over the price that cable television operators pay for these same signals. CNN and ESPN cite section 705 of the Cable Communications Policy Act of 1984 as support for their actions.

These marketing plans conflict directly with Congress' intention that marketing plans adopted pursuant to section 705 be the result of "good faith marketplace negotiations" for the development of a system for the sale of unscrambled signals to home satellite Earth station owners. There were no negotiations.

There can be no doubt that such negotiations are required. The committee report made clear Congress' intention concerning systems for marketing unscrambled signals:

Authorization for the viewing of unscrambled signals ". . . is made available pursuant to a marketplace negotiation. (House report H.R. 4103)

In my floor statement accompanying the introduction of that legislation, I also reiterated the requirement for marketplace negotiations:

The intention of the legislation is not to force programmers to establish a marketing program for home earth stations, but to make it clear that nothing in the legislation is meant to foreclose the establishment of a marketplace for the selling of such programming to home Earth station users in negotiations between parties . . . it must be done in good faith and not as a mechanism to deny home viewing of the satellite-delivered television programming.

The cosponsors of the Cable Communications Policy Act also made the requirements of marketplace negotiations plain:

It should be emphasized that the intention of section 705 is that if there is a marketing plan for unencrypted signals, it will be the result of good faith marketplace negotiation for the programming. The plan cannot be unilaterally imposed." (Senator Barry Goldwater—Chairman, Senate Communications Subcommittee)

. . . I believe that programmers can negotiate fair arrangements should they wish to market unscrambled signals. But no unrealistic or sham marketing plan can be tolerated. . . . (Congressman W.J. (Billy) Tauzin)

I believe Congress should keep an eye on this issue to make sure the paramount interest of the public in viewing of satellite television is not abused. My understanding is that any marketing plan must be negotiated in good faith and realistically designed to facilitate authorized viewing. (Congressman Charlie Rose)

It appears that satellite program suppliers are being coerced by cable television system operators to scramble satellite signals as soon as possible to stifle open competition between cable and the Earth station industry. CNN and ESPN have "offered" plans which would, effectively force home Earth station viewers to pay unreasonable fees to watch unscrambled signals as a prelude to scrambling.

I know that one or more trade associations or other representatives have been willing to negotiate a payment plan for the sale of satellite programming signals to the home Earth station viewer—it is appropriate that the parties be paid. But CNN and ESPN have chosen to ignore these representatives and seek to impose a marketing system adopted without any negotiation.

I am disappointed at the approach both CNN and ESPN have taken toward home Earth station viewers, particularly in light of the clear requirements of section 705. Consensus on the language included in section 705 was reached only after exhaustive negotiation with representatives of satellite programmers, cable interest and home Earth station users. It is a compromise of individual industry self-interests to benefit the public interest. The actions of CNN and ESPN seem to be a substantial breach of the good faith compromises which made possible the adoption of the Cable Communications Policy Act. It is my opinion that the marketing systems these programmers are attempting to impose unilaterally on home satellite Earth station viewers are inconsistent with section 705 of the Communications Policy Act, and therefore are invalid and have no effect.●

REMEMBERING ADLAI STEVENSON

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, nearly 30 years ago, Adlai Stevenson stirred many in this country when he challenged Dwight Eisenhower for the Nation's highest office. Later, he represented this Nation well as Ambassador to the United Nations. Through his years of public service, including those as Governor of Illinois, Adlai Stevenson was an example for all of us and he sparked an interest in politics among many of those unmoved to that point by the political scene. In a column I write for newspapers in my State, I have recognized Adlai Stevenson for his contributions on the 20th anniversary of his death. I ask to have that column reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The column follows:

REMEMBERING ADLAI 20 YEARS LATER

In July, the nation noted the 20th anniversary of the death of Gov. Adlai E. Stevenson, father of the former senator of the same name and the most prominent Illinois citizen on the national scene since Abraham Lincoln.

Looking back through those years, what did he contribute?

I speak with some prejudice since I had the good fortune to work with him a little. I was never part of any "inner circle," not a prominent player on his stage, but a bit player on the edges who had the chance to see and observe.

We are still too close in time to make many sweeping judgments, but a few conclusions can be safely drawn.

He contributed a "style" that brought into political life a whole generation of political leaders.

How often I have heard people say, "I got interested in politics after listening to Adlai Stevenson speak." He did it in the same way his rival and friend John F. Kennedy did. Both brought a sense of wordsmanship, challenge and vitality that appealed to many who were not turned on by the politics they had seen up to that point.

In a post-war period when there was a tendency on the part of many Americans to turn inward, to ignore the rest of the world, he spoke with an uncommon vision and understanding. He told us that the future of this nation would be increasingly entwined with the fate of other nations.

He spoke about arms control when we vaguely understood—but did not really understand—the immensity of the nuclear weapons power we would soon be amassing. He told us the course we were on—and are on—can only lead to the end of civilization. We listened a little; not enough.

As governor he practiced a combination of common sense and compassion. And he spoke about them as a national leader.

In the decades preceding Adlai Stevenson, Illinois had not been blessed with many honest governors. But to catalog him simply as an honest governor is to understate his leadership example.

Yes, he did order the state police to finally crack down on massive gambling and prostitution that many local officials around the state were paid to ignore.

But he also vetoed appropriations that were excessive and fought for programs that improved educational opportunities and helped the most disadvantaged in our society.

Perhaps it can be summed up by saying he appealed to the best in all of us.

Leadership can either pander to your fears and to the selfish that is part of all of us, or it can dream dreams and escalate hopes and make us work for those hopes, and we are better for having made the struggle even if we do not achieve all of our goals.

His funeral service was in a small Unitarian church in Bloomington, Ill. In a few benches sat the most powerful figures in the nation to pay him homage.

But the great homage we must pay is to remember.

To remember and to dream.

To create new goals and to appeal to one another not out of fear or greed, but to appeal knowing there is the spark of the noble in all of us, just as there is the beast in all of us.

If we appeal to the noble, we can achieve much for ourselves and even more for future generations.●

AL SHANKER—THE FUTURE OF AMERICA

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, one of the more remarkable leaders on the American scene today is Al Shanker, president of the American Federation of Teachers.

A few weeks ago, I read a speech of his which touched on many things that ought to be of concern to every Member of the House and Senate and to all serious thinking Americans.

He is talking about the future of our country, as we build it through education.

Al Shanker has shown remarkable courage in saying things that offend a few people, but things that need to be said.

From time to time, I may differ slightly on some viewpoints that he has, but clearly he is a leader in fact, as well as in name.

I urge my colleagues to read the speech that he gave to the New York State United Teachers Convention. It is filled with wisdom.

I ask that his remarks be printed at this point.

The remarks follow:

THE MAKING OF A PROFESSION

(By Albert Shanker)

I have spent more than 30 years standing before groups of teachers like this one, arguing for unionism, collective bargaining, better salaries and working conditions. Today I stand before you not to ask that we abandon these goals—far from it—but to argue that unless we go beyond collective bargaining to teacher professionalism, we will fail in our major objectives: to preserve public education in the United States and to improve the status of teachers economically, socially and politically.

It is unusual for me to be advocating professionalism. My experience with the way the word professional is used in schools has not been good. There was the long battle of "professional" versus "unionist," a battle we've largely won, to convince teachers that it was not unprofessional to work to improve their salaries and conditions through effective organizing, militant struggle and political action. And there was the way the word professional was used so often to beat teachers down. A few examples from my early teaching experiences will explain why I haven't liked the word very much.

I can remember my first exposure to it as a teacher. I started teaching in a very tough elementary school. I had great doubts as to whether I would make it, and, after a couple of weeks, the door was opened and the assistant principal stood there. I remember thinking, "Thank God, help is coming." I kept motioning him in, but he continued to stand there, sort of pointing at something, for what seemed like a very long time but was probably only 30 seconds. Finally he said to me, "Mr. Shanker, there are a couple of pieces of paper on the floor over there. It is very unsightly and very unprofessional." Then he left.

Soon thereafter I went to my first faculty conference. In those days not many men taught in elementary schools; there was only one other male teacher in that school. At the faculty conference the organizational chart of the school was distributed, including a schedule of duties—who had hall patrol, lunch patrol and so forth, including "snow patrol." Snow patrol, by tradition, was assigned to the male teacher. On snow days he gave up his lunch period and walked around outside the building, warning kids not to throw snowballs at each other. Sure enough, Mr. Jones and Mr. Shanker were now assigned to snow patrol. Mr. Jones raised his hand and was called on by the principal. The teacher said, "Now that there are two men on the faculty to handle snow patrol, would it be okay to rotate—you know, the first day of snow he goes, and the next day I go?" The principal frowned at him and replied, "Mr. Jones, that is very unprofessional. First of all, it is unprofessional because the duty schedule has already been mimeographed, as you see. Secondly, I am surprised that you aren't concerned that one child might throw a snowball at another and hit him in the eye, with permanent damage. It's very unprofessional of you."

So that was my second run-in with this new and unusual use of professional and unprofessional. The next came a short time later.

A teacher in Westchester County, New York, made national headlines, a man named James Worley, who had been teaching for many years. Principals had come and gone in his school, and all had had unreserved praise for James Worley. His file was loaded with marvelous recommendations.

Then a new principal arrived. One of his first acts was to require all the teachers in the school to submit detailed lesson plans two weeks in advance; such additional work, he asserted, was within their professional responsibilities. His colleagues complied, but Worley refused. He pointed out that he had been teaching successfully for many years and was regarded by supervisors, colleagues, parents and students as an excellent teacher. Of course he planned. He knew what material had to be covered and roughly when he would cover it. The submission of a lesson plan represented not only an attack on his dignity as a teacher, but a very wrong notion as to how effective education took place. Successful teaching depended on an interchange with the students, which might take more or less time, so that a specific plan and rigid adherence to it would not be the mark of a good teacher but, rather, of a poor one. At stake, Worley said, was his professional integrity.

The principal fired Worley for insubordination, and the school board upheld the firing, which was appealed unsuccessfully to the State Tenure Commission and then to the State Commissioner of Education, James V. Allen. At every stage the case made headlines, and every government body was flooded with letters. One of those that went to Commissioner Allen was from the writer Paul Goodman. Goodman includes it as an appendix in the 1982 Vintage edition of his book Growing Up Absurd. Here is what Goodman wrote about Worley and his "insubordination":

"In content, his original protesting action (refusing to prepare a two-week lesson plan) seems to me beyond doubt correct. I myself have taught every age from ten-year-olds through Ph.D. candidates and older adults; it has been my universal experience that formal preparation of a lesson plan beyond the next hour or two is not only unrealistic but can be positively harmful and rigidifying, for it interferes with the main thing, the contact between the teacher and his class. Worley's disagreement with the administrative order is, to me, simply evidence that he is a good teacher and knows what the right teaching relation is. A teacher who would seriously comply with the order would likely be a poor teacher. (Our model must always be the Socratic dialogue, for the aim is not to convey some information but to get the information across as part of the student's nature and second nature, so he can make an individual and creative use of it.) On the other hand, if the compliance is not serious it is a waste of time; and, as you know well, teachers are burdened with paper work, much of which is absolutely necessary.

"In form, his protest was certainly insubordinate. But obviously each of us has the moral and social duty to draw the line somewhere against obedience to error. Worley has drawn it at a very crucial point, namely, where the order interferes with the right performance of the job. In the end this is the sacred and final obligation of every professional, to do the work and to defend the conditions under which the work can be done well. . . .

". . . We cannot afford to throw away good teachers to save face for mistaken administrators. It is the glory of good administration precisely to smooth the path for objective work to proceed. Therefore I urge you to intervene in this case and reinstate Mr. Worley."

Goodman's and the other appeals fell on deaf ears. On March 24, 1960 Commissioner Allen issued his decision, upholding the firing on grounds that Worley was clearly insubordinate. It was regrettable, Allen said, that "the students have been deprived of the services of a teacher, regarded by nearly everyone as a superior teacher," but even worse that a poor example had been set of the kind of cooperation between teachers and administrators that is necessary for schools and, between other people, for the functioning of society.

So Worley stayed fired, and things have not changed much in the years since. Obeying orders is still more important than professional judgment, and insubordination is still the thing the principal can fire you for. It is still not a question of what is the right or wrong thing to do but, rather, of who has the power to tell whom what to do. We are a long way from being a profession, as many of us and the larger society understand that word.

And, yet, unless we get there, the public schools are going to continue to face disaster. The signs are clear and ominous.

Here in New York, a tuition tax deduction/credit bill is on the floor of the State Senate. Other states are moving in this direction. If such bills pass, it will just be the beginning of an annual fight in each legislature over the size of the tax break for nonpublic schools—and the corresponding decrease in the budget for public education. The appointments Ronald Reagan will make to the Supreme Court will not help.

The President and the Secretary of Education will keep pushing tuition tax credits and vouchers on the national scene. Only the huge budget deficit prevents a major national move at this time.

The polls show that about half the American public now supports tuition tax credits.

Private school enrollment nationally went from 10% of school-age children a decade ago to about 15% today, a huge 50% increase.

The school reform movement gave us a period of relief, more money, public concern, support from the political and business communities. But if there are no results, there will be a backlash against public education. Improvements in achievement are not easy to obtain, and they don't come fast.

We are in the same situation as the steel and automobile industries were 10 or 15 years ago. They could see the tough competition that was coming, but they were unable to take action quickly enough. We can see what's likely to happen to public education. One million teachers are going to have to be replaced in eight years. Even with more money and better conditions, we will not get the good teachers we need unless teachers are treated very differently than they are today. Bright college graduates are not going to come into our schools to teach unless they are treated as professionals. And without them we have very little hope of rescuing our own "industry." I am going to go into this at great length later, for I believe that professionalizing teaching in order both to attract the calibre of teacher that we need and give that person the optimum conditions to do the job is the most important issue facing American education today.

A REVOLUTION BEYOND BARGAINING

I believe there has to be a second revolution in American public education, one that builds upon the revolution we in the AFT made a quarter of a century ago when we plunged into collective bargaining. Collective bargaining has been a very powerful instrument. Through it we have increased teachers' salaries, limited class size, removed some of the more onerous non-teaching chores, given teachers a powerful political voice in their communities and in the country. Surely we cannot abandon it; if teacher salaries have slipped in recent years in relation to those of other occupations, think of how much more they would have slipped without that collective strength. Teachers need and must jealously guard the right to bargain collectively. And, yet, we have not been able to achieve all that we had hoped for through the bargaining process, and it is now time to go beyond it to something additional and quite different.

We learned early on that the negotiating process would not meet all of our needs. In New York City—and I daresay everywhere that a union represents teachers—we would go through a long process of listening to our members, usually at lunch and after-school meetings. We collected bargaining "demands," the items teachers wanted, often as many as 700 or 800. While some of these dealt with salary, class size and similar issues, many more had to do with professional matters, the items different groups of teachers—math teachers, English teachers, physical education teachers and others—wanted that would make their professional lives more satisfying.

Collecting the demands was one thing, getting them addressed, another. We went to the bargaining table under the assumption that boards of education would resist the salary demands but be open to a discussion of ways to reorganize the schools so that teachers and children would be happier and more productive. But quite the opposite was the case. Typically the school board said: You're a union. We'll be happy to talk with you about the salaries and working conditions teachers want. But we will not talk to you about anything that's good for children, because you weren't elected to represent the children. Professional issues are not subject to negotiation.

And so there we were. Teachers had gone from being weak and unorganized to being strong unionized employees with considerable power. But many of the issues they wanted to deal with could not be taken up at the negotiating table. Substantial improvements were made, but they fell short of creating the professional workplace that our members wanted then and want today.

If we are to achieve that professionalism, we have to take a step beyond collective bargaining—not to abandon it, but to build on it, to develop new processes, new institutions, new procedures which will bring us what teachers want in addition to what we get from collective bargaining: status, dignity, a voice in professional matters, the compensation of a professional. And I don't mean professional in the Orwellian sense in which it was used when I taught and is still often used today. A professional is not a person who merely follows orders. A professional is a person who is an expert, and by virtue of his or her expertise is permitted to operate fairly independently, to make decisions, to exercise discretion, to be free of most direct supervision. No one stands over a surgeon at the operating table, directing the surgeon to cut a little to the left or to the right. The surgeon is trusted to make the appropriate medical decision, and, of course, because of that trust and the expertise involved, is generally very well compensated. The question for us is: How do we get there, how do we achieve professional status, responsibility and salaries for teachers?

THE CHANGES IN AMERICAN WORK STYLES

American work and American workers have changed dramatically in the last thirty years or so, as those of us who served on the AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work learned in the course of our research. If I had asked my parents, "Why are you working?" they would have thought I was crazy; the only reason they were working was to feed and clothe and shelter the family. It never dawned on them to think of a job primarily in terms of pride or satisfaction. Today, however, the answers pollsters get when they ask the question are quite different. The first response is not: because I have to earn a living. Instead, people say something like this: because I'm able to express various interests that I have through my job; because I get satisfaction; because I am respected on the job; because I'm allowed to do my work the way I think best, and I do it very well, and I like that.

Moreover, when the pollsters went further and asked what workers thought of the boss, the answers were even more surprising. The expectation was that there would be a fair amount of hostility expressed. On the contrary, roughly 70% of all employees in the United States say that their boss is good to work for, helpful when presented with problems. They like working at their jobs. They think well of unions—but only for the worker down the block who has a rotten boss, not for themselves. They believe unions create adversarial relationships that bring rigid rules in their wake. Before you know it, says the typical worker, I won't be able to exercise the judgment that I now exercise; the rules will infringe upon my ability to do my job well, and I won't get the same amount of satisfaction from it.

So, more and more frequently in the industrial world workers—and they are educated workers these days—are being treated with dignity and respect. But not in the educational workplace—and not teachers. Teachers are not accorded the trust and confidence that are becoming routine in the modern factory; our schools are the last bastions of the rigid 19th century industrial hierarchy. Two recent efforts at major overhaul, one in education, the other in the automobile industry, are worth comparing.

As the education reform reports were being issued, the California Business Round Table, composed of the chief executive officers of the 80 or so largest corporations in that state, persuaded the legislature and the governor to enact major new education law. The state came up with $2.7 billion in new money for education over a two-year period, badly needed in the wake of Proposition 13—but also with a piece of legislation 150 pages long that prescribed for teachers what textbooks to use, how many hours students should be instructed in this subject and that subject, virtually everything that teachers were expected to do. There is no other occupation that is regulated in this way by state legislatures, and California is by no means unique. The Regents Action Plan in New York and the Part 100 Regulations designed to implement it suffer from the same apparent lack of confidence in teachers, as do similar plans in other states. (Some of this, of course, probably stems from the thinking that anyone willing to accept a job today at the low starting salaries of teachers bears careful watching!) The hazard of this approach, aside from the demoralization it creates within the ranks of existing teachers, is that no bright young self-directed college graduate will want to become a teacher, to enter a field in which there is no opportunity to exercise judgment or make professional decisions.

The American auto industry, on the other hand, has learned a valuable lesson from its Japanese competitors. Instead of supervising workers to death, rewarding the good ones and firing the bad ones—and later recalling the lemons that this poor procedure manufactures—Japan treats its workers differently. It accords them lifetime job security, and involves each and every one of them in constantly trying to make the system of production better. The result is that the Japanese, carefully consulting those who actually do the job, have discovered how to make the product right to begin with, which is far less expensive than the recall/remake process that American cars have gone through.

A couple of years ago, Myron Tribus, director of the Center for advanced Engineering Study at M.I.T., wrote and article entitled "Deming's Way" about the ideas of W. Edwards Deming, the father of Japanese quality control. It appeared in the Spring 1983 issue of New Management, published by the Graduate School of Business Administration at the University of Southern California. The Deming Manager, Tribus wrote, "believes that he and the workers have a natural division of labor: They are responsible for doing the work within the system, and he is responsible for improving the system. He realizes that the potentials for improving the system are never ending, so he does not call upon consultants to teach him how to design the 'best' system. He knows that doesn't exist. Any system can be continuously improved. And the only people who really know where the potentials for improvement lie are the workers themselves. . . .

"Under Deming's Way," Tribus continued, "the manager understands that he needs the workers not only to do work, but to improve the system. Thus he will not regard them simply as flesh and bone robots, but as thinking, creative human beings."

American industry is catching on. There is a true story about a Ford small truck plant that was so bad it was about to go out of business. But before closing it down, Ford decided to try the Japanese method. It would ask each worker what was wrong, how the procedure and the product could be improved. For example, one of the managers approached a worker who was working in a pit. He had a fairly heavy tool, and every 15 or 20 seconds or so as a new truck came by just above him on the assembly line, he would pull the trigger on the tool and tigthen a bolt. The manager came up to him and the conversation went something like this:

MANAGER. "Look, this place is going to close down soon unless we improve. So you've got nothing to lose, and I'm asking all the workers here about things that go wrong. Tell me honestly, Jack, when you try to tigthen these bolts, do you ever miss?"

JACK. "Yes, I do."

MANAGER. "How often do you miss?"

JACK. "Well, about every six minutes or so I don't tigthen one of the bolts."

MANAGER. "Why is that?"

JACK. "Well, it's a very hard job. You have to keep looking up all day and holding the tool, and I get a crick in my neck. And every once in awhile, I get a muscle spasm and my head jerks away so that I can't look up, and when the spasm has passed, so has the truck and I haven't tightened it. I feel bad about it, but there's nothing I can do."

MANAGER. "Do you have any ideas about what we can do?"

JACK. "Yes, I do. I've been thinking about this for a long time. There are really two things you can do. One is to put a little pedal under my foot so that every time I feel a crick, I press the pedal and the assembly line will stop for a second, and as soon as I shake off the crick, I would tighten the bolt. Of course, it would mean that every six minutes or so the assembly line would stop for a couple of seconds, but you would get all the bolts tightened. And the other thing is—could you have me standing on top of the truck holding this tool down, because that would be a lot easier and a lot more natural than looking up and holding the tool up?

That's what the Ford management did in that plant. It went around to all the workers and sought their ideas about solving problems. And then Ford redid the entire plant in accordance with the wishes of the employees. The result was that the plant became the best in the entire Ford Motor Company anywhere in the country. It's a classic case.

How much of that happens in schools? When a decision is made to change anything about the organization of a school, the curriculum, the materials or anything else, that decision is made by legislatures, state education departments, school boards, superintendents, principals. And as long as those who govern schools keep making this same mistake in thinking—that all they have to do is have supervisors watching the teachers to see who's good and who's bad and reward some and punish others—they're going to keep having the failures and the "lemons" who are "recalled" for remediation and dropout prevention. The only thing that's going to turn the schools around is to start turning the decision-making as to what works and what doesn't work over to the people who are actually doing the work and know what's happening in classrooms.

School managers have to understand that the enterprise benefits when people exert substantial control over their work environments. The May 13, 1985 issue of Fortune recounts a laboratory experiment, detailed in In Search of Excellence, the best-seller about successful management by Thomas J. Peters and Robert H. Waterman, Jr. The subjects were given some hard puzzles to solve and some proofreading to do, with a raucous radio tape as background accompaniment. Half were given a button to push if they wanted to stop the noise; the other half had no such button. The half with the button solved five times more puzzles and made a quarter of the proofreading errors of those with no button. But nobody ever pushed a button. "The mere fact that people perceived that they had a modicum of control over their destiny—the option of pushing the button—led to an enormous improvement in performance," wrote Fortune. The magazine then told the story of a Ford Motor assembly plant in Edison, N.J., which reads like a sequel to the story of Jack-in-the-pit that I just talked about. Here is what happened:

"Every person on the line in the huge facility was given access to a button that he or she could push to shut down the line—quite a gutsy move on the part of the plant manager. The results we're sharing occurred during the first ten months of the experiment (the results since then have been consistent with those at the start). To begin with—no surprise here—Edison, New Jersey, is not like an industrial psych lab. People push their buttons at Edison. To be precise, they shut the facility down 30 times the first day and about ten times a day thereafter. The ameliorating news is that after the first day the average shutdown lasted only about ten seconds—just time enough to make a quality adjustment, a tweak, a twist, a turn, to tighten up a nut or bolt.

"Productivity in the plant did not change. Three other indicators, however, are worthy of note. The number of defects per car produced dropped during the first months of the experiment from 17.1 per car to 0.8 per car. The number of cars requiring rework after they had come off the line fell by 97%. And the backlog of union grievances plummeted. Moreover, the change in attitude was as extreme as the numbers. One old pro on the line commented, 'It's like someone opened the window and we can breathe.'

"And along with the opened-up atmosphere came exactly the things you pray for: the side benefits of ownership. Story after story emerges of the following sort. There had traditionally been difficulties with seat-cover installation. A line employee worked up a method using Saran Wrap in appropriate places to increase slipperiness and thus make it easier to set covers. He did the entire experiment on his own, at home. He then brought the results to work and shared them with his colleagues."

The major struggle in education over the next period will be attracting and retaining good teachers, and unless there is this kind of change, we will lose it. Even if we were to get better salaries and some improvement in working conditions, intelligent, well-educated people today, people who have other options, will not work for long in a traditional type of factory, and that's what the public schools of this country are. They will not work in a place where they are not trusted, where they are time-clocked, where they're supervised, where they're observed, where they are treated as people to be pushed around and instructed and regulated. The future of education depends very heavily on making teaching a profession and giving teachers—like even the assembly line workers at Ford—a modicum of control over their environment.

WHAT DOES A PROFESSION MEAN?

What does it mean to have a profession, to be a professional? First, you cannot have a profession without high standards. Teaching does not have high standards today, nor is it perceived as having high standards. College professors will steer the brighter students away from careers in teaching because they're "too smart for that." We are not getting our share of such students because they don't want to go into a profession that reputedly anybody can get into, where the rites of passage are perceived as easy, undemanding, and where the job itself is often a way station on the road to something else. If I were the president of the American Federation of Ex-Teachers, I would have a much larger constituency. There are more ex-teachers than teachers—sometimes it seems that everyone out there, everyone I encounter when I walk down the street or check into an airport or do a television interview, is an ex-teacher. Why is that? How many ex-surgeons are there? How many people go through the trouble of becoming an actuary and then decide to do something else? Raising the standard of entry into the profession will attract many of the higher-caliber young people who are gravitating toward other careers; indeed, we have evidence in California, for example, that as soon as a tough teacher examination was announced, more people lined up to take it—and with more solid academic credentials—than had applied to teach in recent previous years.

Second, there is no profession without a knowledge base. I have not suggested that we should take the power away from school boards and superintendents and principals because we're teachers and we want more power; that isn't it at all. We ought to have the power to make the decisions because we know more—more about what is right and wrong to do in the education of children, more about what distinguishes a good textbook from a poor one, more about all sorts of issues in education. Some of these things we do know, some we don't yet and ought to develop. So raising the standards also means expanding the knowledge base and demonstrating that we have it.

Third, there is no profession without a well-established set of collegial relationships—not a set of supervisory relationships but a set of peer relationships. Doctors do not have an absolute right to do anything they want to do. No doctor is going to say to you: Well, any other doctor would give you the following pills and that would take care of the problem, but I don't like that—it's boring—so I'm going to give you something different and see what happens. Doctors don't behave that way. They act in accordance with a knowledge base and in accordance with what all of their peers expect on the basis of that knowledge.

Part of what we need to attract people into teaching is the development of this set of collegial relationships. Most people do not want to spend a working lifetime locked in a room with 25 to 35 children. While there is a certain amount of satisfaction in that, unless it is supplemented by the different satisfactions that come from a relationship with colleagues and adults and other professionals, the relationship with children exclusively leads to extreme isolation and drives many out of the classroom and away from the profession.

Fourth, there is no profession unless the practitioners are seen as acting in the interest of the clients. And here we have a problem. At one time we were viewed as quite powerless, given flowers for our lapels on Teacher Recognition Day, patted on the head. Then along came this adversarial procedure known as collective bargaining. The pendulum has swung, and virtually no one now views teachers as being pattable on the head—the pooch barks, and even bites. We tend to be viewed today as though we are acting only in our own self interest. Teachers want better salaries and smaller classes so their lives can be made easier. (The public rarely considers that what we want may be good for children.) That image is standing in the way of our achieving professional status. We must act on behalf of our clients and be perceived as acting that way.

We have a decision to make. We can continue working away only at collective bargaining. But if that is our decision, I predict that in 10 or 15 years from now we will find that we have largely been on a treadmill. In good years we will make some gains and in bad years we will have to work very hard just to hold onto them, just to stand still. But right now there is low pay, linked to low standards, linked to an absence of trust, because you can't trust people who are willing to work for so little and have been brought in on those low standards. All this leads to an excess of supervision and to generally low prestige. On a national basis that's where teachers are in mid-1985. This situation has to be changed. Teachers must be viewed as professionals, as experts whose judgment can be counted on, who act on behalf of their clients, who are not supervised and rated and evaluated constantly, who have a peer relationship with other teachers.

There are some steps that ought to be taken, and some of them we can take ourselves. I am going to list five ideas. There are undoubtedly others.

1. A national teacher examination

Last January I proposed that there be a tough national teacher examination, similar to those for the bar and for medicine. This would not be a government examination. Rather, it would be devised initially by a commission composed of outstanding people in education and perhaps similarly qualified people in the other professions who have had some experience in administering professional examinations. Ultimately there would be a national Teacher Professional Practices Board, composed of the practitioners themselves, to update and administer the exam, but at the beginning it would be useful to have well known experts, so that the examination would get wide publicity that would increase the pressure on states and local districts to require it for certification.

The exam would consist of three parts. First there would be a stiff test of subject matter knowledge—not the cheap type of examination that can be machine scored but, rather, something that requires candidates to think and to write and to organize their thoughts and be able to persuade. The second part, probably given on a different day, would test knowledge of pedagogy, educational issues, the ability to apply educational principles to many different student developmental needs and learning styles. And the third part of the examination would be an internship program of from one to three years in which teachers would actually be evaluated on the basis of how well they work with students and with their colleagues.

With the exception of "A Nation of Risk" nothing in education in the past five or six years has gotten as much attention and editorial support as my proposal of a demanding national examination. Indeed, I believe that the next few months will see the launching of the commission to develop such an examination. But aside from having touched a sensitive public nerve, the idea is getting support because we have put ourselves and our union on the line in behalf of it. In the National Press Club speech, I said that within a few years after the establishment of such an examination, the American Federation of Teachers would refuse to accept into membership any newly hired teacher who had not passed the exam. I was signalling the public that we, the teachers, care about the quality of teachers, that we care about what happens in schools, that we are even prepared to make an organizational sacrifice in terms of not recruiting into membership or collecting the dues of people who do not meet the standards.

The day after that speech I went out to Utah, where we are organizing teachers. The morning I arrived in Utah, the local headline said, "Union Boss Supports Teacher Tests." I spoke at a couple of places in Salt Lake City, and the next day the headline said, "Speaker Reiterates Support for National Test." By the third day, the headline said, "Educator Supports Teacher Testing." Within three days I went from being a union boss to being an educator, and that's what this is all about—what our role is going to be and how the public sees us.

2. Expanding choices for parents, students and teachers

I believe that we in the teacher union movement ought to support the greatest possible choice among public schools by parents, students and teachers. The current system of placing kids in school on the basis of geography is one that was designed a long time ago, when most people who sent their children to school were not educated and wouldn't have been able to make an informed decision about a school; parents looked up to teachers and accepted the authority of government. But times have changed, and most of the public is just as well educated as teachers, some more educated. The day of automatic agreement that one's child will attend such and such school is over; parents shop for public schools when they move to a different community, and many will seek nonpublic alternatives if what they regard as a decent public school is not available to them. Students who drop out or attend high school only sporadically may be telling us not necessarily that they don't want school at all but that they don't want the particular school they're going to. Attendance is much higher and dropout rates are much lower in those public schools—vocational and option academic high schools—that students themselves have chosen to go to.

We now permit some choice among junior high and high schools within a single school district. Why not expand that, and permit much greater choice within the district and even across some district lines? I am talking about offering parents and students more options, not about conferring legal rights or instituting some sort of voucher system. In most school districts today, when a parent seeks a waiver of bureaucratic rules for a child to attend a school different from the one assigned—a school that is not an available option—the answer is generally no. Such a request creates more paperwork, and bureaucracies tend to be insensitive to requests for individual treatment. But the bureaucracy must be moved to be more flexible. The more public school choices we offer parents and students, the better are our arguments against destructive schemes like tuition tax credits and vouchers. Wider public school choice will very substantially negate the argument for giving money to parents to send their children to private schools. Incidentally, this is not as revolutionary as one might think: a number of school systems in Massachusetts which started out attracting kids to "magnet" schools for purposes of integration are now using choice as the primary means of placing students in schools, and there is a sort of friendly competition among the schools in a district for youngsters. Surely a competition among public schools, where everyone competes under the same ground rules, is a lot healthier than a private versus public competition which is inherently unequal and unfair because the rules don't apply to all.

I discussed earlier that idea that a professional must be seen to be acting in the interests of the client. But most clients choose the professionals they see—a doctor, a lawyer, an accountant. Children are the only clients who are perceived as the captives of the professionals who deal with them, captives of a given school and teacher. If, as occasionally happens, there is poor chemistry between a teacher and a student, even a within-school choice ought to be available. It is not in that student-client's interest to be stuck with the same teacher all year—and, by the way, it is not in the teacher's interest either. Suppose, for example, that a tired and pressured teacher snaps at a young child. The child goes home, refuses to eat, resumes an old pattern of bedwetting and won't come to school over the succeeding days. Of course, there is value in having a child learn that in the real world one has to get along with many different people, but there are times when that won't work, when the particular child is just not ready for that particular lesson. And while it's not the job of the school to replicate the comforting bosom of the family, nevertheless there has to be concern and a humane orientation. Here, too, flexibility is critical. The child should be given another teacher.

Expanding public school choice—within schools, among schools in a district, among districts—would go a long way toward reducing the resentment, toward getting rid of the notion that people are captives.

Nor should choce be restricted to parents and students. Teachers need and deserve more options than they now have. For example, while there is much talk in education today about career ladders, those who recommend them for teachers haven't really taken a hard look at what passes for career ladders in the business world. Very few people, even in giant corporations, move straight up a ladder within one firm. Typically a person starts working for one company, gets some experience and a good reputation and maybe even a promotion or two. But pretty soon he or she is lured away by some other company, often with a salary increase and other "perks" as well as new and bigger responsibilities. That pattern repeats itself, and by mid-life the executive may well have worked for half a dozen businesses, improving her salary and status all along the way.

But teachers are stuck. If a 10-year teacher attempts to move to another school district, he or she will almost invariably find that the new district will not credit more than a fraction of that prior experience toward salary. Even if the new district has a better salary schedule, therefore, the incoming teacher is likely to lose or, at best, to stand still. He may also lose pension credit. Teaching may be the only occupation in this country where if you move voluntarily from one place to another, you have to suffer for it—the only occupation you have to leave in order to improve your lot. And that situation is probably another vestige of a time when schools could get smart women teachers on the cheap because women had few other career options. One of the elements of widening choice in public schools ought to be freedom for teachers to move around without penalty. Just as we ought not to lose students to private schools because of lack of sufficient choice in public education, we ought not to lose teachers to other jobs because they have no real mobility in teaching. And, of course, in failing to grant full credit for prior public school experience, school districts also prevent themselves from competing for talented teachers from other districts. I don't know of any business that could stay in business very long if it denied itself the opportunity to compete for talent. We ought to be pointing out to the business community this very unbusiness-like bind that school districts and teachers are in, captives just as much as children denied more choice in schools.

3. A professional teacher board

One of the things we might do to bring about the needed revolution does not require local, state or national legislation. We could create—perhaps first through a coalition of locals, then regionally within a state and eventually even on a statewide basis—a "Professional Teacher Board." It would be made up of outstanding teachers, selected through a process which we would develop. The board would be independent, even though initially appointed by the union, in the same sense that the Supreme Court of the United States is independent even though the justices are appointed by presidents—and most presidents have been surprised by the actions of their appointees.

The purposes of this professional board would be many. Let me suggest a few:

It would develop standards and an ethical code for the profession. It would, for example, administer the national teacher examination on a state level. It could inspect the practice of out-of-license teaching, which may be inimical to the idea of high subject area qualifications determined by examination. It could determine that, beyond ascertaining that the truth has been fairly reached, a union does not have the obligation of defending a teacher against discharge based upon immoral or criminal conduct; the board might well determine that there is certain immoral conduct toward children—child abuse, for example—which would prompt the board itself to seek a teacher's discharge and the revocation of certification.

The board could handle various types of complaints from parents. For example, is a teacher propagandizing for a particular point of view rather than teaching the various sides of a controversial political issue objectively—that is, teaching students to think? To what extent, in such cases, is academic freedom infringed upon?

The board could set up procedures to evaluate textbooks. Textbook selection is a national disgrace. Textbooks are selected by school boards who have no knowledge at all of what makes a good textbook. There are various trends—short, easy to read sentences that can rob a book of meaning or interest; the required inclusion of various gender, racial and ethnic references so that all groups are accounted for; demands for the elimination of evolution and inclusion of creationism. No one seems to be asking whether the book is a good textbook; whether students can read and understand it; whether, if a student has missed the lesson, he can understand the material from reading the book at home; whether the illustrations are clear and properly captioned; whether the questions which are asked are the questions that will help the student comprehend.

There is a new knowledge base about textbooks. Teachers who have studied it (and others who will) should be able to stand up before a school board or other body and demonstrate what's right and what's wrong about a textbook from a highly authoritative standpoint, much as a doctor or lawyer might explain the fine points of a case to a group of laymen. This kind of knowledge is power. The teacher professional board could establish a committee of such knowledgeable teachers to evaluate the textbooks, make this kind of analysis and earn the kind of professional respect that precedes professional empowerment.

Finally, like all other professional boards, the professional teacher board should be prepared to play an honest part when the question of incompetence is raised. If a teacher in a given school district is brought up on charges of incompetence, the board ought to select three outstanding teachers from somewhere else in the state who do not know either the teacher or the supervisor involved. That group of three should visit the teacher so accused and issue an independent report that evaluates the judgment of the principal or other supervisor. Of course, in order for this procedure to work, the three teachers have to be absolutely independent, the only direction from the union being that they're on jury duty as professional jurors and are to call it as they see it as teachers and as professionals.

What I am talking about is a process of peer appeal. The teacher would still have the right to a hearing panel and to go to court. But I see four possible scenarios that might be played out: (1) both the teacher and the supervisor agree in writing that the decision of the teacher review panel is binding; (2) the teacher agrees but the principal refuses, in which case the refusal of the principal to allow a trio of outstanding teachers to review the decision should be taken into account by any existing panel in law; (3) the principal agrees but the teacher refuses, in which case that refusal ought also to be taken into account by the existing panel in law, and (4) both parties refuse in which case existing procedures are followed without the intervention of the teacher review panel.

I am not proposing an abandonment of due process. Due process means that the decision of the supervisor is subject to outside review. I am suggesting that outstanding professionals from within teaching but from outside the immediate situation are just as equipped as—indeed, probably more so than—a panel of outside lawyers or other citizens to do an honest and professional job.

This could, of course, be the most controversial function of the teacher professional board, but we do not have the right to be called professionals—and we will never convince the public that we are—unless we are prepared honestly to decide what constitutes competence in our profession and what constitutes incompetence and apply those definitions to ourselves and our colleagues.

4. A different kind of career ladder

Most of the teacher career ladder proposals I've seen are merely devices to give a handful of people more money than others. Many, perhaps most, are a kind of cover-up for merit pay. I'm not opposed to a career ladder in principle, if somebody can come up with a real one. And there is something that might be called a career ladder that does make sense.

We have been talking about some new roles for teachers. For example, we have said that no new teacher should just be dumped into a classroom to sink or swim, with essentially the same responsibilities the first day on the job as the teacher will have 20 or 30 years into a career. We have talked about a real internship and I've called for it as part of the certification process. A good internship program, of course, will be conducted by experienced teachers, the veterans who have the most to offer the rookies, and, as in our AFT local in Toledo, Ohio, these senior teachers will play a role not only in the training of the new teachers but in determining which pass muster. Since the training of teachers is at least in part the responsibility of colleges and universities, I propose that the teachers who train newcomers during an internship period be given official employment status and rank on the faculties of area institutions of higher education that offer teacher training programs.

This would have a number of immediate benefits. First, the teacher trainers would receive additional compensation, some of which would come from the college or university; in Toledo the outstanding teachers who are selected to train others serve for a limited period and are replaced with outstanding others, so there would be an opportunity for many to be part of such a program. Second, there would be an automatic change in the image and status of such teachers and undoubtedly some spillover in the public mind to elementary and secondary teachers in general. Third, one of the most valid criticisms of colleges of teacher education is that courses are given by many people who have never themselves taught in elementary and secondary schools but, rather, are scholars and theorists. Clearly we still need the theorists and the researchers, but such faculties ought to be leavened by those who have had considerable classroom experience and continue to practice in the classroom. Such linkage would make that possible. For that matter, there would be considerable overlap in the functions, since the classroom teacher has a built-in opportunity to engage in research in his or her own school setting.

Moreover, there is no reason to limit university employment status to classroom teachers who train other teachers. We have said that teachers expert in textbooks should be the ones to evaluate and select them, largely because they are the people who use them in classrooms and know what makes sense and what doesn't, know a textbook that does the job from one that doesn't. Why shouldn't such teachers who are engaged in textbook evaluation at the school or district level also give the courses that teach teachers-to-be how to do this? Or, as another example, what of the teachers who are designing curriculums? Isn't this a skill appropriately learned, at least to start, at the university level? Why shouldn't the curriculum creators impart their knowledge and experience to those studying to be teachers?

Education may be the only profession in which the practitioners ultimately say that very few of their professional preparatory courses actually prepared them for the realities of the job. Isn't this a way to get more beef into the teacher education program—and at the same time to provide some upward mobility to classroom teachers . . . without taking them out of the classroom for good? And isn't that what a career ladder should be all about?

Furthermore, this continuity between the practice of teaching and the academic training of the next generation of teachers will constitute another step toward professionalism. Legions of doctors and lawyers both practice their profession and teach in the institutions which train their future colleagues. It is a major hallmark of a true profession.

5. Restructuring the delivery of education

It is time to consider a wholesale restructuring of the way in which educational services are delivered, for teaching will not be a genuine profession unless such restructuring is accomplished.

There are two million public school teachers in the United States. Half of them will retire and be replaced in the next decade. The cohort of those who will be entering college is about 20 percent smaller than the equivalent cohort a decade ago, and more of them, proportionately, will be minority young people who have not yet achieved the same rate of academic success as their nonminority peers. There is going to be a talent shortage in this country, and, given the increased demand for talent by new and revamped industries and by other agencies of government, there is very little chance that public education will get enough career teachers of the caliber we need in terms of the new standards we are calling for. The demographics are against us.

So are the economics. We know that vastly increased teacher salaries will be needed to recruit and retain good teachers. But if you were to give two million teachers each a thousand dollar raise, the cost would be $2 billion. Of course, a thousand dollar increase doesn't do very much—it certainly wouldn't solve the recruitment and retention problems. Suppose we gave each teacher a 50 percent increase. That would still not make us a very well paid profession, but it would cost $30 billion. Title I at its highest point was about $3.5 billion, so there is no likelihood at all of giving two million teachers a 50 percent raise. And it wouldn't do much good either, because as soon as we raise salaries substantially, so will IBM and other talent-intensive companies, because they are not about to close up shop just because the schools need teachers.

So we are not going to get either the talent or the money to replace a million teachers soon and another million some years later. What do we do? Part of the answer is to consider what it is that teachers do and whether part of it can be accomplished in some other ways, freeing teachers to do what only they can, tasks akin to what genuine professionals do, perhaps a smaller number of career teachers earning genuinely professional salaries, say in the $75,000-$85,000 range in 1985 dollars. Let me suggest a structure.

Three of the major education reports in the wake of "A Nation at Risk" dealt with what actually goes on in classrooms, those by Ernest Boyer, Theodore Sizer and John Goodlad. Enormously sympathetic to teachers, they nevertheless were extremely critical of how teachers teach. They found that most teachers spend an inordinate amount of their teaching time, up to 85 percent, lecturing, with very little exchange with a students. And, of course, since most teachers' lecture styles are not as entertaining as the previous evening's television fare, the attention span of the students (or even adults, for that matter) is not very long. Now, some of what teachers are lecturing about today can be dealt with much more effectively with the new technology. A well-produced half-hour video cassette on how the Eskimos live in Alaska is likely to communicate memorable information much better than any lecture, and in a medium which has already grabbed today's students from infancy on. The technology is here. Either we will seize it and use it to our advantage—to free teachers for what it is they can do uniquely, professionally—or it will be imposed on us in some unthinking attempt to replace some teachers without improving the work lives, status or salaries of the others.

Suppose that in addition to the technology there were substantial numbers of very bright college graudates who came into teaching for a variety of reasons—to repay a college loan, meet a scholarship commitment, fulfill some personal idealism in the same way people went into the Peace Corps—but who did not intend to stay more than five years or so. And suppose that a good deal of the normal classroom work were turned over to these very bright and idealistic "transients" who would not be regarded as career teachers, who would not have quite the same rites of passage into the profession (but would, nevertheless, have to demonstrate smarts and skills), who would be trained by the career teachers and work under their guidance and mentorship—and who could, of course, should they ultimately want to, pursue a path to the level of career teacher.

Who would the career teachers be, and what could their lives be like? first of all, they would be people who intended to make teaching their life's work and who got into the profession only with great difficulty, by meeting all of the very high standards I discussed earlier. They would be engaged not mainly in lecturing students but in actively coaching students, teaching thinking skills, stimulating creativity, working with students on rewriting papers, helping students learn to reason, argue and persuade. No machine can replace good teachers in these tasks, yet given the reality of life in today's public schools, the best teachers are left with too little time to perform them. In Horace's Compromise Ted Sizer talks about the typical high school teacher with anywhere from 150 10 175 students to see every day, and how it is virtually impossible to assign even two written pieces a week. Assuming 10 minutes per student per paper—a ridiculously small amount of time to mark the paper and go over it with the student—two themes a week would require 58 hours. Part of the restructuring I've proposed would be to ensure that teachers have far fewer students and are able to spend an appropriate amount of time with each. In addition, the career teachers would train the novice teachers, evaluate textbooks, select other materials, design curriculums, serve on the professional practice boards that set and monitor the standards for the profession, be part of university faculties and engage in a variety of other activities both with students and with their colleagues.

There would not be two million such career teachers. The numbers would be substantially smaller, perhaps only a third as many. But such teachers would earn $75,000 to $85,000 a year in today's terms. They would be true professionals in every sense of the word. And we would have created a delivery system in which the public could have a substantial amount of confidence, because both the career teachers and the "transient" teachers would have been selected only from among the best and brightest college students and, too, schools would be structured in such a way that important goals which are not being addressed well today—the teaching of critical thinking skills, for example, or the selection of first-rate textbooks—would be fully realized.

There is much more we could do to restructure schools and create a profession. Why shouldn't teachers have the capacity to teach from their strengths? Some elementary school teachers have a particular bent for math, others would prefer to focus on the teaching of reading skills. Why shouldn't teachers be able to trade off with their colleagues, not only in different subjects but in different aspects of the same subject; some teachers have a particular knack for teaching writing, while others are especially talented in stimulating an appreciation of poetry—why must both kinds be English teachers and do everything? Doctors and lawyers don't have difficulty in recommending colleagues with different specialties and different strengths.

Another major change would be to restructure our school calendar into shorter time units, perhaps terms no longer than six weeks, in which less material and fewer concepts are fully taught. This would give teachers and students a better opportunity to zero in on anything gone amiss. The longer the wait, the harder it is to tell what's wrong—and waiting a year makes such analysis untimely and correction harder. That's why some students drop farther and farther behind. If we empowered teachers to improve the system—like Deming's managers—they might consider using time in much more varied ways, moving youngsters along at their own pace. The rigid school year encourages youngsters (and sometimes teachers) to follow the Scarlet O'Hara path—"I'll think about it tomorrow." After all, missing a few days in September or October doesn't seem very important when the reckoning doesn't come until June, but often by December a child is too far behind to catch up, and the syndrome of failure sets in. Creative thinking on the shape of the school year is long overdue.

There are undoubtedly many other good ideas for our schools, and classroom teachers, if they have the opportunity, will come up with some of the best. But change is overdue. Our schools are organized today exactly the way they were a century ago. Other institutions are finding different and better ways to operate for these different times. We can continue, through collective bargaining, to make some incremental changes in salaries, in the size of classes and in some other areas. But if that's all we do, we are likely to draw into teaching ever lower segments of the talent pool, with disastrous results for us, for our students, for public education and for the country.

I am convinced that we will not attract the best and the brightest who are graduating today if teachers continue to be treated as they currently are, as workers in an old-fashioned factory who may not exercise judgment and discretion, who are supervised and directed by everyone from the state legislature down to the level of the school principal. In order to turn that around, we have to take a number of serious steps such as those I've discussed.

Many of us will ask how—even whether—these changes will be accepted by our members. They are huge and revolutionary. But this is not the first time we've had a vision of what needed to be done. How many thought a quarter of a century ago that more than half a million teachers would join a union? We did. How many thought that government bodies would sit at the table and deal with us as equals? Or allow a dispute between the "sovereign" government and public "servants" to be argued on the merits and decided by outside impartial arbitrators? We who lead teachers were once only a handful of believers with a vision, but we accomplished what most thought impossible. Now we have a new vision, but with the same goals.

Some weeks ago I heard a fascinating speech by a Terence Deal, a writer who specializes in organizational cultures. He talked about the difference between teachers and other employees. He had walked into a nationally known cosmetics company, approached someone who turned out to be a secretary and asked, "What do you do here?" Instead of telling him about her job, she talked about what a wonderful company it was, how they were increasing sales, how they had opened a big Latin American branch and would move into the European market within two years. She was filled with enthusiasm and clearly felt she was playing a very important part in her company. Then Deal visited IBM and bumped into someone who was obviously cleaning the place. Again he asked, "What do you do here?" And this custodial fellow started talking about IBM, how it's the greatest company in the world, how they were going to be first with a new chip and what sort of computer would be next. Clearly the man had a tremendous sense of pride and felt important and integral to the operation of IBM. Then Deal walked down a few blocks and into a local school. He approached someone and asked his question, "What do you do here?" "Oh," said the person, "I'm only a teacher."

We have to take the steps that will make teaching a true profession, so that when someone walks into a school and asks what a person does, no one will ever again reply, "I'm only a teacher."●

HERBERT M. DAVIDSON: A CHAMPION

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, we lost a remarkable man last Thursday—July 25—with the passing of Herbert M. Davidson, publisher of the Daytona Beach, FL, News-Journal and inveterate champion of people's rights and interests.

My first impression of Mr. Davidson was that he was a man of humanity and conscience, and that view never changed over the years, Those qualities were reflected in the pages of his newspaper and in everything he did. The deep respect and admiration he enjoyed were well earned, and there will always be a special place reserved for him in the memories of those who had the opportunity to know him well.

A full accounting of his life and contributions in his 89 years would be impossible, but I would like to recognize some highlights, using some excerpts from last Friday's edition of the newspaper he developed with his father and edited for over half a century:

He was a gentle, stubborn, dedicated and visionary man whose principles became a part of his community.

The Civic League of the Halifax Area described Herbert Davidson as a man of "consummate honesty, absolute integrity and indomitable courage" and gave him its distinguished service award in 1970.

The Florida Bicentennial Commission honored him in 1976 as one of Florida's patriots, saying he "made the world a better place to live." The commission particularly cited Mr. Davidson's courage and integrity as an editor, his battles against bad government and corrupt politicians, and his leadership on behalf of better black-white relations.

Mr. Davidson was honored throughout the South for his leadership in the quest for racial justice. He was a life fellow of the Southern Regional Council and had been president of the Florida Council on Human Relations.

Mr. President, Herbert Davidson had an unrequited love for journalism, showing up at the office daily right up to the day of his death. A little about his outstanding career.

While a student at Columbia University School of Journalism, he worked at the Kansas City Star, later started a military weekly while in the Army overseas in World War I, then gained experience on the Portland Journal and Los Angeles Examiner before he and his wife, Liliane, traveled Europe, earning expenses writing for six newspapers back home. Mr. Davidson worked awhile with the Paris bureau of the International News Service, then returned to work for the Chicago Daily News:

Mr. Davidson became a friend of the late Clarence Darrow and, at the famed defense attorney's special request, he was sent in 1925 by the Daily News to cover the Scopes "monkey trial" in Dayton, TN.

He and his father took over the Daytona Beach newspapers in December 1928:

Mr. Davidson's editorial wars against political corruption in the late 1920's and early 1930's toppled a political ring whose leaders had bragged: "We own the jail!" Led by the News-Journal, voters who once had been gripped by fear turned out the rascals at City Hall and brought reformers in.

Because News-Journal reporters were denied access to City Hall records then, Floridians today have a right to "see the books." Editor Davidson and his father fought all the way to the State Supreme Court to win a 1934 landmark decision affirming the rights of Florida citizens to inspect public records.

Mr. Davidson was arrested twice on the issue of press freedom—in 1952 and 1971—in cases that were first steps toward the U.S. Supreme Court decision which overturned the infamous "right to reply" law.

Herbert Davidson chaired the committee that led in 1949 to the establishment of the University of Florida's journalism school, and he persuaded Rae Weimer to come South from New York to become the first dean of what became one of the Nation's finer colleges of journalism and communications.

Yes, he left his mark on journalism, but he also used his talent and resources constantly for the community:

His newspapers supported symphony orchestras and sports programs alike. They insisted on first class public education. They helped Bethune-Cookman College, Daytona Beach Community College and Embry-Riddle Aeronautical University to flourish. They made city beautification household words, did all they could to strengthen business and encourage the fine arts, and helped countless charity drives to go over the top.

And here's final testimony to his wisdom:

He was a lifelong Democrat whose heroes included Franklin D. Roosevelt, Hubert Horatio Humphrey, and Adlai Stevenson. Mr. Davidson championed the Democrats because he believed they had the best interests of the ordinary people of the United States—and the world—at heart.

Herbert M. Davidson will be sorely missed.●

WLADYSLAW WYRWA

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues in support of S. 1467, legislation introduced by Senator BOSCHWITZ and endorsed by Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, Elliott Abrams, that I have been happy to cosponsor. This bill requires that Wladyslaw Wyrwa, a Polish national who helped numerous Jews escape the Nazis during World War II, shall be considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence.

Put very simply, Mr. Wyrwa is a hero, a Polish Catholic who has received the highest medal of honor from Yad Vashem, the Israeli Government's Holocaust Memorial. Such merit and distinction, however, may very well cause this individual great difficulty if he is forced to return to Poland.

Mr. Wyrwa came to this country in 1981 at the invitation of some of those whose lives he saved. He found employment among their friends, settled in New York, and has come to feel that the United States is his true home. In the words of Assistant Secretary of State Abrams:

I don't know how you repay someone for the heroism he showed during the Holocaust, but surely it is not too much to ask that we let him live here in the United States if he does not want to return to Poland.

This is legislation of outstanding merit. I urge my colleagues to give it their full and enthusiastic support.●

HERBERT SCOVILLE, JR.

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise to note with great sadness the passing yesterday of Herbert "Pete" Scoville, Jr., outstanding scholar, dedicated public servant, and a wise and eloquent advocate for arms control.

Pete Scoville was blessed with extraordinary talents and during his rich and productive life he served our Nation in many capacities. He was one of our leading scientists; a man who worked as a pioneer in nuclear energy and weapons research. He also served with great distinction at the Central Intelligence Agency and as an Assistant Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.

After leaving Federal service, Pete Scoville dedicated himself full-time to the task of educating the American people and public officials about the nature of nuclear weapons, the dangers of an unbridled arms race, and the absolute necessity of a broad national effort to establish arms control as a fundamental element of our national security policy.

It is important to emphasize that Pete Scoville was not a convert to the cause of arms control. He was not one of those scientists who first participated in the development of weapons of mass destruction and later, having recoiled from the results of their work, regretted their earlier activities. Pete Scoville did not have to undergo such a conversion because he always realized the importance of arms control and advocated it. His voice must have been a fairly lonely one in the early 1950's at the Pentagon, calling for a nuclear test ban treaty. Nevertheless, he never let up in his principled struggle to infuse our armaments policies with sanity.

He helped us all to understand that our Nation's security cannot be guaranteed by building more weapons of increased sophistication. A sane national security policy has to rest on a judicious balance between arms modernization policies and vigorous arms control efforts. These two elements are not mutually exclusive, in fact they must mutually reinforce each other.

We, who are Members of Congress, owe a particularly important debt to Pete Scoville. He was often with us on Capitol Hill, testifying at hearings, or educating a legislator one-on-one. His articles, books, and other works form a valuable contribution to the arms control debate. As a member of several of our most distinguished arms control advocacy groups he shares the credit for the enormous influence these groups have had on our public debate about this most crucial issue.

Mr. President, today when we are called upon to advance billions of dollars against vague promises for a new weapons system that rightfully belongs on the pages of a science fiction novel rather than on the drawing boards of our engineers, it may be instructive to recall these words Pete Scoville wrote 16 years ago:

All manner of fantastic new systems are being designed every day; new submarines, thousands of mini-missiles spread all over the nation, new large missiles buried in rock mountains, new supersonic bombers armed with missiles. The expenditures required to develop these future technological dreamchildren will make present costs pale by comparison.

How sadly correct he was.

Pete Scoville had his home in Connecticut, therefore my State feels a special loss with his departure. Beyond that, our Nation lost a great and dedicated scientist, a wise teacher. I dedicate these brief remarks to his memory with gratitude for his outstanding service.●

THE LINE-ITEM VETO

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an excellent editorial appearing in Idaho's largest newspaper supporting the line-item veto.

On July 26, the Idaho Statesman stated that "corraling the Federal deficit seems to be a job that is beyond Congress' control," a fact which justifies giving the President the line-item veto.

Idaho's senior Senator JIM MCCLURE and I have long supported the line-item veto and will continue to do so as long as Congress continues to demonstrate its inability, or lack of will, to reduce Federal spending.

The editorial also points out that 43 States, Idaho included, have given their Governors the line-item veto. So far, none of those States have experienced the horrors that line-item veto opponents claim will beset the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I ask that this excellent editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the Idaho Statesman, July 26, 1985]

WHERE WE STAND: WEAK CONGRESS DENIES REAGAN POWER HE NEEDS

Corraling the federal deficit seems to be a job that is beyond Congress' control—a prime reason why President Reagan should be given the power to veto parts of discretionary spending bills.

But a bill that would have given the president the line-item veto fell victim to a filibuster in the Senate and has been pulled from further consideration. That's bad news. A Congress that is proving daily its inability to reduce federal spending significantly at least should have given the president the power it refuses to exercise.

Forty-three governors, including Idaho's John Evans, have the line-item veto, which allows them to say no to specific portions of a bill. But the president must either accept or reject an entire bill. Congress has a habit of tacking on myriad riders and amendments to spending bills, often forcing the president to swallow a lot of pork with important legislation.

The issue here is responsibility. As Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., "When 100 senators and 435 representatives have primary responsibility for the budget, no one is adequately responsible." That's been painfully obvious this year as budget-cutting rhetoric gave way to more spending. Someone needs to take responsibility for reducing the deficit and the president is the logical one.

Opponents, such as Sen. Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., maintained that giving the president the line-item veto would damage the delicate balance of power between the executive and legislative branches. The president could wreak political mischief, opponents say, by holding a local works project captive for a favorable vote on an issue dear to the president. But such game-playing goes on now, with congressmen tagging unrelated riders onto crucial spending bills.

If Congress had to limit its bills to specific subjects and were restricted from attaching unrelated amendments—as is the Idaho Legislature—the need for the line-item veto would not be as great. But chances are slim that Congress would divest itself of this self-serving process.

Those who fear a shift in the power balance need look no further than the 43 states that have the line-item veto. Gov. Evans, for example, has used it sparingly, the last time in 1983, according to Legislative Council Director Myran Schlechte.

The bill before the Senate even had an important safety feature—the measure would have expired two years after passage unless Congress reauthorized it.

Congress has proved consistently that it's impotent to reduce the deficit. A president armed with a line-item veto would have been our best hope of getting a handle on that red-ink monster. It also would have added truth to President Truman's adage: "The buck stops here."●

EDWARD J. MARKEY—REMARKS BEFORE THE GROUPE DE BELLERIVE, GENEVA

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, recently, several Members of the Senate and I traveled to Geneva as official observers to the arms talks. While in Geneva, I attended a colloquium sponsored by the groupe de Bellerive concerning nuclear proliferation and nuclear war. Representative MARKEY of Massachusetts spoke at the colloquium and I would like to include his remarks in the RECORD for all my colleagues to read because they concern a topic which is cause for growing concern: nuclear proliferation. Congressman MARKEY outlines a valuable proposal to help control the spread of nuclear materials to nonnuclear weapons states. In an age of increasing terrorist incidents, the need to halt proliferation is even more imperative in order to prevent a terrorist use of a nuclear weapon.

The remarks follows:

REMARKS OF THE HONORABLE EDWARD J. MARKEY BEFORE THE GROUPE DE BELLERIVE, GENEVA, JUNE 29, 1985

First, let me say how pleased I am to have the opportunity to be with you today, and to exchange views with so many people who are also struggling to find the political and technical keys to progress in nuclear arms control and disarmament.

As Chairman of a Subcommittee of the United States Congress which oversees civil energy development, including nuclear energy, I have been greatly disturbed to see the U.S. civilian energy budget decline in recent years, while the energy department's budget for nuclear weapons has almost doubled.

Hand-in-hand with this unprecedented surge in spending for the research, development, and production of nuclear weapons, there has been a steady disintegration of U.S. Nonproliferation Policy—almost a "Laissez Faire" attitude toward the nuclear weapons programs of so-called "threshold" nuclear powers.

These ominous developments have been matched by five years of fruitless negotiation here in Geneva, allegedly directed at major "reductions" in superpower arsenals.

I do not know the Soviet view of the present situation with respect to proliferation, but the Reagan Administration apparently believes it can squeeze through another NPT Review conference without coming to grips with the fundamental contradictions in its present policies.

I believe that if the major nuclear powers are unwilling, as a minimum requirement, to abandon military strategies which contemplate the first use of nuclear weapons to deter conventional as well as nuclear threats, then the appeal of nuclear weapons in world politics is certain to become universal.

After all, if nuclear weapons really do confer immunity from conventional attack, why shouldn't every nation have one?

One cannot chant the mantra of nuclear deterrence with unbridled enthusiasm, and, at the same time, attempt to silence other nations when they seek to add their voices to the nuclear chorus.

The old double-standard of nuclear deterrence for the few, and nuclear denial for the many, has obviously run its course.

To those outside the superpower conflict, or who somehow manage to see beyond it, the two-way tunnel-vision of the Soviet Union and the United States is truly stupefying.

While the Reagan Administration wastes time here in Geneva trying to sell the Soviet Union on the president's vision of a "stabilizing" defensive arms race in space, and while the Soviet Union responds by becoming utterly engrossed in deflating these space war fantasies, some 260 commercial power reactors worldwide are churning out 45 metric tons of bomb-useable plutonium every year—the equivalent of 6,000 nuclear weapons.

As long as this plutonium stays locked-up in spent fuel rods, nations or militant subnational groups can not steal or divert the five kilograms required to build a bomb.

Unfortunately, some twenty percent of the world's storehouse of plutonium has already been separated-out, and some countries want to separate even more—to fuel their current generation of power reactors through so-called "thermal recycle", or to use in "breeder" reactors which produce even more bomb-useable plutonium.

If present trends continue, by the year 2000, there could be as much as 400 tons of bomb-useable plutonium circulating in world commerce—nearly twice the combined plutonium stockpile of the two superpowers.

I do not believe the world is ready for widespread traffic in separated plutonium.

I do not believe the world will ever be ready for it.

The converging trends of increasing terrorism by sub-national groups, and the wider dispersion of nuclear fuel cycle technology, raise a frightening prospect.

The hostage airliners of today could be merely precursors of the hostage cities of tomorrow.

Regardless of our divergent viewpoints—East and West, North and South—can we not agree at least on one thing? That a world already strained to the breaking point can scarcely endure the added threat of nuclear terrorism.

From New York to New Delhi to Beirut, we will all be vulnerable.

There is only one solution to the nuclear terrorist threat that will actually afford real security.

We must bite the bullet.

We must take the required medicine straight-up.

Those who still harbor dreams of breeding plutonium as a boundless source of power must give up their cherished illusions.

We must deny potential terrorists even the possibility of building or obtaining nuclear bombs.

And that means stopping the worldwide spread of nuclear-weapons-useable materials—plutonium and highly-enriched uranium, as well as the technology to produce it.

In contrast to the Ford and Carter Administrations, I am sorry to have to report to you that the Reagan Administration seems bent on making the world a convenient place for nuclear terrorists big and small. Paralleling its disinterest in meaningful arms control, it has taken a relaxed attitude toward sensitive nuclear exports to countries which have not signed the NPT.

And joined, unfortunately, by a number of advanced industrial countries, it is acquiescing in the development of a plutonium economy abroad as the pretext for eventually resurrecting the breeder reactor at home.

Fortunately, these views are not shared by many in Congress.

At least some of us believe that the current nonproliferation regime must be drastically reformed, and soon.

What are some of these changes?

First, we must cope with the fundamental contradiction between Articles One and Four of the NPT, the so called "non-assistance" and "assistance" clauses of the treaty.

Article One obliges the nuclear weapons states "not in any way to assist, encourage, or induce" any non-weapon state to acquire nuclear weapons.

But Article Four established the "inalienable right" of all parties to participate in the "fullest possible exchange of equipment materials, and scientific and technical information for the peaceful uses of nuclear energy."

That latter injunction has meant that the treaty does not bar possession of, or commerce in, weapons-useable nuclear materials, or the technology required to make them.

If we truly want to limit the spread of nuclear weapons among nation states, and preclude the threat of nuclear terrorism, we must act soon.

The non-assistance clause of Article One must be expanded to include all parties to the treaty, not just nuclear weapon states. As we know from painful experience in recent years, major transfers of nuclear bomb technology have originated from non-weapon states.

Second, weapon and non-weapon states alike must agree to expand the non-transfer obligation of Article One to include weapons useable nuclear materials, and the technology to make them.

This ban on commerce in plutonium and high-enriched uranium would apply to weapons and non-weapons states alike.

It would mean the end of commercial separation of plutonium. The continuation of such a ban beyond, say, five years, could be made contingent on the adoption by the nuclear-weapon states of a parallel negotiated ban on the production of plutonium and high-enriched uranium for military purposes.

It would also mean the conversion of research reactors worldwide to the use of low-enriched uranium fuel, a step which I'm pleased to say, we have just recently decided to move ahead with in the United States.

I am fully aware that there is formidable opposition to the course I am proposing. But I believe that after all the alternatives are carefully considered, it will prove to be the only approach that affords true security from the threat of nuclear violence.

But while we are planning for the transition to a world without the production of weapons-useable materials, there is something we must do right away.

Because the requirement for full-scope safeguards under Article Three of the treaty has been interpreted to apply only to receiving countries that are also party to the treaty, supplier nations have been free to export sensitive equipment to non-treaty nations that refuse to accept full-scope safeguards.

This has created an absurd situation—there is now a relative advantage in nuclear trade for those countries which stay outside the NPT, leaving them little incentive to ratify the treaty.

The upcoming review conference should consider requiring that full-scope safeguards be a condition of all transfers of nuclear material and equipment by suppliers party to the treaty.

Finally, Article Five, which permits the weapons states to conduct peaceful nuclear explosions on behalf of the non-weapons states, should be stricken from the treaty, as it perpetuates the myth that there are potentially beneficial peaceful uses for nuclear explosions.

Instead, I believe the nuclear-weapons states should begin fulfilling their obligations under Article Six of the treaty by halting nuclear explosive tests.

Our deepening understanding of the global environmental and economic consequences of nuclear war between the superpowers has underscored the mounting worldwide political awakening to the nuclear issue.

As President Raul Alfonsin of Argentina has so eloquently stated, "nuclear war between the superpowers threatens to deprive citizens and future generations of every nation of their most fundamental right—the right to life."

But we must not allow righteous indignation at the fundamental inequity, moral blindness, and political paralysis of the superpower arms race to blind us, or to paralyze our response to the imminent threat of nuclear terrorism and regional nuclear wars.

As our distinguished convenor, Prince Sadruddin, has so trenchantly written, "unpretentious little bombs that the Americans and Soviets would barely deign to count in their estimates of each other's firepower could blow a big hole in world peace."

MAURITANIA

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, a few weeks ago I visited Mauritania, Senegal, and the Soviet Union. I want to share my impressions with my colleagues and I shall do it in three separate floor statements.

Today I would like to talk briefly about Mauritania.

This country, with 1.7 million people, is the most sparsely populated country in Africa, and for good reason. The Sahel Desert poses a real threat to human, animal, and vegetable life.

Mauritania has 419,229 square miles, more than seven times the space of the State of Illinois. It faces the problems which the desert creates.

This past year it was able to produce only 9 percent of the food it consumed. Were it not for the generous aid of the United States and other countries, most of the people of Mauritania would have faced death.

Even as it is, life is grim for many people in Mauritania. The life expectancy is 45 years. One out of every seven babies born dies shortly after birth. Only 4 percent of the population goes to secondary school, and the literacy rate is 17 percent.

That is the grim side of things.

The other side I found in the spirit of the people of Mauritania—a spirit I came to admire and respect in my brief time there.

There is another, immediate problem on which we can be of assistance. The Ministry of Hydraulics has about $7 million worth of International Harvester trucks and drilling equipment that are important to the lifeline of that country, but are lacking spare parts and the expertise to put those spare parts in. I'm advised that with a grant of about $275,000 this important function in Mauritania could continue. I urge my colleagues on the Foreign Affairs Committee to include this in the next budget.

The two long-range problems Mauritania faces are the water problem and the education problem.

On the water problem, Mauritania is talking about the possibility of digging 1,800 wells and doing some other things. I do not oppose digging the wells, but I think it is inevitable that as those wells are dug, the water table will drop, and that those wells cannot provide adequately for the future water needs of this huge nation.

There is perhaps no more graphic illustration of the need for an inexpensive means of converting salt water to fresh water than the Mauritanian economy and landscape.

The sensible thing would be for the United States, Saudi Arabia, and Mauritania to join in a desalinization plant. Research is needed in this area, and the sooner we get on with the job, the sooner the problem is going to be solved—not only for Mauritania, but for our country, for the Saudis, for Israel, for a host of countries around the face of this Earth. I will be proposing a congressional mandate to increase efforts to study this problem.

In the next supplemental appropriation, I may offer an amendment suggesting that we move to at least 10 scholarships, 7 undergraduate, and 3 graduate, and I will insert into the RECORD a letter I am sending to the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee asking him to study this matter closely.

Right now, the United States offers three scholarships to Mauritania, and the Soviets offer approximately 100.

Senator MATHIAS, Senator PELL, Senator LUGAR, and the others who are urging us to do more in the area of scholarships are providing leadership we need in a direction we need, and I wish to join in that effort.●

AMENDING THE EQUAL CREDIT OPPORTUNITY ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of S. 1486, a bill to amend the Equal Credit Opportunity Act [ECOA] championed by my distinguished colleague from Kansas, the majority leader. This bill, which I have cosponsored, will strengthen current Federal prohibitions against discrimination in business credit. I support this bill because I believe that all those who wish to start their own business should have an equal opportunity to do so.

The act being amended prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, sex, marital status, and age. It also authorizes the Federal Reserve Board to exempt nonconsumer transactions from certain key requirements of ECOA, including the ban on inquiries into the credit applicants marital status.

The Federal Reserve Board's ability to supersede the ECOA antidiscrimination requirements has been a point of contention since enactment of the act in 1977. The bill which I am cosponsoring would amend the ECOA to require that any exemption from the act's requirements be narrowly defined and be promulgated only after public hearings have been held. This bill does not eliminate all ECOA exemptions, but rather requires that they be more narrowly defined and more carefully documented.

This bill is an attempt to ensure that all Americans have equal access to the commercial credit market. It is through commercial loans that new ideas reach the drawing board and eventually a waiting market. Every individual deserves a fair shake when it comes to business ventures. This is the very basis of our free enterprise system.

I am pleased to support S. 1486. I urge its adoption.●

THE AMERICAN RED CROSS AND FAMINE IN AFRICA

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, it has been my privilege to serve as cochairman of the American Red Cross Africa Famine Relief Campaign for 1985. When Americans became aware of the appalling suffering in Africa—the worst in this century—they reacted with compassion, and generosity. Initially, the Red Cross set $5 million as its goal for its African Famine Relief. However, the outpouring of support was so great that in 3 months contributions amounted to $15 million. Funds are still being contributed. Some donations have been large (one foundation gave $1 million), but the majority of the money came from the general public. Americans of all stripes and ages were touched by press accounts and photos of African youngsters with swollen bellies and bodies, more bone than flesh.

The American Red Cross determined that the money raised for Africa would not defray any overhead expense. It channeled all of the funds immediately to the League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies in Geneva. These affiliated organizations carry on relief operations in 14 of the most afflicted African nations.

By donating such a large part of the $70 million sought by the League for its 1985 estimate of African needs, American Red Cross chapters and volunteers have shown considerable enterprise and ingenuity in two critical ways. First, they focused public attention on the urgent need. Second, they provided the most precious relief commodity possible—cash.

In Orange County, CA, for instance, school students mounted a "Give a Bill and a Can" campaign. This effort not only generated funds for the suffering African nations, but also a can of food for the hungry in their own community.

The drive, which took place in 70 local schools, resulted in $31,705 being contributed to the American Red Cross. One high school class alone raised $4,000. The Girl Scouts brought in a donation of $700. A local restaurant attracted 150 people to a champagne brunch, and the proceeds—a $25 contribution from each person—went directly to the "Bill and Can" drive.

When an American Red Cross delegation recently visited Ethiopia, Mali, Mauritania, and Senegal, it was noted that the feeding camps lacked recreational equipment for use by the children. This prompted American grade school younsters to act. They assembled Red Cross "friendship boxes," which they filled with sports equipment and such practical items as sewing kits.

In opening their hearts and pocketbooks to help the starving, Americans devised many ways to focus attention on the famine in Africa:

In Washington, DC, embassies and local African restaurants joined forces to auction African art.

In Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University students held a 1-day fast; the University's food service sent the amount it would have spent on food preparaton to the Amercian Red Cross.

In Alabama, a restaurant held an all-day festival and donated the proceeds to African Famine Relief.

In California, a restaurant held a special celebrity dinner for contributors.

In New York, a food store donated the price of a quarter-page newspaper advertisement to boost the campaign.

Church members have also played a leading role. The General Missionary Baptist Convention of Georgia raised $125,000. The 10 congregations of the Gospel Spreading Church of God collected $7,550 for the American Red Cross. Wendell M. Green—a Washington, DC pastor—described his church collection as "more of a heart-giving thing than just giving of an offering." He said one little boy gave all the money he had, $5, saying, "If I had more, I'd give it."

One of the personal notes received by the Red Cross was from a man in Florida. It accompanied a check for $55.60. The note read:

> This is in memory of my daughter, Raimie, who was killed in a school bus-train accident while trying to save the life of another child.
> The amount is what was in her piggy bank. Since she was an active donor to charitable organizations, I feel that she would be proud to know that her savings are being used to help the starving in Africa.

The U.S. Postal Service presented $787,000 to the Red Cross, a sum raised by it employees and members of the National Association of Letter Carriers, the National Rural Letter Carriers, the National League of Postmasters, and the Post Office Mail Handlers.

Despite the ongoing efforts of governments and humanitarian agencies such as the Red Cross, there still is terrible need on the African continent. Solving even the short-term emergency problems will take time—something the victims of hunger don't have. The Red Cross notes that a $4 donation will feed a starving child for a month. A contribution of $98 is enough to save a small village for the same period.

Before the American Red Cross launched its African Famine Relief Campaign, its Board of Governors dispatched a factfinding team to four of the worst-affected countries. Its mission was to assess the need for Red Cross food assistance, to see how the help already being rendered was being managed, and to measure the actual delivery of Red Cross assistance to those who needed it most.

Through the generosity of Pan American World Airways, the American Red Cross delegation traveled 7,500 miles between hemispheres and continents. The members made up a cross-section of the United States. The delegation was composed of an Episcopal minister, a bank vice president, the head of a university, a college student, an accounting firm president, a nurse, an international management firm consultant, two civic leader Red Cross volunteers, a school supervisor, members of the American Red Cross Board of Governors, and two famous personalities—Mel Blount of professional football and Charlton Heston. The factfinding group was organized into five groups. They visited Mali, Senegal, Mauritania and Ethiopia.

What they reported should make the Red Cross proud. It was their opinion that the Red Cross is among the most effective, attentive and efficient of all government agencies and church and private groups helping the famine victims. As a conduit of such a large portion of the $70 million sought by the League's relief program, the American Red Cross felt that it had responsibility to monitor the help in order to assure that donations were being put to good use. When Americans give so generously, they have a right to know that their contributions are being used effectively.

The Red Cross is making a significant contribution to the relief effort. It is chartering aircraft to shuttle grain and other food stuffs to the more remote regions affected by the dropout. Tons of food have been purchased and are being distributed. Medical teams are helping the malnourished regain their health. Land transport has been purchased to haul humanitarian assistance across nearly trackless, parched and dusty wasteland. And an inventory of spare parts for these vehicles are on hand for repairs which are frequently needed under such harsh conditions.

The terrible need in Africa still persists. Red Cross figures show that 187 million people in 27 nations suffer the threat of starvation.

Through their contributions to the Red Cross and other organizations, the American people have shown that they will not turn their back on this tragic situation. Americans from every walk of life have shown that everyone can take a part in this lifesaving effort. For those who have not done so already, contributions can be sent to the nearest Red Cross chapter and designated for American Red Cross African Famine Relief.●

SUPERCLUSTERS: LARGEST KNOWN STRUCTURES IN THE UNIVERSE

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I invite the attention of my colleagues to a recent announcement by the National Science Foundation on July 16, 1985, entitled "Astronomers Find Largest Known Structure in Universe, An Assemblage of Galaxies." I am especially proud to note that the discoverers are two fellow New Mexicans, Dr. Jack O. Burns, an associate professor of astronomy at the University of New Mexico, and David J. Batuski, a graduate student at the University of New Mexico.

Their work essentially established the fact that the Perseus-Pisces Supercluster in the northern sky is approximately three times as large than previously believed.

In a 2-year effort of data collection and analysis, these New Mexico astronomers have substantially refined the three-dimensional map of the universe. Their primary observations were done at Kitt Peak in Arizona with an intensified image dissector scanner on the 84-inch telescope. They have identified a star structure, an assemblage of galaxies and clusters of galaxies that make up the largest known structure in the universe—more than 1 billion light-years in length.

According to the NSF release:

The largest previously reported similar structure, called a filament, was an assemblage or association of galaxies about 700 million light-years long, discovered in November 1982. A light-year is the distance light travels in a year at a speed of 186,000 miles per second—about 6 trillion miles.

In the article "Superclusters: Giants of the Universe,"—Astronomy, April 1984—Mr. Laurence A. Marschall reminds us that:

Our own Milky Way Galaxy is itself a member of a cluster of galaxies—the "Local group," as astronomers call it. Because we are embedded in it, the Local Group is more difficult to recognize than the great cluster in Virgo. . . .

The Local Group is a small and sparsely populated cluster, containing only a few dozen members. Rich clusters of galaxies, like the one in Virgo, contain hundreds or thousands of galaxies of all types. These rich clusters invariably contain near their center one or two of the largest types of galaxies known—giant elliptical galaxies, which may contain as much material as 50 spiral galaxies like our Milky Way.

To help put the above discussion of galaxies into perspective, it is helpful to remind ourselves about the size of our home galaxy, the Milky Way within the Local Group. If we imagine ourselves in space looking at the Local Group of a few dozen galaxies and searching for our Sun, we would have to magnify our view of the Local Group by about 400 billion times to see the part of the Milky Way containing the Sun. The National Geographic Picture Atlas, Our Universe, 1980, (pp. 237-9), further clarifies the size of the Milky Way as containing some 200,000 billions stars. Viewed on edge, our spiral galaxy is 100,000 light-years across. In the suburban area, on the Orion arm and about 30,000 light-years from the center, is our Sun. At its estimated speed of 220 kilometers per second, our Sun takes 230,000,000 years to circle the Milky Way Galaxy—1 galactic year.

It is quite a leap indeed to understand the vast dimensions of not only our own home galaxy, but its relationship to the Local Group, and the relative smallness of this group in comparison to the supercluster of galaxies verified by Dr. Burns and David Batuski.

It is quite an honor for the University of New Mexico to have its reputation enhanced by the fine work of these scientists. Dr. Burns earned his doctorate from the University of Illinois. He joined the faculty of the University of New Mexico in the fall of 1980. At the age of 32, Dr. Burns can be proud of his huge discovery. I know that he and his wife Cathleen are also proud of their twins—a boy and a girl—born in March of this year.

Dr. Jack O. Burns did his pre- and post-doctoral work in radio astronomy at the National Radio Astronomy Observatory in Charlottesville, VA. He then did field work at the Very Large Array (radio telescope) in Socorro, NM, before taking his post at the University of New Mexico in Albuquerque.

David J. Batuski, age 36, served 13 years in the U.S. Air Force where he spent 3 years at the Kirtland Air Force Base research facility in Albuquerque. Deciding to pursue his first love, David returned to graduate school in astronomy at the University of New Mexico—a long way from the farm where he was raised in Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I believe that all of my colleagues will join me in this expression of our profound gratitude for the inspiring work of Jack Burns and David Batuski. The new enthusiasm and excitment they have brought to all of our lives deserves our attention. It is also gratifying to be a part of the Government that helps to make this type of effort possible.

Before inserting the National Science Foundation announcement and an article from the Albuquerque Journal, Sunday morning, July 21, 1985, I would like to close with a quotation from Laurence A. Marschall's article on "Superclusters: Giants of the Universe":

We may at last have discerned the largest objects in the universe. . . . Yet the search for a complete understanding of the structural framework of the universe is just beginning. We have mapped only a short pace outward toward the limits of the universe. The Space Telescope, with the ability to penetrate several times farther and several times fainter, should change these figures significantly in just a few years. For those who would understand the largest structures in existence, there are exciting times ahead.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD the NSF announcement and the newspaper article in connection with this subject.

The material follows:

ASTRONOMERS FIND LARGEST KNOWN STRUCTURE IN UNIVERSE, AN ASSEMBLAGE OF GALAXIES

Astronomers have identified the largest known structure in the universe, an assemblage of galaxies and clusters of galaxies more than one billion light years in length, the National Science Foundation (NSF) reported today.

The largest previously reported similar structure, called a filament, was an assemblage or association of galaxies about 700 million light years long, discovered in November, 1982. A light year is the distance light travels in a year at a speed of 186,000 miles per second—about six trillion miles.

The newly discovered system of galaxies was found in the northern region of the sky by Dr. Jack O. Burns, an associate professor of astronomy, and David J. Batuski, a graduate student, at the University of New Mexico. The large filament is in the direction of two constellations, Perseus and Pegasus, and lies between 200 million and one billion light years from earth.

The detection and study of such superclusters of galaxies is helpful to astronomers trying to learn more about the evolution of the universe. One group holds that galaxies were formed when super-cluster-size clouds of gas fragment and condense. Another school holds that relatively small galaxy-size structures formed first and then clustered as gravitational forces took hold and drew them together as the universe aged.

"We feel quite strongly that our data favor the model in which the superclusters formed first and galaxies later fragmented from supercluster clouds," Dr. Burns told the NSF.

"With such a model, the universe must be dominated by some form of dark or unseen matter such as exotic particles predicted recently by high energy physicists."

Dr. Burns explained that in order for structures of this size to be formed, more gravitationlal force, and therefore more mass, is needed than is present in luminous matter—stars and galaxies.

"Therefore," he said, "we must postulate the existence of a dominant component of the universe consisting of non-luminous matter."

The New Mexico astronomers used an Intensified Image Dissector Scanner—an electronic spectrograph—on the National Optical Astronomy Observatories' 84-inch (21.-meter) telescope on Kitt Peak in Arizona. The spectrograph allowed the researchers to determine distances of the galaxies and, therefore, three dimensional positions of the galaxies within the filament.

"This technique allowed us to recognize, for the first time, the existence of this filament," Dr. Burns said.

The researchers reported their finding to the NSF which funded their research and in an article to be published December 1 in the Astrophysical Journal.

UNM SCIENTISTS SPOT GALAXY SUPERCLUSTER

(By Julie Clausen)

Scientists from the University of New Mexico say they have spotted a supercluster of galaxies that is believed to be the largest known entity in space.

The discovery of the snakelike cluster lends support to a new picture that has developed in recent years of how the universe formed after the Big Bang. According to the Big Bang theory, all matter and energy in the universe was concentrated in a very small volume that exploded about 10 to 20 billion years ago.

The cluster of galaxies is a billion light-years long, said Jack O. Burns, a UNM astronomer. A light-year is almost six trillion miles. The supercluster is a snakelike filament, so its distance from Earth ranges from 500 million to a billion light-years, Burns said.

Burns and UNM graduate student David Batuski found the supercluster while they were refining their three-dimensional map of the universe. The map covers an area that extends a billion light-years from Earth.

Using photographic plates and the Abell catalog, a listing of galaxy clusters compiled by George Abell about 25 years ago, the researchers scanned the sky with a telescope at Kitt Peak National Observatory near Tucson for possible superclusters in the direction of the constellations Pegasus and Perseus.

The telescope was used to verify the presence of a supercluster by measuring the distances of the galaxies within the supercluster from each other.

Burns and Batuski used UNM computers to plot the positions of the galaxies using computer-generated graphics. Additional computer models were used to try to understand how the structures were formed.

"The universe now appears much more stringy or filamentary than we had thought before," Burns said. For two years, Burns and Batuski have been developing a map of the universe that Burns says looks like a Swiss cheese or a sponge. The universe's dense areas—superclusters—are surrounded by larger voids.

Because of the extreme size of the supercluster, the researchers' discovery lends support to a theory first proposed in the 1970s by Russian astronomer Yakov Zel'dovich that superclusters were the first masses to form out of the hot soup that would become the universe. The theory says the pull of gravity then caused the matter to collapse into a pancake, which fragmented to form galaxies and finally, stars.

The previously accepted model of the creation of the universe proposed that galaxies formed first and only later grouped together to form superclusters.

Scientists believe that formation of such a cluster would require more gravitational force than has previously been attributed to all the known luminous galaxies and stars, Burns said.

"The universe must be dominated by some form of dark or unseen matter," he said.

The largest supercluster previously found was about 700 million light-years long and was reported in 1982 by Cornell University scientists, Burns said.●

COUNCIL OF INTERNATIONAL PROGRAMS

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, on August 12, people from over 80 countries will meet at Baldwin-Wallace College to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the Council of International Programs.

The Council of International Programs—a nonprofit organization that receives support from the U.S. Information Agency—began 3 decades ago in my home city of Cleveland.

Its mission?

To strengthen the work of human services professionals from around the world by providing to them an opportunity to work with their counterparts here in the United States.

This, I am pleased to say, is a mission that CIP has performed in a truly outstanding manner. Since 1956, 6,000 professionals from 110 countries have lived and worked in the United States under CIP auspices.

And these, Mr. President, are not just any foreign visitors.

These are the people from other countries who are committed to serving their own people. They are educators, medical workers, people involved with youth programs and leaders in community development activities.

Their presence here enriches us.

It creates personal and professional ties between our country and others.

And it has a direct, long-term impact on the quality of social services available to people in every part of the world.

Mr. President, I have long supported the work of CIP and extend to all who will gather at Baldwin-Wallace on August 12 my best wishes for a memorable conference.●

THE 196TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE U.S. CUSTOMS SERVICE AND THE 195TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE U.S. COAST GUARD

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to honor both the U.S. Customs Service and the U.S. Coast Guard. These two fine institutions serve as the guardians of our borders by preventing the illegal importation and exportation of contraband, fraudulent goods, undeclared goods, and drugs. They also save lives and collect duties. Such services have gone unrecognized for some time and now, as we approach their 200th birthdays, it is time to give credit where it is due.

On July 4, 1789 the First Tariff Act was passed by Congress. Then, on July 31, 1789, Congress created 59 Customs districts for 11 States. North Carolina and Rhode Island were not included because they had not yet ratified the Constitution and joined the Union. President Washington officially created the Service on August 3, 1789 when he appointed 59 collectors, 33 surveyors, and 10 naval officers. In 1790, North Carolina and Rhode Island ratified the Constitution and seven more Customs districts were established.

Customs has the unique characteristic of having been established one month before the Treasury Department, its parent department. It is sometimes known as the child that is older than its parent. In 1927, Customs became a separate bureau, although its Commissioner is appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Today the U.S. Customs Service enforces the Tariff Act of 1930, enforces export control laws, intercepts illegal high-technology exports to Soviet bloc countries, suppresses illegal narcotics traffic, enforces reporting requirements of the Bank Secrecy Act, and enforces a whole range of trade regulations and quotas. The Service has representatives in London, Bonn, Hong Kong, Mexico City, Seoul, and Tokyo to name just a few places.

The Customs Service is not alone in its international role. The U.S. Coast Guard, the oldest continuous seagoing service, due in part to the fact that the Navy was disbanded for a period after the Revolutionary War, is also located abroad. Its worldwide service covers Germany, Turkey, Japan, Spain, and England, but is not limited to those countries.

The Coast Guard was established in 1790 to collect customs duties—closely related to the Customs Service—as the Federal Government was fiscally weak. It was even called the revenue cutter service and the revenue marines at times. In 1967, the Department of Transportation was created and later the Coast Guard was transferred to that Department. Not only does the Coast Guard save lives and rescue boats and boaters, but it also helps control the in and outflow of marine traffic that marks the background for so much of our country's smuggling.

Mr. President, while we struggle to preserve domestic tranquility and 1 in every 4 American families is victimized by crime that is all too frequently drug related, the efforts of these two organizations become increasingly important. For instance, from January 1, 1985 until July 15, 1985 the Coast Guard seized 857,864 pounds of marijuana, 94 vessels, 6,072 pounds of cocaine valued at almost $225 million, and made 340 arrests.

From 1977 to 1980, the Customs Service seized 12,214,353.4 pounds of marijuana valued at $5,761,673,850; 8,551.8 pounds of cocaine valued at $2,579,390,037; and 857.5 pounds of heroin valued at $452,758,571. These figures only skim the surface of the illicit substances flowing across our massive borders. These are the borders that heroin crosses to rob our youths of their dreams and often their lives. These are the very same borders that, if left unprotected, will be crossed by the terrorists who are not thwarted in sufficient time.

Tragic isn't it?

Mr. President, these two services have long protected the American people, the American economy, and American safety as a whole. We must not pull the rug out from beneath those who protect our Nation or we won't see another 200 years of the same proud service.●

THE UAW CLEBRATES ITS 50TH ANNIVERSARY

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, on Monday, August 26, the United Auto Workers, one of the oldest and proudest labor organizations in the United States, will celebrates its 50th anniversary. On this occasion, I would like to pay tribute to this great American institution, whose valiant struggle to protect and improve the lives of working men and women throughout the country is a model for all of the labor movement, here and throughout the world.

As a native of Flint, MI, where General Motors was born and where the UAW signed its first-ever contract with that automaker. I have followed the progress of the UAW during my years in Congress and as a private citizen with a special sense of admiration and respect.

Founded in 1935, in the wake of the Great Depression, the UAW was formed to address the special problems that confronted workers in the young and growing auto industry. Automobile workers responded enthusiastically to organizing initiatives and by 1937 the fledgling union had grown to a membership of nearly 300,000.

Bolstered by this extraordinary success, UAW leaders decided in early 1937 that the union was numerically strong enough to demand formal recognition from the big three automakers: Ford, GM, and Chrysler. With this goal strongly in mind, the union singled out GM as a test case because of its refusal to discuss collective bargaining with the UAW, and called a "sitdown" strike against the company. The result was a landmark in American labor history; the legacy of solidarity which has long been the trademark of the UAW dates from the famous 1937 Flint sitdown strike.

As the country geared up for World War II, UAW leaders showed foresight and patriotism in their call to mobilize the vast resources and idle capacity of the auto industry to produce fighter planes and other war materials. Recognizing the need to promote national unity and harmony in the wake of Pearl Harbor, the UAW leadership met on December 8, 1941, and adopted a voluntary no-strike pledge for the duration of the war. Nevertheless, UAW leaders continued to work vigorously to protect the collection bargaining rights of its members and to win equal pay and equal treatment for the thousands of women who entered the work force during the war.

Following the election of Walter Reuther to the union presidency in 1946, the UAW entered new negotiations with the major auto makers and called on the industry to share the benefits of their increased productivity with the workers. These negotiations produced the wage policy that has resulted in UAW members being among the best paid workers in the United States. In addition to attaining the first cost-of-living allowance from GM, the UAW won the first fully employer-paid pension program in any mass-production industry from the Ford Motor Co.

Having already achieved significant success in its goal to protect the rights and interests of its own members, the 1950's and 1960's saw the UAW's social vision expanding to encompass others from all walks of life. The UAW joined the fight for human justice and against prejudice and racism which still threaten the liberty and freedom of so many Americans. Walter Reuther and other UAW leaders walked side by side with Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. throughout the South and in his famous 1963 March of Washington.

At the same time, the UAW used its enormous strength and influence to help workers in other occupations. In addition to being among the first unions to help finance the United Farm Workers in their campaign for justice in California, it aided striking hospital workers in Charleston, SC, and gave funds to teachers trying to organize their own local unions.

After the tragic death of Walter Reuther in May 1970, Leonard Woodcock took over the reins of the UAW and continued to pursue Reuther's noble quest for social justice and progress as well as better conditions for workers throughout the country. This period saw the union leading the growing national protest against the Vietnam war and repeatedly testifying on Capitol Hill for national health insurance, environmental measures, welfare reform, and civil liberties. Meanwhile, on its own collective bargaining front, the UAW won a tough new health-and-safety program, pension gains, restrictions on the corporation's right to demand overtime, and benefit increases.

Douglas Fraser succeeded Leonard Woodcock as president of the UAW and under his leadership, the union again broke new and historical ground, proving that labor, management and Government can all work together toward a common goal. In this case, the UAW's contributions to the Chrysler loan guarantee legislation have helped bring about a complete turnaround of that automaker. The UAW role in the Chrysler legislation helped save hundreds of thousands of jobs all across this country. The union made still another breakthrough when Douglas Fraser was named to the Chrysler board of directors—the first step ever for a union into the boardrooms of America.

Today, under the leadership of Owen Bieber, the United Autoworkers Union is still making progress for working men and women and their communities. As the world of work is changing, as we grow into a worldwide economy, as we enter another industrial revolution, the UAW is in the forefront with new ideas and new concepts to help us adapt to these times.

As the UAW celebrates its 50th year of distinguished service to its members and the community at large, I think it is only appropriate that we in the Senate commend this fine organization and its leaders for the great contributions they have made to our society. Through it all, the UAW has kept—and will continue to keep—its original goal to bring dignity to the American workplace.●

THE JAPANESE THREAT TO U.S. JOBS

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an article in the July 28 New York Times Magazine by Theodore H. White, entitled "The Danger From Japan."

Mr. White argues, and I am in agreement with him, that the noble principle of free trade is undermined by two factors. First, the whole world does not abide by it, those that do, such as the United States, are thus at a disadvantage. Second, in a world of free trade the cheapest producers will be those who dominate production; since advanced technology is now largely internationalized the United States cannot hope to simultaneously keep relatively high wages and its competitiveness.

Japan since the war has exploited both these factors. The Ministry of Finance sets the exchange rates and stimulates savings and investment. The Ministry of International Trade and Industry targets Japanese industries that are to grow, by giving them no interest loans and high tariffs to fend off competition. Wages are still on average lower than in the United States, although in this area the newly industrializing countries [NIC's] are a more dangerous threat to U.S. manufacturers. In contrast, American markets welcome foreign exports-advertising agencies eagerly explain how to dominate the consumer market. In Los Angeles alone there are 1,500 Japanese firms; in Japan, American companies are largely excluded. Not surprisingly, going on 2 million jobs have been lost in the manufacturing sector in the last 6 years in the United States; in the last 15 years Japanese exports to the United States have increased more than 10 times. White quotes the Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige:

America's pursuit of free trade is like Sir Galahad's quest for the Holy Grail.

Mr. White's conclusion is, I think, worthy of my colleagues attention. What we need is an overall trade policy. We need to move away from the current ad hoc arrangements to something more embracing.

Mr. President, I ask that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE DANGER FROM JAPAN

(By Theodore H. White)

No sense of irony stained the spectacle of victory aboard the U.S.S. Missouri, no sense of shadows to rise years later.

We were all too bedazzled by the splendor of the day—for here was American power at its zenith. We had won the war, totally, and the men who had won it, soon to become legend, were all there on the veranda deck in pressed suntans or navy whites. A band had been swinging through "Anchors Aweigh" as we gathered that morning, but as the climax approached a hush fell; silence stretched like a blanket over our murmurings.

None of us of course knew what America would make of the victory, or the Japanese of their defeat. But the power was all ours and stretched, visibly, as far as the eye could see. The Third Fleet had come in from offshore and now crowded Tokyo Bay—flattops and battleships, cruisers and destroyers, guns trained on the land we had laid waste. There was no question but that we had won this war.

It was Sunday, Sept. 2, 1945, there on the other side of the dateline, and the skies, after a Saturday drizzle, stretched gray. But this was no guarded and hidden schoolhouse, with only a handful present to watch, as at the surrender of German forces only four months earlier at Rheims. Douglas MacArthur's sense of drama insisted that all the world be there to witness, and we were several hundreds thick on the foredeck.

The Missouri had been swept clean. The Stars and Stripes above the mainmast was the same that had fluttered over the Capitol on the day Japan attacked Pearl Harbor; it had just been flown out from Washington. The flag of Commodore Perry, who had pried Japan open to the West 90 years before, was draped on the rear turret, with the 31 stars of the then half-grown union faded but clear. And on each of the three 16-inch guns clung our sailors in white, holding on by a handgrip, or with their legs curled tight about the barrels.

Just in front of the turret was the surrender table, draped in a navy-blue coverlet, bare but for the documents. There the Japanese would sign. A few minutes before the appointed hour we heard the piping that announced the launch carrying the Japanese was alongside. We watched them come aboard: Mamoru Shigemitsu, the Japanese Foreign Minister, in morning coat and striped trousers; Gen. Yoshijiro Umezu, Chief of Staff of the army, in his starched brown uniform. Shigemitsu limped, for he had been crippled years before by Japanese terrorists who had tried to kill him, considering him a man of peace. But that brought him no sympathy from us now as he grasped the rail to pull himself up, then limped to the table of surrender.

I bristled at the sight of them. I had seen the Japanese blast and flame Chungqing, the city I had lived in years before, then bring their planes down to machine-gun people in the streets. Japanese had shot at me, I had fired at them, and so the luxury of this moment was one I enjoyed. Others, too, hated the Japanese—perhaps all except Douglas MacArthur, who saw them as he saw all Orientals, as errant little brown brothers who must be rebuked, but then brought into Western civilization. Yet that day he was taskmaster and conqueror.

A few minutes after 9, General MacArthur himself appeared, and the Japanese came forward. No one helped Shigemitsu, but some Americans more generous than I brought him a chair to sit on as he signed the surrender. Next came Umezu, the brown pock marks on his cheeks swelling and falling as he clenched his jaws. He wanted no chair; he stood stiffly, unfolded like a jackknife, then bent and signed the paper. Neither said anything. Then MacArthur spoke, for peace and conciliation—rather well, I think now as I read his text 40 years later. Then all the others signed. I notice, as I follow the notes I made on my copy of the text, that when the Dutch representative signed, the sun broke through the clouded morning, and the scene began to glisten.

At this point happened the episode that stands out sharpest among the memories of that day—the flyover. As MacArthur intoned "These proceedings are closed," we heard a drone and looked up. It is difficult to recall now, after years of floundering and blunder, how very good we were in those days, with what precision we ordered things. Four hundred B-29s had taken off from Guam and Saipan hours before to arrive over the Missouri at this precise minute of climax. They stretched across the rim of the horizon, and their heavy droning almost instantly harmonized with a softer buzzing as 1,500 fleet aircraft from our flattops joined them. The B-29s had burned out Japan's cities, dropped the two big bombs; the fleet aircraft had sunk the Japanese Navy. Now the killing arms of our power, the air forces, slid down from their height in the sky to circle low over the armada of American ships. Then, still very low, they disappeared across the sky, over two cities they had left in ruins, first Yokohama, then Tokyo, as if brandishing our power over the people who had dared, without warrant and with planned deceit, to attack and bloody us at Pearl Harbor.

We had won out over them. We lost more than 100,000 men to prove we could not be lacerated without warning, without seeking revenge.

Except that America's revenge on Japan was of such an extraordinary character as to befuddle all scholars who claim that history has a logic of its own. What we are faced with now is the idea that events contradict history's logic. Perhaps we did not win the war, perhaps the Japanese, unknown even to themselves, were the winners.

It had taken us years to get to Tokyo Bay. But that story had begun with an idea, as all wars do.

As a very young reporter, I had gone to Asia, and there became acquainted with the crowning Japanese idea: "The Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere." The slogan was scrawled across the walls of all the regions I visited. from Manchukuo to North China, down finally to Hanoi in 1940, when the Japanese took over Vietnam. And they meant to go further: to Thailand (with its tin), Malaya (rubber), Indonesia (oil and timber). The Japanese idea was simple: that Japan was the leader of East Asia, and so it should harness Asia, with its resources, its genius of mind, its hundreds of millions of people, and all would grow prosperous—Japan most of all.

But the Chinese, both Nationalist and Communist, had resisted. And, as the Japanese did their best to beat the Chinese into submission, America said: No. Franklin Roosevelt imposed his embargo on Japanese trade—no scrap metal, no oil, nothing that would help Japan pursue its purpose of conquest. The noose had thus tightened about Japan in 1941, whereupon they atacked us and hoped, having hurt us, that we would negotiate on their terms. Tactically, the attack on Pearl Harbor was one of the most brilliantly executed strokes of the war. But politically, it was most unwise, for America fought back.

Today, 40 years after the end of World War II, the Japanese are on the move again in one of history's most brilliant commercial offensives, as they go about dismantling American industry. Whether they are still only smart, or have finally learned to be wiser than we, will be tested in the next 10 years. Only then will we know who finally won the war 50 years before.

So we must go back to Japan at that weekend of surrender and see what we made of it.

The eye recalls almost nothing sharp of those first three days. Both Tokyo and Yokohama were wasteland. Here and there was a speckle of corrugated iron shacks where the bombed-out victims of our raids lived. Spikes of smokestacks rose above rubble. In the streets trudged the Japanese—forlorn and shabby. Along the country roads trickled the first of their demobilized soldiers, their belongings slung over their shoulders. All of Japan was open to us, except for the Emperor's palace in Tokyo, behind its moat and earthen walls. The 11th Airborne Division had arrived to protect him from all intruders—Americans and Japanese alike.

A few days before we entered Japan, an intelligence officer had briefed a few of us correspondents on how delicate that mission would be: Japan was still fully armed, with 57 divisions in the home islands. Some units were violent. There had already been one assault on the Emperor's palace in the days since he had radioed his submission to us; it had been beaten off. The Emperor was our key. "In essence," concluded the officer, "we've achieved a coup d'état. Our coup has been to take the Emperor. We've given him the widest latitude in telling his people how to take defeat. But, when they learn he takes orders from us, that we're using him to restore order, there's no telling how the mechanism will react."

So, when we flew in on Friday, Aug. 31, before the surrender, the soldiers in my plane were taking apart, fingering, reassembling their guns as soldiers always do before assault, ready to shoot if this surrender was a trap.

But it was no trap; the Japanese had surrendered; the Emperor had defused the Japanese war machine, still capable of one last explosive bloodletting. The airfield perimeter had been guarded immediately by the 11th Airborne. The Japanese had not only obeyed our orders to remove all propellers from their planes at Atsugi Airfield, our point of descent, but the planes themselves had been bulldozed into a junk-heap at the far corner.

That first weekend of reconnaissance and tingling fear we roamed the streets of Yokohama with strut and swagger. We took over the new Grand Hotel on the Bund—just up the street from the offices of the House of Mitsui. So I strolled down to visit it.

The House of Mitsui was one of the grand zaibatsu, those great Japanese merchant trading houses that we meant to abolish but did not. I walked in with Jim Stewart of the Office of War Information, who spoke fluent Japanese, and we were ushered into an executive's suite.

His face I have forgotten; in my notes his name reads simply "Fujiro," and he spoke fine English. When he understood that we had come not to arrest him but to talk, he relaxed. I wanted to pick up the threads of the story of defeat and surrender.

Fujiro told it well: It had been four months since the last ocean-going vessel of Japan's far-flung merchant marine had made it safely back to Yokohama, Japan's largest port. It had been more than a year since Kawasaki, the nation's oil port, had received a tanker from the East Indies. Yokohama was prostrate, he said. He guessed that 200,000 people had been killed in our bombings and 700,000 had fled.

But the Americans were not hated, he assured us. The people hated their army. "Why no planes, no guns to defend us?" He spat out names like Tojo, Oshima, Shiratori. The people expected them to be executed. People hated the United States bombers, but the first Americans to land were well-behaved. Jim Stewart remarked that, unlike the Japanese, American soldiers did not rape. Fujiro acknowledged this.

Then to his plea. Hunger. Food. Let Japan work to support herself. Japan could still make ships—"let us make ships to earn our way." Some textile mills remained; the Japanese could still make cloth to earn a living. But Japan needed food most of all—one-third of all its food in the closing days of the war had come out of China. Japan could sell us tea and silk, but it needed food.

What were the plans now of the House of Mitsui? we asked. He replied: "Frankly, gentlemen, until your military tells us what to do, we have no plans." Before we left, he poured us a toast: "To your safe arrival!" We drank; the House of Mitsui bowed as if we were not only liberators but allies.

These days, the House of Mitsui is thriving again, its trading net spread from steel mills in China to refineries in Iran to operations in America—the whole world has become its "Greater Co-Prosperity Sphere."

Food, then, that weekend and that month was of the essence.

There is a strange and wonderful thing about Americans, of which I am proud. In war we bomb, we kill, occasionally our soldiers are savage, too—although when an American officer goes berserk, we try him in our own military courts, as we did Lieut. William Calley for the massacre at Mylai. But Americans abhor starvation, and they are very good at organizing to help all starving people—defeated Germans, defeated Japanese, Ethiopians subject to Marxism.

So, in the first few days of occupation, our rage evaporated in the task immediately at hand: to feed the Japanese people we had conquered.

What MacArthur was up against were the essentials that geography forces on anyone who governs Japan. Japan is a nation of four rocky islands—with a combined area that is smaller than California. Seventy-two percent of the land is mountain and rock, useless for anything but tourism and scenery. Only 16 percent is tillable. When, a century ago, the Japanese were a nation of 30 million people, they could barely feed themselves and infanticide was a common practice. Their internal history has thus been scorched with savage civil wars. Then, when Japan was opened, the coiled aggressions so long turned against each other turned against their neighbors—China first, then the Russians, then Korea.

But the Japanese add to their poverty of physical resources two extravagantly useful conditions. They have, first, a sharply indented coastline, with natural ports inviting deep water to their shore. England has the same advantage, which once gave that nation, and now gives Japan, access to all the world's resources of ore, oil, foods, timber; by cheap shipping, Japanese can draw raw materials from anywhere and can send competitive manufactures anywhere, too.

To this gift of geography is added a gift of genetics, a striking quality of mind. We often think of the Japanese as less than innovative but, technically, they are superb adapters and producers. We learned that in the war against them: their torpedoes were better and faster than ours . . . until we learned to make ours better. Their initial combat plane—the Zero—was a superlative machine; it could turn, dart, wheel away and mock American flying machines. No matter that Americans had invented the airplane and the flattop; when the war started, Japan had in several arms superior, if derivative, technology. What licked them was American bravery, the mobilization of then-Superior American science and industry, and their own blundering politics that led them to challenge us.

Whether Americans made an equal blunder in entering Asia in 1945 is something historians will debate for decades to come. But if we did blunder in that fall seaon of 1945, the blunder stemmed from mercy and generosity. Both mercy and generosity proposed a peace the like of which had never been granted before to any conquered nation—except, perhaps, the Germany defeated only months before.

Our first challenge in those early weeks was, of course, the simple mechnanics of occupation. But then we faced the problem of how to govern the now-abject nation—above all, how to feed it. Japan's hospitals were full of the diseases of malnutrition. MacArthur ordered at once that our occupying forces distribute their rations to Japanese civilians from Army kitchens. He then ordered that all the 3½ million tons of food stockpiled for our own armies for the projected landings of October and November be rushed in. Yet still there was not enough. He himself described it best in a cable to the War Department in the spring of 1946—a spring of imminent starvation. We must either feed the Japanese or starve them, he wrote, and then we must face the consequences. "Starvation breeds mass unrest, disorder, violence. Give me bread or give me bullets," he finished in a grandiloquent MacArthurian flourish.

The next paragraph of MacArthur's reminiscences is a single sentence: "I got bread."

MacArthur had, almost immediately after moving his headquarters from Yokohama to Tokyo, set about creating a new Japan. Of the Emperor, he demanded that a new prime minister be immediately named. By October, the Emperor had replaced his uncle, the nominal prime minister at the time of surrender, with Baron Shidehara, to whom, on his first visit, MacArthur explained America's wishes for the new Japan.

MacArthur's directives were cut from the cloth of American good will. Japan (so ran his first directive) must completely emancipate Japanese women; must let workers organize in unions; ban abuse of child labor; abolish secret police. Further, Japan must reorganize its education system and "democratize" its industrial system. He left it to Shidehara to work out the details.

It was this broad grant of latitude that was most important. The Japanese could pick and choose their way through MacArthur's directives. The way they chose to implement them allowed their industry, their universities, their ingenuity to flourish. And the rebirth of Japan since its defeat is a parable of history. If one speeds up the interaction of ideas and drive, it becomes a drama.

It is impossible to blame the Japanese for accepting American mercy and the American invitation to thrive. Neither Congress nor the United States War Department wanted to feed Japan indefinitely or pay for its recovery. It was up to the Japanese to work their own way back, to remove themselves from the backs of the American taxpayer.

A young lieutenant with the 27th Infantry Division was among the first to land in that week after the surrender; his company had fought in the battle of Okinawa; it had entered with 180 men and come out with only 20. That young combat lieutenant, Malcolm Baldrige, is now Secretary of Commerce, and he recalls the desolation in Japan. "We sent them," he recalls now, "blood-fractionating technology on humanitarian grounds. Today the company we gave the technology to competes with Americans around the world. We sent them technicians from the Underwriters Laboratory to certify that Japanese products were up to American standards, fit for export. Today U.S. companies fight to get their exports certified for entry into Japan." Baldrige is both wise and somber. The Japanese, as Government policy, are undermining one American industry after another. But Baldrige, as a senior administration official, must restrain his forebodings in public.

To understand his bitterness one must again go back to the story of governing ideas. Early in 1947, as Japan was thawing from defeat, we sponsored something called GATT—the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, with headquarters in Geneva. GATT embodied an idea almost two centuries old, the idea of Adam Smith. Smith believed that history moves in stages, and, because he lived at the dawn of the Industrial Revolution, he denounced the outworn ideas of mercantilism—the world stage was now set for "free trade." An "invisible hand," Smith held, should and would shape the flow of goods from one nation to another, wherever "comparative advantage" in production would draw wares from one country to another.

By the mid-1940s, American thinking had made a holy cause of "free trade." Our conventional analysis of the second World War held that both Hitler and the Japanese had violated the theology of "free trade," staking out spheres of economic dominance with bayonets, thus bringing war. Now, however, in 1947, GATT would enforce free trade in all the non-Marxist world, eliminating tariffs and barriers, and allowing goods to flow freely from country to country. We were at our peak in the history of commerce. Thus—onward and upward to the sunlit plateau of world prosperity and peace.

For the Japanese it must have seemed to good to be true, and it took them several years to learn that the Americans had rewarded them with a world market far larger then the Great East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere. The Americans had given them an invitation to the world trading game in total ignorance of what Japanese genius and tactics might accomplish. As late as 1954, a haze of victory still clouded American thinking. Said John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State, at a National Security Council meeting in August of that year, I "told Premier Yoshida frankly that Japan should not expect to find a big American market because the Japanese don't make the things we want. Japan must find markets elsewhere for the goods they export." It would be at least 30 years before history proved Dulles wrong, before our trade deficit with Japan grew to the thunderhead of an estimated $45 billion for 1985.

There were, of course several things wrong with the ideas that begot GATT. First was the belief that all the world would behave by the rules codified by GATT. We could not entertain the idea that some nations would race, like broken-field runners, through the new rules of tariffs and trade; that GATT would be riddled and pock-holed by subsidies, regulations, quotas and barriers that made mockery of the idea of free trade.

But the more important thing that went wrong with GATT was almost too simple to consider. If all people of the world were entitled to equally free trade, then the cheapest producers would be those who paid their people least, yet mastered world-class technology. In other words, nations whose workers were grateful for starvation wages could conquer the markets of countries like America, whose workers demanded the world's highest wages. The only way thus to compete was by efficiencies of production, in which the Japanese steadily strove to match the Americans, or by wage standards with which American workers could not compete, or both. Asian standards of living would have to go up or our standards would go down until an equilibrium would be reached.

In the 40 years since defeat, Japan has grown to be a giant. Japan has passed the Soviet Union in industrial production and stands as world class No. 2 to our No. 1. If the present Japanese expansion of production continues, it will be, in 20 years, a greater industrial power than the United States.

When the Japanese looked out from their world of ruins in the months after defeat, disaster drew self-examination as tight as skin about every individual as well as the community. "Japan was smashed," says one American industrialist. "It's industry was shattered or obsolete. Every institution had failed them . . . . There was no leadership, no model for creating a new Japan except that which America forced on it." So MacArthur and his staff became the leadership, America the model.

What the Japanese have done since in remodeling the American model is no less than spectacular. They have devised a system of government-industry partnership that is a paradigm for directing a modern industrial state for national purposes—and one designed for action in the new world of global commerce that the United States blueprinted.

The Japanese have a tangled bureaucracy that baffles foreign intruders, but one must recognize at least the two main players in the game to understand the dynamics of the Japanese trade thrust.

The Ministry of Finance comes first. In the words of one American Ambassador to Japan, "it has the ultimate call." Its policies set the exchange rate of the yen, keeping the currency undervalued in order to keep export prices low. It stimulates savings and investment, finances industry by directing the allocation of funds through the banks it controls. The Ministry of Finance provides the launching pad from which MITI directs the guided missiles of the trade offensive.

MITI—the Ministry of International Trade and Industry, the second major player in the game—is a totally new Japanese invention. MITI targets those Japanese industries that are to grow, targets the countries and markets to be penetrated. It can adjust depreciation rates for favored industries; coordinate research into arcane technologies—for example, into the fifth generation of computers. (Its only American rival in such research is the Pentagon, which can afford to match Japan's Incorporated budget).

Sometimes MITI makes mistakes—as in the overbuilding of the Japanese steel and shipbuilding industries, now in surplus capacity because of competition from South Korea. More often it is wise enough to put to sleep industries that can no longer compete. The island of Kyushu once employed 200,000 coal miners; only 7,000 remain there because oil and coal come cheaper from abroad—and so Kyushu has become a thriving center for electronics. MITI defines strategies; Japanese private enterprise follows through with zest. No better marriage of government planning and private enterprise has ever been seen.

The Japanese have caught the essence of Adam Smith—that history moves through its stages as opportunity and technology beckon. Nor is it alone in seeing the perspectives of the world America fostered. Although Jean Monnet designed Europe's Common Market, America has its godfather. Europe also presses to orient its industries to national purpose. West Germany, Europe's foremost industrial power, presses hardest. But the Germans expend much of their energies within the Common Market we sought to build. In American commerce, trade with West Germany is large, yet marginal. In 1971, when America first fell into the trade deficit that forced us off the gold standard, Germans exported $3.7 billion worth of goods to America, Japan $5.9 billion. Last year, the Germans shipped $16.9 billion—but the Japanese shipped $60.4 billion. The Germans, somehow, evoke little American bitterness because we understand their culture, establish American plants there without hindrance. The Japanese provoke American wrath because they are a locked and closed civilization that reciprocates our hushed fear with veiled contempt.

Few American businessmen abroad would qualify as Knights of the Round Table. American oil companies once, in the prime of their power, could make and unmake governments. But many American businesses have been welcomed overseas, if only because they usually pay higher wages than competitors. Most of all, they have been restrained by American antitrust laws from the kind of nationally coordinated trade offensive captained by MITI against all other countries.

American industry grew up in partnership with European industry. But Japan rouses different fears. Behind Japan ("the Big Dragon," some call it) march the "four little dragons" (Korea, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore) following in its path. And behind loom China and India, desperate as they are to raise their standards of living—at the expense of American standards, if necessary.

The Japanese are far ahead in the race for world trade markets, and they are moving now to yet another stage. Their export surplus gives them huge sums to invest—in the Middle East and America—so that Japanese capital is moving from penetration to control. Japanese are beginning to supply venture capital for the seedbeds of American technology, from Silicon Valley in California to Route 128 in Boston. They hover over the Draper Laboratories in Massachusetts—the national laboratories that devise the guidance system of our missiles—and acquire what patents security lets free to the public. In the Los Angeles area alone, the Japanese have installed or acquired 1,500 firms. Their acquisitions in our banking system have grown significantly; contrarywise, Americans are all but excluded from Japanese capital markets. And, by the doctrine of GATT, all this is entirely legal.

Yet what is legal may also be unfair. While Japan's tariff rates are, in broad economic terms, roughy equal to those of other industrial nations, they are spiked with special tariffs in industries that are considered vulnerable to foreign competition. In addition, Japanese markets are protected by a maze of so-called nontariff barriers to trade—many of which fall outside the reach of GATT regulations. We cannot sell our exports freely in Japan, whether beef, tobacco, citrus fruits, or leather goods. Consumer markets, too, are closed by regulations that the Japanese attribute to "cultural differences."

What Japanese does import from us are, chiefly, those raw materials always taken by master nations from colonial nations—grain, cotton, ores, fuel. We still ship to Japan a few remaining high-technology items, like aircraft, and some telecommunications and high-powered computers in which we hold a narrowing lead. But the Japanese continue to squeeze that lead, because their infant-industry-protection laws are planned to give them time to catch up. They will not buy American satellites until they learn to make their own. Corning Glass Works has had a fiber-optics patent pending in Japan for 12 years; in this time, the Japanese have learned to make fiber optics of their own that they now sell to America. Crude oil may be sold to Japan; but the Japanese will not buy our refined oil. American products certified here must go through slow, tedious re-testing in Japan before entering the Japanese market, while Japanese technology catches up.

American markets for Japanese goods are not only open but come with an invitation. The United States Census makes its marketing information open to all; for a fee anyone can buy its tapes that define, area by area, county by county, income group by income group, where Toyota, Sony, Hitachi, Honda can best space their distributorships; and American advertising agencies will, for a fee, translate consumer appetite into market conquest. No nation that thinks of itself as an assembly of consumers can resist Japanese penetration. But a nation that thinks of itself as a community has reason for alarm.

Today not a single consumer radio is made in America, although Americans invented the modern radio; not a single black-and-white television set is made here, although America invented television. The few companies that assemble color television sets in the United States could not exist without imported parts made in Asia, although color television was originally developed in America. Almost all our video-cassette recorders are made in Japan; so are most hand-held calculators, watches, a huge share of our office machinery, and most high-fidelity audio equipment. Only one American motorcycle manufacturer remains (Harley-Davidson); the Japanese hold 95 percent of our market. Only one American piano manufacturer remains (Steinway). The Brooklyn Navy Yard, where the conquering U.S.S. Missouri was launched in 1943, no longer exists.

The American automobile and steel industries were the first to be hit by Japan's trade offensive—they were vulnerable. Emerging from the war fat, stuffy and complacent, content largely with obsolescent equipment and practices, shortsighted American management let its technologies fall well behind those developing elsewhere. In 1966, the Japanese shipped only 63,000 automobiles to America; by 1970, MITI had stimulated the shipment of 415,000. Americans found Japanese cars to be good cars; they consumed little gasoline, they were cheaper; their fit-and-finish were splendid, and with the rise in gasoline prices, the American appetite for Japanese automobiles soared. But when the Reagan Administration this spring released Japan from negotiated voluntary quotas on car exports to the United States, Japan announced that it would raise its shipment to 2.3 million autos to America, as if we were a controlled colonial market. It was too much. By a vote of 92 to 0, the Senate declared Japanese trade practice unfair. But it was a belated revolt; this summer, American consumers are gobbling up Japanese automobiles faster than the Japanese can gear up to ship them.

This year, apparently, MITI's chief target is the American electronic industry. Last year, the trade deficit with Japan in electronics surpassed our trade deficit in automobiles—reaching $15.4 billion of our total adverse balance with Japan of $37 billion. The American semiconductor industry is reeling from assault. The Japanese, without mercy, propose to wipe out our supremacy in this industry, based on our own research and invention. Hitachi, now an electronics exporter, was blasted to bits by our bombers in the last two weeks of the war as one of the leading Japanese armsmakers. But Hitachi is now on the counterattack, its tone martial again. Here, for example, is Hitachi's directive this year to its offices in Denver, where it is trying to take away the semiconductor market from America's Intel Corporation and Advanced Micro Devices. It reads: "Win with the 10 percent rule! Find AMD and Intel sockets. Quote 10 percent below their prices! If they requote, go 10 percent again. Don't quit till you win!"

A benign prosperity temporarily soothes the American economy. In the six years since 1979, America has added 6,000,000 jobs to its total work force. But these are mostly service jobs. In the skill-and-brawn base of American production, not only have real wages fallen, but the job base is shriveling. In machinery production, in these six years, the United States has lost 288,000 jobs; in primary meal-making (such as steel) we have lost 439,000 jobs; in fabricated metals, 241,000 jobs; in motor-vehicle production, 118,000 jobs; in textiles, 186,000 jobs. All in all, on the line, in the old shops, where Americans make things, we have lost 1,834,000 jobs.

No industry in America has been harder hit by Asian competition than the American garment industry, which has lost 155,000 jobs in the last six years alone. One should listen to Sol Chaikin, an air corps veteran of the China war theater against Japan.

Chaikin is now the president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union. Once, in the early 1950s, his union counted 230,000 workers in New York City alone. Today he counts only 100,000 and they work at the lowest-paid union jobs in the city.

"Ours," says Chaikin, "is the most competitive industry in America. It's a cheap industry to get into and we have 15,000 ladies-garment manufacturers in the U.S.A. They all have the most modern machinery, but the Asians have the same machinery and they work for less and for longer hours. The Japanese once were our chief competitors, but Japanese wage rates have now risen to levels comparable to ours. The Japanese now buy American designs, open factories with new machinery in Singapore and Hong Kong, ship the fabrics from Japan, and export from offshore. In Korea and Taiwan, they pay 57 cents an hour; in Hong Kong, $1.08 an hour; and in Sri Lanka they pay $5.00 a week. In New York, our workers get only $175.00 a week take-home pay—and they pay almost $1 for a subway fare each way."

Chaikin knows that his workers in New York cannot compete with Asian standards of living. "It's as if we were being poured into a Mixmaster with China, India, Japan, Taiwan; they've homogenized the international labor market and are squeezing us out like toothpaste." Chaikin insists that some garment jobs, at least, must be preserved for American working people, that the American market should be shared with Americans. But there is no high-technology ladder to leap over cheap Asian wages when it comes to handwork. Of blue-collar jobs in America, one in seven is held by a textile-garment-apparel worker. The National Academy of Engineering estimated in 1983 that, of 2,000,000 jobs in the garment-textile industry, only 750,000 would be left in 10 years. Chaikin's back is up against the wall.

Less than a mile from Chaikin's union headquarters is the elegant executive suite of the Radio Corporation of America. Chairman of the Board Thornton F. Bradshaw is another combat veteran, whose destroyer was put out of action by the Japanese Navy in the last months of the war. Bradshaw, if anyone, is an authentic statesman of American industry. He is unworried about RCA, which is happy and prosperous. His view is entirely different from Chaikin's, for his company has adjusted to the world market. But RCA long ago gave up on penetrating Japan. Its creator, Gen. David Sarnoff, thought the American market was enough, and licensed to Japan and the rest of the world the technologies RCA has patented—technologies that underlie much of modern electronics production. RCA prospers from its lead in advanced electronics—from its satellites, from its arms contracts (like the Aegis guided missile cruiser), from its broadcast net, NBC, from its marketing of imported parts and products, from manufacturing television sets. But, despite RCA's prosperity, Bradshaw is deeply worried—about America as an industrial community where both work ethic and practice have decayed.

Bradshaw is concerned for America's economy as a whole, Chaikin for his working people—both equally honorable concerns. But neither believes that any reasonable persuasion can slow the Asian trade surge unless the American Government acts—sooner rather than later. What is needed is a structural change in American life and thinking, as sweeping as Japan's in 1945-1950—from factory floor to research labs and universities, from reduction of the Federal budget deficit, to a total review of our trading policies.

So the story moves to Washington.

Washington is always in crisis—small crises, acute crises, lurking crises. But the trade crisis is quite extraordinary for the anarchy of ideas that prevails. Ideas clash in perception of a world that has totally changed since the days of victory. Trade, as we designed it, has become completely global, and America has become the last open gaming table for world adventurers. Within the confusion of Washington's thinking, however, at least three truths are taken as paramount.

The first truth, the starting point of all thoughtful conversations, is the overwhelming burden of the overvalued dollar.

"When I was dealing with Japan the problem was different," says Robert S. Strauss, Jimmy Carter's trade representative from 1977 to 1979. "I talked in a universe of tariffs . . . of trade . . . nontrade . . . cultural barriers . . . political difficulties." Strauss, a very suave, but very tough man, is remembered as one of the few American trade representatives who have been able to out-negotiate the Japanese. For a brief period, his tenacity caused the impermeable membrane of Japanese resistance to yield. "Now," he says, "you're talking about a world where trade has reached $2 trillion a year, but capital flows have reached a magnitude of $20 trillion a year, swirling around the world like a jet stream. It drops off here because of safety and high interest rates, and pushes the dollar up. It makes the trade problem look like a pygmy problem. It distorts everything, and leaves the poor American exporter, no matter how good or efficient, like a runner doing a sprint with an anvil under his arm.

"The Japanese don't adjust the yen every day. But you don't have to be a genius to know that when the Bank of Japan coughs, everyone gets the sniffles. But we have no policy. Even if we started now, we couldn't work things out in a year, or five. We need a strategy."

There comes next the second truth: Japan's "unfair" trading practices, its regulations, rules, restrictions, quotas. Says Secretary of Commerce Baldrige: "Japanese export policy has as its objective not participation in, but dominance of, world markets. Japanese trade policies assume as a right protection of their industries that are emerging, like satellites, depressed industries like paper and chemicals, politically important industries like agriculture, socially sensitive industries like leather . . . .

"In 1983, we took 30 percent of Japan's overseas exports, in 1984, 35 percent. In practical terms, this means that all the net increase in Japanese domestic employment in recent years is attributable to sale to the United States. . . . America's pursuit of free trade is like Sir Galahad's quest for the Holy Grail."

From the National Association of Manufacturers to the AFL-CIO, one catches the alarm in vivid language. "There are six to eight main interacting trade-and-production groups, or 'keiretsu,'" says one association official, who asked not to be identified. "They buy and sell chiefly to their own subsidiaries, and they divide Japan's market up. When we squeeze, they'll allot, say, 11 percent of a particular market to all importers. They are opaque, insensitive people, who don't know that they have brought us to the edge."

Says Lane Kirkland, president of the AFL-CIO, the man most concerned for the fate of American workingmen, who last visited Japan this winter, "To hear the Japanese plead for free trade is like hearing the word 'love' on the lips of a harlot."

The last body of truths comes from the engineering community—it is the most serious, most somber, most challenging. It is that the Japanese are very, very good, better at some things than Americans. They are brilliant, efficient, aggressive people who prize education as much or more than Americans—and have learned to use it. John Gibbons is the head of Congress's Office of Technology Assessment—he is a physicist, who comes to Congress from the Oak Ridge Labs of the Atomic Energy Commission. He starts the story of Japan's renaissance with the occupation:

"The most important thing we did after the war was to reorganize it; we democratized it; we lifted the burden of arms from it, and they poured resources into education. We helped them. We gave free doctorates in nuclear science to their students and brought them to Oak Ridge. But you have to realize that the Japanese already had traditional skills and techniques; they were superb in alloying metals, in ceramics, in fermentation—out of the broths they knew how to brew came the fermentation know-how vital to biotechnologies.

"They are ahead of us in productivity in automobiles, in steel, in robotics. We are ahead in fundamental research, but they get all our science papers and research, and they add to that their mastery of 'process technology,' translating fundamental research into the making of things. They recruit their managers from the factory floor; we get ours out of law schools."

In Gibbons's view, the challenge lies, above all, to American technology and education. Unless we can translate our lead in fundamental research into practice, then others will be the chief beneficiaries of our science and laboratories.

In a few days in Washington, one can trace a trail of irritations blistering under the bland rhetoric that still binds the Pacific alliance together.

Start at the State Department with middle-level officers who deal daily with the Japanese—and one hears language almost unheard elsewhere in that labyrinth of quiet diplomats. "Japan," said one, who asked not to be identified, "is a protectionist nation: They have no sense of moderation; they are an island nation looking out on the rest of the world as plunder from a protected bastion. Negotiations are tedious, painful—oh, so painful—and, when they yield, they yield with no grace. It's not only quotas on beef, citrus fruits, leather, but even on our catsup and peanut butter.

"In 1981, they banned American metal baseball bats. We had the technology for making a safe cap for metal bats. The Japanese made a metal bat with a plastic plug top; a plug flew off at a baseball game and struck a spectator. So all metal bats, safe and dangerous, were banned. We negotiated for three years, we had to get them to change 18 laws and regulations; we had to get the consent of the Japanese Softball Association. Then, when the Japanese learned to make safe metal caps, they reopened the market. Last year, we finally managed to export 350 metal bats to Japan!"

This is the voice of a working deplomat in the State Department. The bureaucracy bows to political leadership. But it remains the national political scouting force abroad, and cannot help but observe politics at home. Its officers do not blink at the reality that Americans want to buy cheap quality goods; no one forces them to buy Japanese goods. Nor can they blink at the fact that no fewer than 30 states now have their own offices in Japan soliciting Japanese investment. But they cannot blink either at the fact that so much of American industry is being wiped out, and that the men and women discarded scream to Congress.

At the supreme level, President Reagan deals with Premier Yasuhiro Nakasone of Japan, who yields and, with exquisite courtesy, goes on television to urge his people to sample American and foreign imports. But at the working level, each negotiation is a tormented, ad hoc, item-by-item bargaining.

A shawl of self-restraint drapes over most official American spokesmen; to be accused of "Japan-bashing" is considered "protectionist" or, worse, "racist." Foremost among those who thus speak for the old free-trade tradition, one finds Secretary of State George P. Shultz. "There is great sentiment for protection around the country," he told a gathering of the American Stock Exchange recently, "but in my opinion it's wrong . . . it's bad . . . this is a matter of deep conviction on my part." But no such restraint binds Congress, or the unions who influence so many constituencies. Congress is entertaining half-a-dozen bills right now sponsored by afflicted Congressmen; it is even considering a 25 percent tariff on all imported goods.

Congress is where one can best see the deadlock of ideas, as shoe workers, garment workers, steel workers, auto workers demand protection. But Senator Christopher Dodd of Connecticut is typical of a Congressman in the middle; he is a young, liberal, thoughtful Democrat, and knows that foreign trade is essential to America. He comes from that state in the Union that is most dependent on foreign trade—25 percent of Connecticut's gross state product goes into exports. But Dodd also sits on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which he describes as torn between "bumper-sticker patriots," and those who believe that world peace rests on world trade.●

POLISH-AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to reiterate my great admiration for Poland, its people, and its descendants here in the United States. Being a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 146, legislation to designate this month as Polish-American Heritage Month, I am proud to further illuminate the struggles and the triumphs of the Polish peoples.

The story of the Polish struggle for survival is a long one. In 800 A.D., slavic tribes in what is now Poland united under the Polane and by 1025 Boleslaw I was crowned King. Struggling through the Middle Ages, the Polish Empire emerged in the 1500's at its pinnacle.

However, in 1772 Austria, Prussia, and Russia partitioned Poland. This began the ongoing struggle of the Polish people to preserve their freedoms and national solidarity. In this century alone, there have been three major geographical realignments. This includes 1939, when Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, without respect for the self-determination of previously free peoples or even life itself, illegally divided Poland for their own devices. For a while Poland disappeared from the face of Europe, but not from the heart of Europe.

The Poles have suffered much, but have given more—they have given themselves. When Joseph Conrad left Poland, one could hardly have imagined that, after having learned English at 18 years old, he would go on to become the quintessential English writer of his period.

In the United States, we have enjoyed the talents of many Polish-Americans. After Germany moved through Europe, Wanda Landowska left her Paris school and came to America to grace us with her music. As harpsichordist, pianist, and composer, she enlivened the world and transcended the misery of what was occurring in her home country.

With the artistry of Wanda Landowska and Joseph Conrad, the world is a better place, as is America graced with the fortitude of such distinguished Polish-American leaders as Senator Edmund Muskie. Senator Muskie helped break ethnic barriers that this Senator knows all too well. Let us not forget the world leadership of a man I mentioned the last time I spoke on this topic: Pope John Paul II.

Mr. President, let us never forget the differing components that have created this great country and made us all Americans.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

DR. NORMAN J. ORNSTEIN

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, last Friday, July 26, I introduced into the RECORD a passage from Norman J. Ornstein's recent essay, "The Politics of the Deficit," which appeared in "Essays in Contemporary Economic Problems", a volume edited by Philip Cagan for the American Enterprise Institute. In my remarks, I referred to Dr. Ornstein as a "respected economist." He is most assuredly respected, but he is in fact a political scientist, and one of our distinguished students of the Congress. Through an error in transcription, for which I alone am responsible, I am also to be read referring to him as a "conservative." He is not that either, in the accepted sense of an advocate of certain policies. Nor yet is he a "liberal" political scientist. He keeps his politics to himself and reserves his objectivity for the profession he serves so well.

I apologize to the Senate and most especially to Dr. Ornstien.●

DR. YURIY ORLOV AND HELSINKI MONITORING GROUPS RELEASE

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 166, introduced by my good friend and colleague, the senior Senator from Minnesota. This resolution appeals for the release by the Soviets of Dr. Yuriy Orlov and other members of Helsinki monitoring groups.

Today we commemorate the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. It is a sober commemoration, however. Soviet and Eastern bloc respect for human rights has not improved since 1975. These nations have not lived up to either the spirit or the letter of the Helsinki Final Act.

When the accords were signed, monitoring groups were formed within the Soviet Union and its satellites. Although such groups thrived in the beginning, by the late seventies they faced annihilation. One of the most harshly treated monitoring groups was the Moscow Helsinki Watch Group.

This group was founded by Dr. Yuriy Orlov in 1976. Because of his efforts, Dr. Orlov was arrested in 1977 and sentenced to 7 years at hard labor and 5 years of internal exile. Dr. Orlov is currently forced to live in a remote part of Siberia where his health has deteriorated. He suffers from chronic illness and has lost all of his teeth.

His fate is shared by most of the members of the Moscow Helsinki Watch Group. Fifty-one members of that ill-fated group are incarcerated in prisons, labor camps, psychiatric hospitals, or are serving terms of exile. Eighteen members of the group have had to emigrate. Most tragically, three have died as a result of years of mistreatment at the hands of the ruthless Soviet regime. Such atrocities have been repeated throughout Eastern bloc nations. These actions are the ultimate proof of Moscow's contempt for the Helsinki Final Act.

Senate Joint Resolution 166 calls upon the Government of the U.S.S.R. to release Dr. Yuriy Orlov from exile and allow him to emigrate. This resolution also urges the President to instruct the Secretary of State to raise the case of Dr. Orlov publicly and privately with the Soviet Government. As a man of great hope, I think the release of Dr. Orlov would be a great first step toward beginning a new Soviet era of respect for human rights and to justify its signature on the Helsinki Final Act.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in cosponsoring of this important resolution.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

APPEAL OF SEPARATED SPOUSES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I recently received an appeal from a group of Soviet citizens separated from their American spouses. One of the authors is Irina McClellan who has not even been permitted to see her husband since their marriage in 1974. This is the longest unresolved binational marriage case in which the American and Soviet spouses have not been permitted to be reunited.

Another of the authors of the appeal is Yuriy Balovlenkov who recently ended a prolonged hunger strike begun on March 25 to call attention to his efforts to be reunited with his wife and children in the United States. He was briefly hospitalized in mid-June and remains in serious condition.

Members of Congress as well as the U.S. Government have consistently urged Soviet authorities to adopt a more favorable attitude toward Soviet citizens who have applied to be reunited with their American spouses. In bilateral meetings, including those between Foreign Ministers, the United States has repeatedly stressed its desire to see these cases resolved. The Department of State maintains a list of those Soviet citizens who want to be reunited with their American spouses, but have been denied exit permission. It is presented to the Soviets at regular intervals and at the highest levels.

The authors of this appeal are included on the list of separated spouses, but their cases are of particular concern because they represent some of the longest enforced separations of husband and wife. The Department of State and the U.S. Embassy in Moscow have raised these cases repeatedly. Unfortunately, the Soviet Government has not been responsive to American efforts. While the Soviets claim to respect the principle of family reunification, their actions belie their words.

I ask that a copy of the appeal of the separated spouses as well as brief descriptions of the efforts which each of the authors of this appeal has made to obtain Soviet exit permission be printed in the RECORD.

For these Soviets, harassed by their own Government and denied the opportunity to live with their American spouses, U.S. support is the one hope that the Soviet Government will fulfill its Helsinki commitment and allow them to rejoin their families. Ten years ago, the Soviet Government promised to "deal in a positive and humanitarian spirit with the applications of persons who wish to be reunited with members of their family."

Mr. President, I intend to do whatever I can to encourage the Soviet Government to keep that pledge.

The material follows:

APPEAL OF SEPARATED SPOUSES

We appeal to you for help. Today, ten years after the signing of the Helsinki Agreement, we citizens of the Soviet Union remain forcibly separated from our wives, husbands and children. All our efforts, as well as those of our spouses, to reunite our families have been without success. We have been refused the right to live together with our loved ones for untenable or fictitious reasons, or, in some cases, for no reason at all. Our repeated appeals to the leadership of the Soviet Union remain unanswered. We have been deceived and even mocked by the official representatives of the very country which claims to be a guiding force in the forefront of the movement for security and cooperation in Europe. With every year, enduring in this forced separation from our loved ones, we continue to hope that at some point, the high humanitarian principles which have been enunciated will be fulfilled and will replace our bitterness and disillusionment.

If you still believe in the ideals to which you obligated yourself ten years ago in the concluding act of the Helsinki Conference, we appeal to you for help in proving that the words of the act were not empty fairy tales. For we are convinced that so long as national borders separate husbands and wives, parents and children, the people of the world will remain as far from the ideals of cooperation and mutual accord as in the worst periods of human history. So long as national borders divide even one family, there will be no peace in the world.

Respectfully,

Yuriy Balovlenkov, Roman Kuperman, Sergey Petrov, Irina McClellan, Elena Kapland, Mikhail Iossel, Andrei Planson, Tamara Tretyakova, Matvey Finkel, Elena Rose.

CASE HISTORIES

YURIY BALOVLENKOV

Elena Kusmenko, an American citizen, married Yuriy Balovlenkov in December 1978. They have two daughters by their marriage. Only one has ever seen her father. Balovlenkov went on a hunger strike of several weeks' duration in the spring and summer of 1982 with the objective of gaining exit permission. At a July 1982 press conference, the Director of the Moscow Office of OVIR stated that Balovlenkov had only been "temporarily" refused exit permission. At that time, he reportedly received private assurances that his case would be favorably resolved by January 1985. In February 1985 Embassy Moscow made a representation to the MFA in support of Balovlenkov's request that his previously denied application for exit permission be reviewed. The Soviets denied his appeal in May, and he again made a new application. He has been on a hunger strike since March 25 protesting Soviet denials of his applications to be reunited with his wife and children. He was hospitalized at his own request on June 14.

ROMAN KUPERMAN

Fran Pergericht, an American citizen, married Roman Kuperman on February 24, 1982. Both are Jewish. Mr. Kuperman did not apply for Soviet exit permission until after his marriage. His father reportedly was a Colonel in the Soviet army, but does not oppose his son's efforts to be reunited with Ms. Pergericht. Mr. Kuperman's first application for exit permission was denied in March 1982. Subsequently, he has been denied three more times, most recently in January 1985. The Soviets have on several occasions denied Kuperman's wife the right to visit him in the Soviet Union.

SERGEY PETROV

Virginia Johnson and her Soviet spouse Sergey Petrov were married in February 1981. Mr. Petrov has been refused Soviet exit permission a number of times since then. He joined Balovlenkov and a number of other separated spouses in an unsuccessful hunger strike during the spring/summer of 1982. His last application was made on October 1984.

IRINA MC CLELLAN

Irina and Woodford McClellan were married in 1974. This is the longest unresolved binational marriage case in which the American and Soviet spouses have not been permitted to be reunited. She last applied for permission to emigrate in August 1984. Since their marriage, the McClellans have not been permitted even to see one another. All of Professor McClellan's applications to visit his wife have been denied over the past ten years. Mrs. McClellan's August 1984 application for exit permission had been solicited by OVIR, making her denial all the more difficult to understand.

ELENA KAPLAN

Gary Talanov (formerly Kaplan) married his Soviet spouse Elena Kaplan in April 1978 in Moscow. Elena last applied for Soviet exit permission in September 1984. She has been refused at least five times in applying for Soviet exist permission since their marriage. Elena again applied for exist permission in September 1984 and was denied.

MIKHAIL IOSSEL

Edith Luthi married Mikhail Iossel in August 1981 while she was in the Soviet Union for a six-week study tour. Since then, Iossel has applied for an exit visa three times and has been refused on each occasion. The couple has one son. To increase their chances of reuniting, Iossel quit his job as a computer programmer soon after the marriage. His father, a physicist, recently retired.

ANDREI PLANSON

Andrei Planson who married Carolyn Justice, an American citizen in 1981. He has been refused an exit visa on six occasions. He has not yet seen their newborn son. The couple believe that Planson's father's job as an engineer dealing with sensitive matters may be the major impediment to their reunification, an explanation given to them in 1982 by a Leningrad party official. Although the father has since been fired from his job and expelled from the Communist Party, the Soviet authorities have stated that Planson's situation remains unchanged.

TAMARA TRETYAKOVA

Tamara Tretyakov married Semyon Livshits (who has since changed his name to Simon Levin) in 1978 in the Soviet Union. Mr. Levin emigrated to Israel a month later in 1978 and subsequently moved to the U.S. later that same year. His wife was forced to remain in the USSR as she was about to give birth to their child. Since then she and their son, Mark, have applied for exit permission to join Simon, and have been repeatedly refused. The reason given is that Tretyakova had worked on a military construction site. In early 1985, Tretyakova went on a hunger strike in an attempt to encourage officials to allow her to join her husband in the U.S. She was finally persuaded to end her hunger strike and is still slowly recovering. In late April, Simon was awarded custody of their son Mark by an Illinois court. He has also been trying to obtain a visa to visit his wife and son in the Soviet Union, but has been constantly denied.

MATVEY FINKEL

Susan Graham and her Soviet spouse Matvey Finkel were married in December 1979 in Moscow. Since that time, Mr. Finkel has been denied exit permission numerous times, most recently in June 1984.

ELENA ROSE

Elena Rose is a Soviet citizen, married to Scott Jeffrey Rose of Austin, Texas. The couple has been married since 1983. Elena and her step-daughter, Julia Vadimovna Begun, have twice been denied permission to emigrate since their first application in December 1983.●

S. 1084, A BILL TO AUTHORIZE APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE CORPORATION FOR PUBLIC BROADCASTING

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to ask that I be added as a cosponsor to S. 1084, a bill to authorize appropriations for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting [CPB].

I have been, and will continue to be, a strong supporter of public broadcasting. I am therefore, very concerned about its present and future funding.

Last year, I first cosponsored S. 2846, and then, after President Reagan exercised his "pocket veto" authority to kill that bill, I voted for a compromise funding measure, S. 607. This too, was vetoed by the President.

S. 2846 had 52 Senate cosponsors, was reported unanimously by the Senate Commerce Committee, and passed this body by a voice vote. The bill also enjoyed strong support in the House, which approved it by a vote of 302 to 91. Despite this broad-based support, the President claimed it would have increased Federal support for public broadcasting "too much, too fast." In fact, the legislation barely would have made up for the deep cuts in CPB's authorization during the early years of the administration.

The legislation I cosponsor today would authorize expenditures of $200 million for CPB in fiscal year 1987, $20 million less than its authorization in fiscal year 1983. I do so not because I wish to cut funding for this important organization, but rather because the President has made it clear that he will not accept anything more.

I am deeply disappointed with the administration's position. One year ago, in his veto message for S. 2846, the President acknowledged that, "Public broadcasting constitutes an important national resource and contributes to the diversity of news, information, and entertainment choices available to the public." The President has compared television, its programs, and its stars to neighbors who provide continuity and reassurance to their viewers. And, the President has committed himself to excellence in education.

I am troubled, because at the same time that the President makes statements such as these, he seeks to cut funding for an organization that promotes learning among our children with such programming as "Electric Company," "Mr. Roger's Neighborhood," and "Sesame Street." I do not worry that such cuts will make it harder to invite such distinguished guests as the "Morning Edition" to breakfast, "The McNeil-Lehrer New Hour" to dinner, or "Upstairs, Downstairs" for an evening at home.

Mr. President, this bill reflects the political realities of the President's previous vetoes of authorizations for the CPB. I continue to favor the level of support in the original authorization passed last year, but given the pressing need to approve forward funding for public broadcasting in this Congress, I do support S. 1084.●

NOTICE OF DETERMINATION BY THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ETHICS

● Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, it is required by paragraph 4 of rule 35 that I place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this notice of a Senate employee who proposes to participate in a program, the principal objective of which is educational, sponsored by a foreign government or a foreign educational or charitable organization involving travel to a foreign country paid for by that foreign government or organization.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. David M. Strauss of the staff of Senator QUENTION BURDICK to participate in a program, sponsored by the World Affairs Council, to be held in Jordan and Israel from August 3 to August 11, 1985.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Strauss in the program in Jordan and Israel, at the expense of the World Affairs Council, to meet with Jordanian and Israeli officials, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Timothy Ridley of the staff of Senator FRANK LAUTENBERG to participate in a program in Taipei, Taiwan, sponsored by Soochow University, from August 2-10, 1985.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Ridley in the program in Taiwan, at the expense of Soochow University to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Robert B. Van Cleve of the staff of Senator JOHN DANFORTH to participate in a program sponsored by the World Affairs Council, to be held in Jordon and Israel, from August 3-11, 1985.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Van Cleve in the program in Jordan and Israel, at the expense of the World Affairs Council, to meet with Jordanian and Israel officials, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Owen D. Ambur, of the staff of Senator JAMES ABDNOR, to participate in a program in Taipei, Taiwan, sponsored by Tunghai University, from August 3-10, 1985.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Ambur in the program in Taipei, Taiwan, at the expense of Tunghai University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Miss Margaret P. Calhoun, a member of the staff of Senator STEVE SYMMS, to participate in a program in Southern Africa, sponsored by the South Africa Foundation, from August 17-29, 1985.

The committee has determined that participation by Ms. Calhoun in the program in Southern Africa at the expense of the South Africa Foundation, to meet with government and business leaders, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Dwight A. Howes of the staff of Senator JOHN HEINZ to participate in a program in Taipei, Taiwan, sponsored by Tunghai University, from August 2-10, 1985.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Howes in the program in Taipei, Taiwan, at the expense of Tunghai University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Gordon Riggle, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, to participate in a program in Taipei, Taiwan, sponsored by Tunghai University, from August 2 to August 10, 1985.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Riggle in the program in Taipei, Taiwan, at the expense of Tunghai University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.●

DEPARTMENT OF STATE APPOINTEES

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, before the Senate enters its August recess, there is one matter of some import we should address. This will not require debate or a vote, but over the long run it may be more important than much of the legislation we have been considering in the last several weeks.

It is no secret that many Senators have been seriously concerned about the overall tendency of appointments within the Department of State. In fulfilling their responsibility as Members of this Chamber, they have questioned the policy positions of some nominees; they have sought ample time to investigate the records of certain nominees; they have challenged the propriety of other nominations. In a few cases, Senators have voted against some nominations.

These activities have been within the rules of the Senate. They have demonstrated the rights and responsibilities, not only of individual Senators, but of the Senate itself.

It was, therefore, a matter of grave concern to me—and I think to other Senators as well—to read in the Wall Street Journal of July 9 an article in which anonymous officials at the State Department demonstrated, at best, ignorance of the Senate's role in foreign policy matters and, at worst, contempt for that role. By explicitly likening senatorial opposition to certain departmental nominees to the despicable kidnaping of Americans by terrorists in the Middle East, those officials have done nothing to minimize future problems in the Congress. On the contrary, they have demonstrated the arrogance and lack of judgment which underlie the problems the Department has had in recent months.

One comment in particular deserves close attention, not only by the Senate but by the President as well. According to the Journal, "Some of the other detained nominees, however, joke about taking matters into their own hands: 'Personally, I'm calling for an air strike if someone will give me the map coordinates for Senator HELMS' house,' says one, tongue in cheek." That verbal bravado was not only out of place; it was in sharp contrast to the pathetic weakness demonstrated at the same time by those responsible for the implementation of our foreign policy in the Middle East. No wonder the quoted official hid behind the cloak of anonymity. It is unfortunate that departmental functionaries do not speak with equal vigor in defense of U.S. interests in international affairs.

I never thought this would need to be said, but apparently it does: If the President's appointees at the Department of State do not understand the difference between Senators "holding hostage" certain dubious nominations and terrorist holding innocent hostages in Beirut, then it is incumbent upon the President to do either of two things. He must explain the difference to his appointees and make sure they learn the lesson, or he must secure other appointees who will not confuse the two in the first place.

I trust that no one in the administration will mistake this for routine griping. The prerogatives of the Senate are something I have always taken seriously, even when they are exercised by those with whom I personally disagree and for purposes contrary to my own. That is why I urge officials both in the White House and at the State Department to consider carefully the damage that has already been done, and the inconveniences that might still be engendered, by failure to understand the legitimate ways in which Members of the Senate carry out the responsibilities assigned them by the Constitution.●

REV. I. DEQUINCEY NEWMAN

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, the Reverend I. DeQuincey Newman resigned from the South Carolina Senate today for health reasons. Rarely have I known a man of such distinction. He is a living testimony to the transformation this country has undergone in the last 30 years, a figure of dignity and strength. In October of 1983 he became the first black person elected to the South Carolina Senate since Reconstruction, and the numbers from that election speak volumes about Reverend Newman as an individual and about the changes he helped bring about in our society. In a district that was only one-third black, he won a 54-percent majority.

Reverend Newman's victory is illustrative of the newest phase of the civil rights movement in America—the influx of black Americans into mainstream politics. One year after his election, three other black men followed him into the State senate after the implementation of a single member district reapportionment plan. This evolution of our political structures is healthy for the Nation. It brings thousands of black politicians into the political process and allows them to reap the benefits of the seeds sown by the great civil rights leaders who came before them.

Reverend Newman, however, is a special case. His service in the senate is truly the result of his own labors. He has pried open the door of opportunity at every step of the political process, and then he has walked through it. He paved the way for blacks to participate in the Democratic Party. Then, he was a leader in the fight for electoral reform that provided entry into public service for blacks. You see, Reverend Newman is not only today's beneficiary of the civil rights struggle—he was also yesterday's leader. He walked with Martin Luther King, Jr. and Roy Wilkins, and was South Carolina's foremost civil rights activist as NAACP field secretary more than 20 years ago. In the years when equal opportunity and equal justice under the law were only a dream for the people of his race, Reverend Newman was on the front line fighting the battles that dismantled the structure of segregation and discrimination. He led the sit-ins, the boycotts, and the demonstrations that roused the conscience of a nation and led to peaceful social revolution. He was once arrested at Myrtle Beach. How far we have come in the last 30 years. And through it all, the Reverend I. DeQuincey Newman was there.

I owe much to Reverend Newman. And for that matter, so does our Nation. It was he who guided me on hunger tours of my State during my first full term as U.S. Senator. He showed me that in this, the greatest and wealthiest of all nations, people were slowly starving to death. Those hunger tours gave me the information and resolve I needed to lead the successful fight in Washington for expanded hunger and nutrition programs.

Mr. President, the people and the government of South Carolina have benefited greatly from the wisdom and expertise of this inspirational individual. I am only sorry that we had to wait so long for him to take public office, and that his tenure had to be so short.●

NATIONAL HIGH-TECH MONTH

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased today to join as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 165, introduced by my distinguished colleague from Illinois, which designates October 1985 as National High-Tech Month. We should not only be concerned about high tech during October, but throughout the year as well. Therefore, I am pleased to support this resolution that calls attention to the importance of high tech for all of America.

National High-Tech Month celebrates past scientific achievements and inspires future advancement. It is essential that we continue to heighten public awareness and commitment to the technologies that make this country strong and prosperous. Our children must be provided with the necessary scientific information to enhance their understanding of the complexities with which we live.

We need programs that stimulate student interest in science and mathematics, which are vital for continued U.S. technological strength and development. The youth of this Nation need to have educational opportunities that expand their understanding and contributions to the field of high tech. A national focus on high tech will greatly enhance the future of America. To facilitate this goal, one of the highest national interests should be to maintain and to continue to develop U.S. technological strength.

Mr. President, this resolution provides an opportunity to focus public attention on the importance of science and technology. It is part of our continuing effort to make certain that our children are given every opportunity to advance in the field of high tech. Our children must be prepared for tomorrow by understanding the future of high technology today. Therefore, Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting "National High-Tech Month."●

THE BUSINESS TRANSFER ACT OF 1985

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, earlier this year I introduced the Business Transfer Tax Act of 1985 [BTT]. At the time I stressed that the BTT should be an integral part of any basic tax reform package that this Congress considers. In the time that has passed since the bill introduction, I have become increasingly convinced that the BTT should, and will, become a part of the tax reform package that will be produced by this body.

I am especially gratified by the support for this concept shown by members of the Senate Finance Committee. In hearings and in public appearances many Finance Committee members have endorsed the concept of a BTT and it is my feeling that if that committee were to mark up a bill today that the BTT would be an important part of that bill.

There has been considerable response to the President's tax reform proposal and it is the nature of this response that indicates just how crucial an addition a BTT would be. In order for tax reform to be politically viable it must enjoy broad support from the most productive sector of our economy—the middle class. As it is currently formulated, the President's plan cannot hope to achieve the type of middle class support it needs. The plan must be altered and the best way to achieve the desirable result is a further reduction of marginal tax rates.

The plan is also seriously deficient in the way it treats business capital. In 1981 there was a philosophy in this administration that held that removing the bias against investment in physical capital was essential to long run economic growth. In the current document there seems to be an almost singular obsession in removing differences in effective tax rates across investments even if it leads to an increase in the overall cost of capital to American business and a decrease in overall investment. An increase in the bias against investment runs counter to a progrowth philosophy but such an increase is evident in the President's proposal.

A third area of deficiency concerns personal savings. A New York Times editorial of July 5, 1985 makes the point that the Japanese have enjoyed such success internationally because of their tax treatment of saving and resultant hefty savings rates. The editorial gones on to say that if tax reform does not address the bias against saving in our Tax Code, then we would be missing a grand opportunity.

These three deficiencies in the President's plan can be corrected if the BTT is incorporated into tax reform. The BTT will also be a big step toward correcting biases against American goods in the international trade arena.

Mr. President, when we return from the August recess I will propose a package that corrects the three problems with the administration plan and creates a revenue neutral package by implimenting a BTT. This package will transform the President's plan into one that will enjoy broad middle class and business support. It will transform the plan from one with no promise of accelerated economic growth into one that will set the stage for economic growth for years to come. And finally, my package will result in a Tax Code that will aid us in international markets rather than to render us less than competitive.

Specifically, I will propose further rate reduction from the President's plan. I intend to offer a rate structure with the same brackets as the President's plan but with the rates set at 15, 20, and 25 percent.

Second, I intend to make permanent adjustments in the area of capital recovery. The administration's CCRS system is much less generous than the combination of ACRS and the ITC which produces an economic value roughly equivalent to expensing. I am currently weighing options that will allow me to propose a capital recovery system that retains much of the value of current law while equalizing effective tax rates across investments.

Third, the package will contain new individual savings incentives to lessen the bias against personal saving.

There are other areas on both the individual and corporate side that I may wish to address but the three things I just mentioned will provide the basic framework.

Of course the element that makes all these things possible is the BTT. The BTT will provide the revenues to make sure that the package does not increase the deficit. On the other hand, I will vigorously oppose efforts to use the BTT to increase the total tax burden on Americans.

Mr. President, when I first introduced S. 1102 it was with the understanding that the bill was offered for discussion purposes and was not to be considered a final product. Any time a brandnew tax system is proposed it is bound to contain problems of a technical nature. I freely solicited input from my colleagues and from the business community. The response was most gratifying. I found in the business community general support for the concept and a desire to change the course of American tax policy to reflect our country's position in the world economy of today.

Beyond the general support expressed so far, I find that the business community is constructively studying the specific details of S. 1102. I have already received a series of communications which identify both substantive and technical questions that need to be addressed for specific industries or for the BTT as a whole. For instance, the bill currently allows the BTT as a credit only against the employer's share of FICA taxes. This could result in a larger net BTT payment than is justified. For basic industries which have large carryovers of income tax credits and net operating loss carryovers, the impact of a large new BTT liability is a concern. Some intellectual labor intensive industries view the BTT/FICA credit approach as too harsh. Companies which import raw materials and other goods from their own foreign affiliates are raising concerns about the appropriate means for including such costs in the BTT base.

During the recess I will be taking a look at the concerns of these and other industries. In some cases we will agree. In other cases we will disagree. I can assure all concerned that I am open to discussion on all issues and the general support I have already received assures me that we can fashion a tax package with the BTT as its cornerstone which will provide economic benefits for the middle class, and provide an environment of growth for years to come.●

TRANSPORTATION SAFETY RULES

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, yesterday, Secretary Dole announced the Department of Tranportation's adoption of new safety rules dealing with alcohol and drug abuse on the railroads. I commend the Secretary for her determination to address this serious problem and for her efforts to develop comprehensive rules that would protect the public and railroad employees from the consequences of on-the-job use of alcohol and drugs. The new rules demonstrate once again that the Secretary is dedicated to saving lives and to improving safety in all the transportation modes.

One year ago, I chaired a hearing to examine the seriousness of the alcohol and drug abuse problem on the railroads and to review what the Federal Government could do to combat the problem.

During that hearing, the tragic dimensions of this problem were only too well documented. For example, Secretary Dole testified that her Department found in a study that 23 percent of railroad operating employees were problem drinkers, that 5 percent of all employees reported to work very drunk or got very drunk while on duty at least once during the study year, and that 13 percent of all employees reported to work a little drunk one or more times during the survey period. Further, the department identified 48 train accidents and incidents since 1975 which were caused by alcohol or drug-impaired employees. These accidents and incidents resulted in 37 fatalities and more than $34 million in property damage.

At the hearing, Secretary Dole announced that she was proposing new safety rules dealing with alcohol and drug abuse on the railroads. Yesterday, the rules became final. The rules: prohibit employees from reporting to work impaired by alcohol or drugs and prohibit on-the-job alcohol or drug use; mandate post-accident toxicological testing for significant accidents; authorize the railroads to test employees for alcohol or drug impairment where there is just cause; require improved accident reporting; mandate preemployment drug screening; and require policies to promote early identification and rehabilitation of problem drinkers or drug users.

The new rules are the first Federal rules dealing with this problem in the railroad industry, and are the product of a long and painstaking process. I am hopeful they will greatly improve railroad safety. In the fall, I plan to hold additional hearings on the problem of alcohol and drug abuse on all the transportation modes. In the meantime, I want to bring these new rules to the attention of our colleagues, and to commend Secretary Dole. The new rules are an important addition to her impressive list of safety initiatives, which includes a rule to require automobiles to have high-mounted stop lights, a rule to require the retrofitting of railroad tank cars carrying liquid flammable gases, a new program to provide for low-cost improvements at railroad-highway grade crossings, a rule to minimize the possibility of serious fires in aircraft cabins, and a rule to tighten the standards governing the use of alcohol and drugs before flight by airline pilots and attendants.●

BAD NEWS ON FOREIGN STEEL IMPORTS AND U.S. STEEL PRODUCTION

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the International Iron & Steel Institute [IISI] has just released the crude steel production figures for the first half of 1985, and the news is bad. Compared to the first 6 months of 1984, U.S. steel production has dropped by 12 percent. Of the 30 major world producers of crude steel sampled, only Denmark has a greater decline.

In contrast, steel production has increased by 5.7 percent in the United Kingdom and by 4 percent in the Federal Republic of Germany. Production has also increased in newly industrializing countries [NICs] like Brazil—up 7 percent—and Venezuela—up 13.4 percent. These increases have occurred despite a 1-percent drop in the production of the 30 major producers of crude steel. This rise in the steel production of certain European Community Countries and some NIC's in the face of lower United States and world steel production is indeed a worrisome development. It means that less efficient producers are delaying adjustment and forcing their unemployment on the United States.

That U.S. steel production is down and foreign steel production is up is clearly revealed in the American Iron & Steel Institute's [AISI] June figures for imports of steel mill products. Steel imports rose sharply in June to 2.4 million tons. The June import penetration level is at 28 percent which is substantially higher than the 18.5 percent level set by the President. Canada—up 41 percent—and the EEC—up 19.9 percent—have been the worst violators during this most recent import surge.

The link between lower U.S. steel production and rising steel imports is obvious. We must, therefore, take steps to equalize the pace of adjustment in countries such as the United Kingdom, Federal Republic of Germany, Brazil, and Venezuela, so that the amount of steel imported into the United States is reduced. As I have also stated before, we must make the President's voluntary export restraint agreements comprehensive to include Canada; and we need to renew and expand our steel agreement with the European Community.

Ignored, the steel crisis can only grow worse. I urge Senators to promptly consider some response to this problem. I ask that the IISI and AISI data I have mentioned be printed at this point in the RECORD.

VENTURE MAGAZINE ARTICLE ADVOCATING PASSAGE OF SMALL BUSINESS PARTICIPATING DEBENTURE (SBPD) LEGISLATION

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, last Thursday, July 25, 1985, I introduced S. 1498, legislation to create a small business participating debenture (SBPD). This financing instrument, which is designed to open up new sources of capital for our Nation's small businesses, was one of the top five recommendations of the 1980 White House Conference on Small Business. It was also the No. 1 recommendation of the 1982 and 1984 SEC Government-Business Forums on Capital Formation mandated by Congress. The participants of these forums, as well as the small business community, strongly support the creation of an SBPD as a much needed measure to help fill the capital formation needs of small business.

Mr. President, in the December 1984 issue of Venture magazine, a monthly publication addressed to venture capitalists and other entrepreneurs, Arthur Lipper III, the publisher and chairman of Venture magazine, urged the Congress to legislate quickly to make SBPD's a fact of life for small businesses. It is the thinking of Mr. Lipper and others that will, in the final analysis, help Congress to see the need for passing this important legislation to ensure that our small businesses will have access to affordable capital necessary to expand and create new jobs.

I ask that Mr. Lipper's article be printed in full in the RECORD.

The article follows:

CHAIRMAN'S COMMENT

The unemployment conundrum: It is generally accepted that one of America's most pressing problems is that of under- and unemployment. The problem is particularly acute because it affects both youth and minorities. Unemployment is at it most socially disruptive when found in combination, when minority youth are unsuccessful in their search for meaningful employment.

It is also generally recognized that our country's largest companies' primary management objective is increased productivity, which is reflected as an ongoing attempt to reduce the number of employees per unit produced. Only the most optimistic of future-tellers would predict that, in aggregate, the larger U.S. companies will ever again create a single net new job. At best, only replacement jobs will be created and their numbers, in the case of many companies, will decrease as managers allow attrition to function as the most painless and politically acceptable means of accomplishing their objective.

It is a fact that, of the net new jobs created, more than 66% will be created by companies employing fewer than 20 people. And more than 75% of net new jobs are created by companies that have been in business for less than five years.

It is broadly believed that most new companies fail during their first five years to achieve the financial predictions and objectives of their founders and frequently, particularly in their first year, fail financially. Further, it is known that most small companies are only marginally profitable after compensating their owner-managers.

Therefore, it can be observed that one of our country's major socioeconomic problems is being addressed, albeit inadequately, by companies that themselves are financially frail. Obviously, this is a dilemma of national significance.

Two questions arise: Is there anything the federal government can do to help? Should government even try to help? I am of the view that the government must attempt to help young businesses. The future economic, and perhaps social, stability of this country rests not only with small businesses, but even more so with young businesses. These young businesses usually start small but frequently do not remain so. These soon-to-be-not-so-small businesses are of special interest to our readers.

The federal government can assist in at least three areas. The first is by legislating that, in the first five years of a company's existence, retained earnings be tax free. The second is that the government adopt VENTURE Magazine's policy of sponsoring "profit education" by encouraging teacher training in free enterprise economics. The broader the understanding of the principles of profit making, the more positive will become the popular attitudes regarding free enterprise. The third area of assistance is a recognition of the essential role performed by entrepreneurial investors. In accepting the risk of total financial loss, they provide the fuel to set the process in motion. Such positive recognition could take the form of deferring a capital gains tax for funds reinvested in other new businesses within a specified period. A similar capital gains tax deferral is already available to homeowners purchasing a new home with proceeds from the sale of their former home. Certainly company formation, which is reflected in job creation, is as worthy of tax relief as individual residential upgrading.

To further induce owner-managers of businesses not only to hire but also to educate youth, particularly those who may be socioeconomically disadvantaged, tax incentives could be offered to companies for employees who can demonstrate significant skill enhancements, to the point that they are worth more to their employers and to themselves. In other words, a tax credit for promoting new workers on the basis of demonstrated merit and contribution specifically over those with greater seniority. This would create a significantly increased competition by entry-level employees in terms of striving for excellence, which can only benefit the enterprise and establish a continuing positive attitude by rewarding extra effort. Managers should be assisted in their need to continually improve the quality of available human resources.

The importance of investors: Finally, as readers of my book, Venture's Guide to Investing in Private Companies, know, I believe that in certain cases investors should be rewarded for their risk assumption by sharing in an investee company's revenues (rather than, or in addition to, profits) by holding a Revenue Participation Certificate. The Treasury could propose such payments be classified as long-term capital gains rather than income and yet still be deductible to the company. In this way companies could negotiate a lesser percentage payment due to the more favorable tax effect for the recipient. In any case, Congress should legislate quickly (an oxymoron) Small Business Participaitng Debentures. These instruments could provide lenders with a fixed return, plus profit participation, and a long-term capital gains tax result, while allowing the companies to deduct the payments.

If you believe some of the above thoughts could be constructive if enacted and applied, send a photocopy of this page (permission granted) to your representatives in Washington. Incidentally, the best description of Washington I've heard is, "a city of 35 sq. mi. surrounded by reality" and I should know; in 1945 I served as a U.S. Senate page and had a wonderful opportunity to learn the workings of a democracy that was designed to be, and once was, a meritocracy.—Arthur Lipper III, Chairman.●

THE VOYAGE OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in honor of the upcoming anniversary of the voyage of Christopher Columbus. Just 2 weeks ago we celebrated National Space Week to honor the successful missions of our own space shuttle and the breaking of Earth's boundaries. In the face of such mammoth achievements, it is helpful to keep a keen perspective of our progress by looking back on endeavors such as Columbus'.

On August 3, 1492, Columbus left Palos, stopped briefly in the Canary Islands and then bravely continued on to the New World. While this may seem insignificant in comparison to reaching the Moon, we must remember that, in 1492, the Atlantic still was believed by most wise men to end by flowing off the edge of the world.

It had taken Columbus years of pleading with both Portugal and Spain to receive a commission to set sail. In the end, Christopher Columbus was about to approach Charles VIII of France when the court of Spain called him back. As we all know, Ferdinand and Isabella finally did lend their finances and support to the voyage.

Expecting to find an easier route to the Far East, the Nina, the Pinta, and the Santa Maria sailed on through August, September, and into October. How could Columbus have believed he would quickly reach China or Japan? Evidently, Marco Polo, who Columbus used for information, had never been to Japan and had incorrectly placed it 1,500 miles east of China. Also, Columbus utilized two bad theories of Ptolemy: His underestimate of the globe's circumference and his overestimate of the eastward extension of Asia.

In the end, it all seemed plausible to Columbus, who died without knowing he was wrong, and to the Spanish court. Then final arrival in what was thought to be the Far East must have been breathtaking. Around 10 o'clock on the night of October 11, 1492, Columbus saw a light. The Pinta was sent ahead and a sailor named Roderigo de Triana made the first unquestionable sighting at 2 in the morning. The anchors were then lowered and the brave explorers anxiously waited offshore until dawn.

We can only imagine the exhilaration they felt when dawn rose on the New World that October morning. To the men of the Nina, the Pinta, and the Santa Maria, the sight of the island of San Salvador must have been more exciting than the view of the astronauts looking from space on the Earth, for Columbus and his crew were beholding the vision of a heretofore undreamed of world.

The courage that guided Columbus 493 years ago is still with us today. When scientists open up the atom to see untold answers to the questons of science and when composers create symphonies from imaginary notes in their mind, then we know the challenger spirit is still alive.

Every October 12 we celebrate Columbus finding the New World and in a catalytic way spurring the creation of the United States. However, on August 3 we can celebrate the fortitude and courage that it took to convince Western Europe that more did exist and to convince those who would sail on the voyage that they would not drop off the edge of the Earth.

Thank you, Christopher Columbus for challenging superstition and moving mankind forward and thank you, Mr. President, for providing me the opportunity to make these few remarks today.●

COLORADO DAY

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, with these words a New York newspaper greeted Colorado's admission to the Union on this day in 1876: "There is something repulsive in the idea that a few handfuls of miners and reckless bushwackers should have the same representation in the Senate as Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New York."

While I have no doubt that those sentiments are no longer shared by New York newspapers nor certainly by my colleagues from Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New York, I could not let this day pass without stopping to pay homage to the "few handfuls of miners and reckless bushwackers" who fought for Colorado statehood.

It was not an easy fight.

Enabling legislation allowing Colorado to become a State first passed the Congress in 1864. According to one account, the motives were more political than civic. My party, the Republicans, were worried about the reelection of President Lincoln and hoped to bring some more electoral votes to his side by rushing through statehood for some of the Republican leaning territories—Colorado included.
